Hera’s Counterpart From Egyptian Mythology

JENNIFER SPIRKO

CLASS

Hera, wife of Zeus, appears in Greek mythological tales as a jealous and vengeful goddess who tries to thwart her husband’s philandering and punishes his lovers and offspring. She was, however, worshiped in her own right as a protective mother goddess and patron of childbirth and marriage. No Egyptian goddess exactly corresponds with Hera, although Isis is her nearest counterpart, and Taweret also has some similarities.

1 Isis, the Protective Wife and Mother

Although the Egyptian pantheon had no queen of the gods, as such, Isis comes close, as wife of the beloved Osiris and daughter of the deities of earth and sky. Unlike the stormy relationship of Zeus and Hera, Isis' love for Osiris was such that she gathered his dismembered parts and reincarnated him. She was even more fiercely protective of her son, Horus, whom she shielded from the wrath of rival god Set, as well as the hazards of the Nile, healing his scorpion stings and snakebites.

2 Taweret, the Frightening Guardian

One of the least humanoid goddesses of Egypt was the hippopotamus-headed Taweret, with lion paws and hair forming a crocodile tail. These features represent beasts that fiercely protect their young and combine to create an appearance that frighten away harmful demons. Taweret was the guardian of pregnancy and childbirth, an aspect she shares with Hera. Unlike Hera, however, Taweret was worshiped in homes, rather than in large-scale temples.

Le Code Noir

Renier la parole donnée

D'un trait, le roi de France venait de renier la parole donnée, interdisant. l'esclavage dans ses possessions (art. XII des Instructions du 26 octobre 1664). De ce même trait, l'Église de France biffait l'enseignement de Saint-Paul : « Il n'y a plus ni Juif, ni Grec […]. Il n'y a plus ni esclave, ni libre, il n'y a plus ni homme, ni femme »

Samedi 20 Décembre 2008 - 07:02

En mars 1685, Louis XIV promulgue l'édit «concernant la discipline de l'Église et de l'État, et la qualité des nègres esclaves aux îles de l'Amérique».

Ce document de 60 articles, élaboré par Colbert, vise la réglementation de la pratique de l'esclavage aux Antilles françaises. On l'appellera le Code noir. À défaut de légitimer l'esclavage, il tentera de le légaliser.
Le 18 septembre 1724, soit 39 ans plus tard, un texte largement inspiré de ce Code noir est enregistré au Conseil supérieur de Bourbon. L'Histoire retiendra que cette instance, créée par ordonnance de novembre 1723, aborde ce sujet lors de sa séance inaugurale. Ce deuxième Code noir est en fait les «Lettres Patentes en forme d'édit concernant les esclaves nègres des Isles de France et de Bourbon».
Il est signé par Louis XV, âgé alors de 13 ans, et contresigné par Jean-Frédéric Phélypeaux, comte de Maurepas, secrétaire d'État à la Marine et aux Colonies, de 1723 à 1749. Pour lui aussi, c'est la première grande décision depuis sa prise de fonction. Ce Code demeurera la charte fondamentale de l'esclavage français au XVIIIe siècle. Son application sera étendue aux Seychelles et à Madagascar quand ces îles deviendront françaises.

Du coup, elle mettait à mort cet étrange sujet universel qu'était le chrétien, un être sans identité – ni Juif, ni Grec – seulement constitué par l'affirmation de sa croyance. Pourquoi ce Code noir indianocéanique ?

Dans ses 54 articles, il fixe le cadre juridique du système esclavagiste. Il permet de mettre de l'ordre dans la multitude d'ordonnances et de règlements pris par des gouverneurs, depuis Vauboulon.
L'occasion est fournie par la mise en oeuvre de la colonisation de l'Isle de France depuis 1721, et répond à une demande forte de la nouvelle Compagnie perpétuelle des Indes. Ce Code noir ne clôt pas le débat sur l'esclavage. Par son ambivalence, il ouvre la question sur la nature de l'esclave. Est-il une personne, enfant de Dieu, sous le sceau du baptême catholique (article premier) ou un meuble (art. XXIX) ?

Le prêtre créole Frédéric Levavasseur combattra l'esclavage, cette abolition de l'homme si noir. Quitte à maintenir l'équivoque et l'ambiguïté, il a cherché à se placer au sein du discours des dominants mais « dans la perspective de l'opprimé ». Car il fallait, quand on ne pouvait casser le contexte, pouvoir rester en face de l'adversaire pour continuer le combat.

L'Église bourbonnaise va travailler, comme le poète Mallarmé, avec mystère, en vue du plus tard ou du jamais.

À CES CAUSES et autres à ce nous mouvant, de l'avis de notre conseil, et de notre certaine science, pleine puissance et autorité royale, nous avons dit, statué et ordonné, disons, statuons et ordonnons, voulons et nous plaît ce qui suit :

Article premier Tous les esclaves qui se trouvent dans les Isles de Bourbon, de France et autres établissements voisins, seront instruits dans la religion catholique, apostolique et romaine, et baptisés; ordonnons aux habitants qui achèteront des nègres nouvellement arrivés, de les faire instruire et baptiser dans le temps convenable à peine d'amende arbitraire; enjoignons aux conseils établis dans lesdites îles, ou directeurs pour ladite compagnie, d'y tenir exactement la main.

Art. II Interdisons tout exercice d'autre religion que de la catholique, apostolique et romaine; voulons que les contrevenants soient punis comme rebelles et désobéissants à nos commandements ; défendons toutes assemblées pour cet effet, lesquelles nous déclarons conventicules, illicites et séditieuses, sujettes à la même peine, qui aura lieu même contre les maîtres qui les permettront ou souffriront à l'égard de leurs esclaves.

Art. III Ne seront préposés aucuns commandeurs à la direction des nègres, qu'ils ne fassent profession de la religion catholique, apostolique et romaine, à peine de confiscation desdits nègres contre les maîtres qui les auront préposés, et de punition arbitraire contre les commandeurs qui auront accepté ladite direction.

Art. IV Enjoignons à tous nos sujets, de quelque qualité et condition qu'ils soient, d'observer régulièrement les jours de dimanche et de fêtes ; leur défendons de travailler leurs esclaves auxdits jours, depuis l'heure de minuit jusqu'à l'autre minuit, à la culture de la terre et à tous autres ouvrages, à peine d'amende et de punition arbitraire contre les maîtres, et de confiscation des esclaves qui seront surpris par nos officiers dans le travail, pourront néanmoins envoyer leurs esclaves aux marchés.

Art.V Défendons à nos sujets blancs, de l'un et de l'autre sexe, de contracter mariage avec les Noirs, à peine de punition et d'amende arbitraire, et à tous curés, prêtres ou missionnaires séculiers ou réguliers, et même aux aumôniers des vaisseaux de les marier ! Défendons aussi à nosdits sujets blancs,même aux Noirs affranchis ou nés libres, de vivre en concubinage avec des esclaves ; voulons que ceux qui auront eu un ou plusieurs enfants d'une pareille conjonction, ensemble les maîtres qui les auront soufferts, soient condamnés chacun en une amende de trois cents livres ; et s'ils sont maîtres de l'esclave de laquelle ils auront eu lesdits enfants, voulons qu'outre l'amende ils soient privés tant de l'esclave que des enfants, et qu'ils soient adjugés à l'hôpital des lieux, sans pouvoir jamais être affranchis ; n'entendons toutefois le présent article avoir lieu lorsque l'homme noir affranchi ou libre, qui n'était pas marié durant son concubinage avec son esclave, épousera dans les formes prescrites par l'église, ladite esclave, qui sera affranchie par ce moyen, et les enfants rendus libres et légitimes.

Art.VI Les solennités prescrites par l'ordonnance de Blois et par la déclaration de 1639, pour les mariages seront observées, tant à l'égard des personnes libres que des esclaves, sans néanmoins que le consentement du père et de la mère de l'esclave y soit nécessaire, mais celui du maître seulement.

Art.VII Défendons très expressément aux curés de procéder aux mariages des esclaves, s'ils ne font apparoir du consentement de leurs maîtres; défendons aussi aux maîtres d'user d'aucune contrainte sur leurs esclaves pour les marier contre leur gré.

Art.VIII Les enfants qui naîtront desmariages entre les esclaves, seront esclaves et appartiendront auxmaîtres des femmes esclaves, et non à ceux de leurs maris, si les maris et les femmes ont des maîtres différents.

Art. IX Voulons que si le mari esclave a épousé une femme libre, les enfants tant mâles que filles suivent la condition de leur mère, et soient libres comme elle, nonobstant la servitude de leur père ; et que si le père est libre et la mère est esclave, les enfants soient esclaves pareillement.

Art.X Les maîtres seront tenus de faire enterrer en terre sainte, dans les cimetières destinés à cet effet, leurs esclaves baptisés ; et à l'égard de ceux qui mourront sans avoir reçu le baptême, ils seront enterrés la nuit dans quelque champ voisin du lieu où ils seront décédés.

Art.XI Défendons aux esclaves de porter aucune arme offensive ni de gros bâtons, à peine du fouet et de confiscation des armes au profit de celui qui les en trouvera saisis, à l'exception seulement de ceux qui seront envoyés à la chasse par leurs maîtres, ou qui seront porteurs de leurs billets ou marques connues.

Art. XII Défendons pareillement aux esclaves appartenant à différents maîtres de s'attrouper, le jour ou la nuit, sous prétexte de noces ou autrement, soit chez l'un de leurs maîtres ou ailleurs, et encore moins dans les grands chemins ou lieux écartés, à peine de punition corporelle qui ne pourra être moindre que du fouet et de la fleur-de-lys, et en cas de fréquentes récidives et d'autres circonstances aggravantes, pourront être punis de mort, ce que nous laissons à l'arbitrage des juges ; enjoignons à tous nos sujets de courre aux contrevenants, et de les arrêter et conduire en prison, bien qu'ils ne soient officiers et qu'il n'y ait encore contre lesdits contrevenants aucun décret.

Art.XIII Les maîtres qui seront convaincus d'avoir permis ou toléré de pareilles assemblées, composées d'autres esclaves que de ceux qui leur appartiennent, seront condamnés, en leur propre et privé nom, de réparer tout le dommage qui aura été fait à leurs voisins à l'occasion desdites assemblées, et en dix piastres d'amende pour la première fois, et au double en cas de récidive.

Art.XIV Défendons aux esclaves d'exposer en vente au marché, ni de porter dans les maisons particulières pour vendre, aucune sorte de denrées, même des fruits, légumes, bois à brûler, herbes ou fourrages pour la nourriture des bestiaux, ni aucune espèce de grains ou autres marchandises, sans permission expresse de leurs maîtres, par billet ou par des marques connues, à peine de revendication des choses ainsi vendues, sans restitution du prix par les maîtres, et de six livres d'amende à leur profit contre les acheteurs.

Art.XV Voulons à cet effet, que deux personnes soient préposées dans chaque marché par les officiers desdits conseils, chacun dans son district, ou par les directeurs pour ladite compagnie, pour examiner les denrées et marchandises qui y seront apportées par les esclaves, ensemble les billets ou marques de leurs maîtres, dont ils seront porteurs.

Art.XVI Permettons à tous nos sujets, habitants desdits pays, de se saisir de toutes les choses dont ils trouveront les esclaves chargés, lorsqu'ils n'auront pas de billets de leurs maîtres, ni de marques connues, pour être rendues incessamment à leurs maîtres, si leur habitation est voisine du lieu où les esclaves auront été surpris en délit ; sinon elles seront incessamment envoyées au magasin de la compagnie le plus proche pour y être en dépôt, jusqu'à ce que les maîtres en aient été avertis.

Art.XVII Voulons que les officiers desdits conseils supérieurs, chacun en ce qui le concerne, ou les directeurs pour ladite compagnie, nous envoient leurs avis sur la quantité des vivres et la qualité de l'habillement qu'il convient que les maîtres fournissent à leurs esclaves ; lesquels vivres doivent leur être fournis par chacune semaine, et l'habillement par chaque année, pour y être statué par nous ; et cependant permettront auxdits officiers ou directeurs de régler par provision lesdits vivres et lesdits habillements: défendons aux maîtres desdits esclaves de donner aucune sorte d'eau-de-vie ou guildive, pour tenir de ladite subsistance et de l'habillement.

Art.XVIII Leur défendons pareillement de se décharger de la nourriture et subsistance de leurs esclaves, en leur permettant de travailler certains jours de la semaine pour leur compte particulier.

Art.XIX Les esclaves qui ne seront point nourris, vêtus et entretenus par leurs maîtres, pourront en donner avis au procureur général desdits conseils, procureur pour nous, et mettre leurs mémoires entre ses mains, sur lesquels, et même d'office si les avis lui viennent d'ailleurs, les maîtres seront poursuivis à sa requête et sans frais ; ce que nous voulons être observé pour les crimes et pour les traitements barbares et inhumains des maîtres envers leurs esclaves.

Art.XX Les esclaves infirmes par vieillesse, maladie ou autrement soit que la maladie soit incurable ou non, seront nourris et entretenus par leurs maîtres ; et en cas qu'ils les eussent abandonnés, lesdits esclaves seront adjugés à l'hôpital le plus proche, auquel les maîtres seront condamnés de payer quatre sols par chaque jour pour la nourriture et entretien de chacun esclave, pour le paiement de laquelle somme ledit hôpital aura privilégié sur les habitations des maîtres, en quelques mains qu'elles passent.

Art.XXI Déclarons les esclaves ne pouvoir rien avoir qui ne soit à leurs maîtres, et tout ce qui leur vient par leur industrie ou par la libéralité d'autres personnes ou autrement, à quelque titre que ce soit, être acquis en pleine propriété à leurs maîtres, sans que les enfants des esclaves, leurs pères et mères, leurs parents ou tous autres, libres ou esclaves, y puissent rien prétendre par succession, dispositions entre-vifs ou à cause de mort, lesquelles dispositions nous déclarons nulles, ensemble toutes les promesses et obligations qu'ils auraient faites, comme étant faites par gens incapables de disposer et contracter de leur chef.

Art.XXII Voulons néanmoins que les maîtres soient tenus de ce que leurs esclaves auront fait par leur commandement, ensemble de ce qu'ils auront géré et négocié dans les boutiques et pour l'espèce particulière de commerce à laquelle leurs maîtres les auront préposés ; et en cas que leurs maîtres n'aient donné aucun ordre et ne les aient pas préposés, ils seront tenus seulement jusqu'à concurrence de ce qui aura tourné à leur profit ; et si rien n'a tourné au profit des maîtres, le pécule desdits esclaves que les maîtres leur auront permis d'avoir, en sera tenu après que leurs maîtres en auront déduit par préférence ce qui pourra leur en être dû, sinon que le pécule consistât, en tout ou partie, en marchandises dont les esclaves auraient permission de faire trafic à part, sur lesquelles leurs maîtres viendront seulement par contribution au sol la livre avec les autres créanciers.

Art.XXIII Ne pourront les esclaves être pourvus d'office ni de commission ayant quelque fonction publique; ni être constitués agents pour autres que par leurs maîtres, pour gérer et administrer aucun négoce, ni être arbitres ou experts; ne pourront aussi être témoins, tant en matière civile que criminelle, à moins qu'ils ne soient témoins nécessairement, et seulement à défaut de Blancs ; mais dans aucun cas ils ne pourront servir de témoins pour ou contre leurs maîtres.

Art.XXIV Ne pourront aussi les esclaves être parties ni être en jugement en matière civile, tant en demandant qu'en défendant, ni être parties civiles en matières criminelles, sauf à leur maître d'agir et défendre en matière civile, et de poursuivre en matière criminelle la réparation des outrages et excès qui auront été commis contre leurs esclaves.

Art.XXV Pourront être les esclaves poursuivis criminellement, sans qu'il soit besoin de rendre leurs maîtres parties, si ce n'est en cas de complicité ; et seront les esclaves accusés, jugés en première instance par les juges ordinaires, s'il y en a, et par appel au conseil, sur la même instruction et avec les mêmes formalités que les personnes libres.

Art.XXVI L'esclave qui aura frappé son maître, sa maîtresse, le mari de sa maîtresse ou leurs enfants, avec contusion ou effusion de sang, ou au visage, sera puni de mort.

Art.XXVII Et quant aux excès et voies de fait qui seront commis par les esclaves contre les personnes libres, voulons qu'ils soient sévèrement punis, même de mort s'il y échoit.

Art.XXIX Les vols de moutons, chèvres, volailles, grains, fourrages, pois, fèves ou autres légumes et denrées, faits par les esclaves, seront punis selon la qualité du vol, par les juges, qui pourront, s'il y échoit, les condamner d'être battus de verges par l'exécuteur de la haute justice, et marqués d'une fleur-de-lys.

Art.XXX Seront tenus, les maîtres, en cas de vols ou d'autres dommages causés par leurs esclaves, outre la peine corporelle des esclaves, de réparer le tort en leur nom, s'ils n'aiment mieux abandonner l'esclave à celui auquel le tort aura été fait, ce qu'ils seront d'opter dans trois jours, à compter de celui de la condamnation; autrement ils en seront déchus.

Art.XXXI L'esclave fugitif qui aura été en fuite pendant un mois, à compter du jour que son maître l'aura dénoncé à la justice, aura les oreilles coupées, et sera marqué d'une fleur-de-lys sur une épaule ; et s'il récidive pendant un autre mois, à compter pareillement du jour de la dénonciation, il aura le jarret coupé et il sera marqué d'une fleurde- lys sur l'épaule, et la troisième fois il sera puni de mort.

Art.XXXII Voulons que les esclaves qui auront encouru les peines du fouet, de la fleur-de-lys et des oreilles coupées, soient jugés en dernier ressort par les juges ordinaires, et exécutés sans qu'il soit nécessaire que tel jugement soit confirmé par le conseil supérieur, nonobstant le contenu en l'art. XXV des présentes, qui n'aura lieu que pour les jugements portant condamnation de mort ou de jarret coupé.

Art.XXXIII Les affranchis ou nègres libres qui auront donné retraite dans leurs maisons aux esclaves fugitifs, seront condamnés par corps, envers le maître, en une amende de dix piastres par chacun jour de rétention ; et les autres personnes libres qui leur auront donné pareillement retraite, en trois piastres d'amende aussi pour chacun jour de rétention ; et faute par lesdites nègres, affranchis ou libres, de pouvoir payer l'amende, ils seront réduits à la condition d'esclaves et vendus ; et si le prix de la vente passe l'amende, le surplus sera délivré à l'hôpital.

Art. XXXIV Permettons à nos sujets dudit pays qui auront des esclaves fugitifs, en quelque lieu que ce soit, d'en faire la recherche par telles personnes et à telles conditions qu'ils jugeront à propos, ou de le faire eux-mêmes, ainsi que bon leur semblera.

Art.XXXV L'esclave condamné à mort sur la dénonciation de son maître, lequel ne sera pas complice du crime, sera estimé avant l'exécution, par deux des principaux habitants, qui seront nommés d'office par le juge, et le prix de l'estimation en sera payé, pour à quoi satisfaire il sera imposé par les conseils, chacun dans son ressort, ou par les directeurs pour ladite compagnie, sur chaque tête d'esclave, la somme portée par l'estimation, laquelle sera réglée sur chacun desdits nègres, et levée par ceux qui seront commis à cet effet.

Art.XXXVI Défendons à tous officiers des conseils et autres officiers de justice établis auxdits pays, de prendre aucune taxe dans les procès criminels contre les esclaves, à peine de concussion.

Art. XXXVII Défendons aussi à tous nos sujets desdits pays, de quelque qualité et condition qu'ils soient, de donner ou faire donner, de leur autorité privée, la question ou torture à leurs esclaves, sous quelque prétexte que ce soit, ni de leur faire ou faire faire aucune mutilation de membres, à peine de confiscation des esclaves, et d'être procédé contre eux extraordinairement, leur permettons seulement, lorsqu'ils croiront que leurs esclaves l'auront mérité, de les faire enchaîner et battre de verges ou cordes.

Art.XXXVIII Enjoignons aux officiers de justice établis dans lesdits pays, de procéder criminellement contre les maîtres et les commandeurs qui auront tué ou mutilé les membres des esclaves étant sous leur puissance ou sous leur direction, et de les punir de mort, selon les circonstances ; et en cas qu'il y ait lieu à l'absolution, leur permettons de renvoyer, tant les maîtres que les commandeurs, absous, sans qu'ils aient besoin d'obtenir de nous des lettres de grâce.

Art. XXXIX Voulons que les esclaves soient réputés meubles, et comme tels, qu'ils entrent dans la communauté, qu'il n'y ait point de suite par hypothèque sur eux ; qu'ils se partagent également entre les cohéritiers, sans réciput et droit d'aînesse, et qu'ils ne soient point sujet au douaire coutumier, au retrait lignager et féodal, aux droits féodaux et seigneuriaux, aux formalités des décrets, ni au retranchement des quatre quints, en cas de disposition à cause de mort ou testamentaires.

Art.XL N'entendons toutefois priver nos sujets de la faculté de les stipuler propres à leurs personnes et aux leurs, de leur côté et ligne, ainsi qu'il se pratique pour les sommes de deniers et autres choses mobiliaires.

Art.XLI Les formalités prescrites par nos ordonnances et par la coutume de Paris, pour les saisies des choses mobiliaires, seront observées dans les saisies des esclaves ; voulons que les deniers en provenant soient distribués par ordre des saisies ; et en cas de déconfiture, au sol la livre, après que les dettes privilégiées auront été payées, et généralement que la condition des esclaves soit réglée en toutes affaires comme celles des autres choses mobiliaires.

Art.XLII Voulons néanmoins que le mari, sa femme et leurs enfants impubères, ne puissent être saisis et vendus séparément, s'ils sont sous la puissance d'un même maître ; déclarons nulles les saisies et ventes séparées qui pourraient en être faites, ce que nous voulons aussi avoir lieu dans les ventes volontaire, à peine, contre ceux qui feront lesdites ventes, d'être privés de celui ou de ceux qu'ils auront gardés, qui seront adjugés aux acquéreurs, sans qu'ils soient tenus de faire aucun supplément de prix.

Art.XLIII Voulons aussi que les esclaves âgés de quatorze ans et au-dessus, jusqu'à soixante ans, attachés à des fonds ou habitations, et y travaillant actuellement, ne puissent être saisis pour autres dettes que pour ce qui sera dû du prix de leur achat, à moins que lesdits fonds ou habitations fussent saisis réellement ; auquel cas nous enjoignons de les comprendre dans la saisie réelle, et défendons à peine de nullité, de procéder par saisie réelle et adjudication par décrets, sur des fonds ou habitations, sans y comprendre les esclaves de l'âge susdit y travaillant actuellement.

Art.XIIV Le fermier judiciaire des fonds ou habitations saisies réellement, conjointement avec les esclaves sera tenu de payer le prix de son bail, sans qu'il puisse compter parmi les fruits qu'il perçoit, les enfants qui sont nés des esclaves pendant son dit bail.

Art.XLV Voulons, nonobstant toutes conventions contraires, que nous déclarons nulles, que lesdits enfants appartiennent à la partie saisie, si les créanciers sont satisfaits d'ailleurs, ou à l'adjudicataire, s'il intervient un décret. À cet effet, il sera fait mention, dans la dernière affiche de l'interposition dudit décret, des enfants nés des esclaves, depuis la saisie réelle, comme aussi des esclaves décédés depuis ladite saisie réelle, dans laquelle ils étaient compris.

Art.XLVI Pour éviter aux frais et aux longueurs des procédures, voulons que la distribution du prix entier de l'adjudication conjointe des fonds et prix des esclaves, et de ce qui proviendra du prix des baux judiciaires, soit faite entre les créanciers selon l'ordre de leurs privilèges et hypothèques, sans distinguer ce qui est pour le prix des esclaves, et néanmoins les droits féodaux et seigneuriaux ne seront payés qu'à proportion des fonds.

Art.XLVII Ne seront reçus les lignagers et les seigneurs féodaux à retirer les fonds décrétés, licités ou vendus volontairement, s'ils ne retirent aussi les esclaves vendus conjointement avec les fonds où ils travaillaient actuellement, ni l'adjudicataire ou l'acquéreur à retenir les esclaves sans les fonds.

Art.XLVIII Enjoignons aux gardiens, nobles et bourgeois, usufruitiers, amodiateurs et autres, jouissant de fonds auxquels sont attachés des esclaves qui y travaillent, de gouverner lesdits esclaves en bons pères de famille ; au moyen de quoi, ils ne seront pas tenus, après leur administration finie, de rendre le prix de ceux qui seront décédés ou diminués par maladie, vieillesse ou autrement, sans leur faute; et aussi ils ne pourront retenir, comme fruits à leurs profits, les enfants nés desdits esclaves durant leur administration, lesquels nous voulons être conservés et rendus à ceux qui en sont les maîtres et les propriétaires.

Art. XLIX Les maîtres âgés de vingt-cinq ans pourront affranchir leurs esclaves par tous entes entre-vifs ou à cause de mort ; et cependant, comme il se peut trouver des maîtres assez mercenaires pour mettre la liberté de leurs esclaves à prix, ce qui porte lesdits esclaves au vol et au brigandage, défendons à toutes personnes, de quelque qualité et condition qu'elles soient, d'affranchir leurs esclaves, sans en avoir obtenu la permission par arrêt du conseil supérieur ou provincial de l'île où ils résideront, laquelle permission sera accordée sans frais, lorsque les motifs qui auront été exposés par les maîtres paraîtront légitimes. Voulons que les affranchissements qui seront faits à l'avenir sans cette permission, soient nuls, et que les affranchis n'en puissent jouir, ni être reconnus pour tels ; ordonnons, au contraire, qu'ils soient tenus, censés et réputés esclaves, que les maîtres en soient privés, et qu'ils soient confisqués au profit de la compagnie des Indes.

Art. L Voulons néanmoins que les esclaves qui auront été nommés par leurs maîtres tuteurs de leurs enfants, soient tenus et réputés, comme nous les tenons et réputons, pour affranchis.

Art. L'Homme est vraiment un prédateur redoutable pour sa propre espece.
L'Esclavage, et les multiples génocides récents ou passés sont là pour le prouver
Sans vouloir enlever une infime parcelle de responsabilité aux puissances esclavagistes que furent la Frnçe
La Grande-Bretagne l'Espagne etc etc. N'oublions pas les arabes qui furent et sont encore des grands esclavagistes.
Pour mémoire l'esclavage a été supprimé en Mauritanie en 1975, puis une nouvelle fois en 1984, et on parle encore de le supprimer
Au soudan, en arabie saoudite, l'esclavage et "normal"

Juliette a fait le vide en elle pour s'abandonner tout entière à l'attente, une attente qu'elle veut sans fièvre.

Au sortir d' El Hajeb, la Renault Cinq a repris de la vitesse. Juliette a évalué les distances, compté les kilomètres. Bientôt apparaîtra la forêt de Jaba. Les chênes zeen, les bouquets de cytise qui fleurissent en juin. Brusque remontée à la mémoire d'une chevauchée en compagnie de son frère. Derrière eux, les cytises écartées marquaient leur passage d'une trace odorante. Rémi avait lancé sa monture au galop. Sa rencontre brutale avec une branche avait marqué son front d'une balafre dont il garda longtemps la cicatrice.

La voiture traverse maintenant un espace boisé. Est-ce la forêt de Jaba ? Juliette s'étonne que son cœur ne batte pas plus vite, mais déjà sa pensée la survole, la néglige, encore quelques kilomètres, et, à la hauteur du village de la Zaouïa, ce sera la plongée dans le Val d'Ifrane, et elle sentira - le sent déjà - un doigt frais et humide passer sur son visage. De virage en virage, suivant l'oued et ses méandres, la voiture atteindra Ifrane par le bas. Juliette lèvera la tête et apercevra la façade de l'hôtel des Lilas qui, paraît-il, existe toujours. Mais contrairement à son attente, la voiture enfile sur des kilomètres une ligne droite et régulière. Désemparée, Juliette se rejette sur son siège, pousse un soupir.

- Vous ne vous sentez pas bien ? »

Un court instant, Irène détourne son attention de la route, lui jette un coup d'œil, avant de reprendre sa position de conductrice prudente.

Un rien de sollicitude dans le ton, pousse Juliette à expliquer son trouble.

- Je cherche des points de repère, je n'en trouve aucun, ma mémoire me joue des tours, je ne reconnais plus rien.

Cette route, d'ailleurs, insipide, anodine, elle ne la connaît pas. Son tracé facile est sorti du cerveau d'un ingénieur, sa réalisation confiée à ces mastodontes mécanisés et expéditifs que l'on utilise aujourd'hui.

La sienne de route, a longtemps senti la sueur des hommes et des bêtes de somme. Elle s'est ouverte dans des flots de poussière rouge, au milieu des jurons, des imprécations, des coups de fouet. Les hommes du Génie ont suivi, en l'élargissant, le chemin de transhumance que depuis des millénaires, entre plateaux rocheux et vallée, suivent les troupeaux, pour atteindre par le Col du Tizi-N'tretten, les hauts plateaux du Moyen-Atlas. Pics et pioches ont éventré la roche, découvert de grands pans de terre rouge qui en s'effondrant, mettent à nu les racines torses des chênes verts, taillé des arêtes vives dans un calcaire parcouru de traînées sanglantes.

Voix d'Irène :

- Nous sommes arrivées !

- Arrivées ? Où donc ? Où sommes-nous ?

- Mais à Ifrane !

Dans la nuit tombante, quelques maisons le long d'une rue et une mosquée. Une mosquée à Ifrane !

A ce moment là, dira plus tard Irène , j'ai eu l'impression que mes paroles vous coupaient le souffle, vous aviez l'air d'une asphyxiée. En réalité Juliette est en proie à une violente agitation intérieure. Elle a envie de malmener sa compagne, d'effacer ce sourire lisse qui marque une totale ignorance, une totale incompréhension. Elle se contente de proférer rageusement

- Vous vous êtes trompée de route ! Et Irène, rejetant dans le néant, le village troglodyte de la Zaouïa, l'oued Tizguit, ses eaux bondissantes et ses rives agrestes :

- Il n'y en a pas d'autre, j'ai regardé la carte !

Le restaurant où elles sont entrées pour dîner a pris la place de la charcuterie "Gnocchi", Juliette en décide ainsi après quelque hésitation.

Négligeant les mille six cents mètres d'altitude, l'architecture alpine du village et ses toits pentus, le restaurateur marocain a nommé son établissement: "Rose d'Orient". Une volumineuse lanterne en verre coloré, dispensatrice de rêves plutôt que d'éclairage, est suspendue au plafond. Irène parcourt du regard la salle vide, les tables inoccupées, elle cherche, sans doute, de l'inédit, du typique, n'en trouve pas et s'assied.

C'est donc ici même, se souvient Juliette, que le Père Gnocchi, derrière son étal, débitait sa cochonaille avec des gestes d'officiant. Elle se revoit, par les matins glacés des hivers 41 et 42, s'insérant, à la place de sa mère, dans la file d'attente des ménagères.

Cependant le restaurateur s'est approché, leur propose un tajine

- C'est un ragoût de mouton accompagné de légumes, explique Juliette à l'intention de sa compagne.

- Petits pois et carottes, précise leur hôte.

Irène retient de lui qu'il parle français comme vous et moi, est vêtu à l'européenne et cache le haut de sa noire chevelure sous une amusante petite calotte, en forme de cupule, faite de laine tissée multicolore. Il leur servira pour dessert, des fruits au sirop et sur leur demande, du thé à la menthe. Irène qui a suivi des yeux ses allers et venues, complète ses observations :

- Il a le geste lent et des yeux d'insomniaque.

Nous sommes en période de Ramadan. Son énergie s'en ressent.

Juliette est calmée. Le malentendu s'est dissipé. Elles se sont expliquées abondamment de part et d'autre.

Irène s’est dit désolée. Elle pensait que le tracé sinueux sur la carte, représentait une piste, et les pistes au Maroc, on les lui a décrites pleines d'embûches.

- Une route nouvelle a été ouverte sur le plateau, je l'ignorais. Elle aboutit à l'opposé de la première, devenue en quelque sorte route touristique.

Irène a souri :

- Celle-là même où j'aurais dû m'engager, si j'avais su que vous y teniez autant.

Juliette a souri à son tour. L'impression favorable du début se confirme. Cette jeune fille est de bonne compagnie.

Quel heureux hasard, sa rencontre, dans une grande surface avec Madame Maurin, une ancienne collègue de bureau. Elles avaient roulé de conserve leur chariot dans les allées du magasin « Que devenez-vous ? » Une phrase en amenant une autre, Juliette s'était ouverte de son projet :

- Un voyage au Maroc, voici plus de vingt ans que je n'ai revu mon village dans le Moyen-Atlas. Y aller seule me fait hésiter. Ma fille est absente, elle séjourne en Angleterre.

- Quelle coïncidence ! La mienne a très envie de connaître le Maroc, elle est étudiante à la fac de Lyon, et justement, voici les vacances de Pâques.

Le projet a pu prendre forme.

- Nous voyagerons par avion et si votre fille sait conduire...

- Mais oui, Irène sait conduire, elle a son permis.

- Je louerai donc une voiture à Casablanca.

Et voilà comment Juliette a vu arriver devant le guichet de l'aéroport de Lyon-Satolas, où elle lui a donné rendez-vous, une jeune fille petite et mince, en jean délavé, tee-shirt blanc, vierge de toute inscription et sac au dos. Elles se sont serré la main

- Je suis Irène.

- Et moi Juliette Aubert.

En prenant place dans l'appareil, Irène Maurin confie à Juliette qu'elle prend l'avion pour la deuxième fois et, apparemment, n'en a pas épuisé tous les plaisirs car elle ne perd pas une miette du panorama survolé. Juliette peut ainsi la détailler discrètement. Des cheveux blonds, à la frisure brouillonne, des traits nets, le nez bien planté, une physionomie agréable. Elle porte des boucles d'oreilles, toutes petites, de celles qu'on offre aux fillettes le jour de leur première communion. Le regard large hésite entre le gris et le vert, et il a, c'est inespéré, quelque chose de candide. Un teint de pêche-abricot dû à une exposition prolongée au soleil d'hiver … sans doute vacances de février à la neige, tant mieux, c'est une sportive. Comme on consulte les augures, Juliette cherche sur les traits de sa voisine, les signes favorables à la réussite de son entreprise.

- … C'est que je ne suis pas une voyageuse ordinaire. Je pars en pèlerinage... Que sais-je d'elle ? Le peu que m'en disait sa mère lorsque nous travaillions ensemble...

Alors que Juliette était prolixe sur sa fille, ce trublion, qui depuis la mort de son père, revendiquait toujours plus d'indépendance, Madame Maurin s'étendait peu sur la sienne : vive, débrouillarde, paraît-il et ne lui causant aucun problème. Jugement que Juliette se remémore aujourd'hui avec satisfaction, elle n'en poursuit pas moins son soliloque... Je lui trouve la mâchoire volontaire, me laissera-t-elle l'initiative du parcours avec ses pauses, ses lenteurs ? Il lui faudra supporter mes silences ou au contraire l'étalage de mes états d'âme, peut-être même mes exaltations. Elle s'inquiète du corps menu... le mien n'est guère plus épais. Deux faibles femmes lancées sur les routes du Maroc...

Ses appréhensions quant à la fragilité supposée d'Irène s'étaient vite dissipées. Une quinzaine de kilomètres après Casablanca, la jeune fille avait immobilisé la Renault sur le bas-côté de la route, était descendue, avait inspecté les pneus arrières et déclaré que celui de gauche était crevé. Elle avait eu alors le geste expéditif pour sortir le cric, le placer sous la voiture, desserrer les écrous de la roue.

- Je fais le plus dur.

Juliette descendue à son tour, l'avait observée avec un étonnement admiratif.

- Je me demande d'où vous tirez cette vigueur... moi qui vous croyais...

- Je trompe mon monde, n'est-ce pas ? Elle s'était mise à rire, je fais des études de prof de gym… J'aurais dû vous le dire. J'ai de l'entraînement.

Un jeune Marocain surgi de nulle part, car le terrain était aussi nu que le plat de la main, lui avait proposé une aide, dont elle n'avait nul besoin, mais qu'elle avait acceptée avec simplicité. A eux deux la roue de secours avait été rapidement mise en place. La voiture avait pu reprendre la route. Le jeune homme immobile, les avait regardées s'éloigner. « J'ai l'impression, avait dit Juliette, que nous lui avons meublé sa journée. » A hauteur de Meknès, Irène avait proposé :

- Si nous faisions un crochet par Volubilis, cela ne nous retarderait guère, vous devez connaître le site...

Juliette avait avoué que non, elle ne le connaissait pas. Il était pour elle, désagréablement lié aux souvenirs d'internat... La visite de Volubilis, organisée par les professeurs, lui semblait le prolongement d'une version latine et si elle y avait participé, l'aurait privée d'instants précieux passés chez elle, en famille.

- J'aborderai ces ruines, d'un regard aussi neuf que le vôtre, ma chère Irène.

Celle-ci, le Guide Bleu sur les genoux, avait lu avec application: "Le site archéologique de Volubilis, au pied du Mont Zerroun... "

Le vocable de Zerroun catapulté dans sa mémoire par une voix étrangère avait provoqué chez Juliette un petit choc... Le Zerroun, elle l'avait oublié ! Il était associé, autrefois, au mot "prune". Les prunes du Zerroun, petites, rondes, violettes, gobées d'un seul coup, - le noyau arrêté au passage et projeté loin devant soi -, abondaient sur le marché de Meknès où elles s'écrasaient dans les cageots. Sur leurs meurtrissures, lèvres entrouvertes, le miel exsudé se figeait en gouttelettes dorées.

Le Guide Bleu rendait au Djebel Zerroun son identité géographique, le dotant même d'une situation privilégiée puisque à ses pieds les Romains avaient édifié la ville de Volubilis.

Obéissant à sa conductrice, la Renault avait quitté la grande route pour s'engager sur une voie plus étroite à travers une campagne printanière, plantée d'oliviers. Elles avaient aperçu dans le lointain, sur la droite, la ville sainte de Moulay Idriss et son concentré de maisons blanches qui conféraient définitivement au Zerroun, terre d'élection de la prune, un caractère sacré. La voiture avait bifurqué à gauche pour rouler encore quelques kilomètres, puis s'était arrêtée. Le reste du parcours devait s'effectuer à pied. Les deux promeneuses avaient gravi un vallon avant d'apercevoir, face au soleil, arcs et galeries, colonnes et murs béants, parterres de mosaïques : les ruines de Volubilis. Autour d'elles, la solitude, le silence. Juliette avait admiré :

Si les Romains avaient voulu donner pour les siècles à venir, une idée de l'importance, de la beauté de leurs monuments, de leur résistance au temps aussi, eh bien, mission accomplie ! »

Et Irène, le regard soudain d'un vert franc, s'était écriée avec enthousiasme, découvrant ainsi un trait positif de sa personnalité :

- J'aurais dû emporter ma tente, elle est super confortable. Nous aurions passé quelques jours ici. J'aime cet endroit.

Et elle avait souligné le charme bucolique du décor, de ses collines aux courbes douces, tapissées d'une herbe gazonnante et fleurie.

Deux hommes, main dans la main, avaient alors franchi l'arc de triomphe. Les djellabas, l'une blanche, l'autre violette, aux plis mouvants, avaient frôlé les colonnes tronquées. Les babouches avaient glissé sur des cols d'oiseaux, des troncs musculeux, des flancs de naïades. Leur déambulation s'était poursuivie au-delà des ruines et, sans plus de réalité que des fantômes, ils avaient disparu derrière une courbe du relief.

Irène trouve "tristounet" l'hôtel où elles comptent séjourner.

- Un hôtel à Vichy, hors saison. Je sais de quoi je parle. J'ai accompagné ma mère en cure.

Qui sait, s'inquiète Juliette, si elle ne gardera pas de ce voyage où je l'ai entraînée moi aussi, la même impression d'ennui.

- Lorsque je suis partie, il venait d'être construit, était flambant neuf et tenu par une veuve et sa fille.

L'enseigne "La Reine des neiges" a disparu. Derrière son bureau l'hôtelier marocain, d'une main molle leur tend des clés "Oui, oui, il y a des chambres libres" En fait, elles le sont toutes. Une femme les croise, sa bouilloire de cuivre à la main. Fesses à l'air, des marmots braillards courent dans le couloir. Juliette a du mal à trouver le sommeil. Sa première nuit, tant attendue, passée à Ifrane. Cette pensée l'agite. Elle est réveillée par un bruit d'eau qui tombe. La pluie ? Se serait-elle trompée dans ses prévisions ? Hier, au soir, l'observation du ciel d'un noir profond, durement piqué d'étoiles brillantes, valait celle du baromètre. Elle l'assurait qu'il ferait beau le lendemain et les jours à venir. Elle écoute... le tapotement régulier vient du cabinet de toilette. Une fuite sous le lavabo. Aux gouttes qui tombent de ce clepsydre sonorisé, elle compte les secondes, les minutes, finit par se rendormir.

Elles sont arrivées au cœur du village. Pour Juliette au cœur de son enfance.

- Cette maison que vous voyez devant nous, c'est la mienne. Voilà où nous habitions. Les stores, de mon temps, on les appelait "roul'doux", sont baissés.

Si l'un d'eux se relevait, elle verrait apparaître le visage de sa mère, elle entendrait sa voix : "Juliette !". Flot d'émotion douce, le premier.

Elle ne se rappelait pas les habitations autour d'elle, si hautes, si massives. Du coup la sienne perd de ce prestige dont elle la parait autrefois, lorsqu'elle se dressait, figure de proue dans un village, encore en devenir. Les tuiles ont pâli et elle ressent comme une offense le rouge des toits avoisinants.

- Ces deux tilleuls devant l'entrée sont vénérables. Ils doivent la vie à mon père.

- On ne le dirait guère, s'étonne Irène, ils ont des troncs d'adolescents

- C'est que le plateau sur lequel est bâti le village n'a, selon l'expression paternelle, que la peau et les "osses" - ainsi prononçait son père, le "tronc de figuier"[1] La grasse vallée du Tizguit qui l'entaille, s'est nourrie de sa chair dépecée depuis des millénaires par le vent, la pluie, la neige. Et je me rappelle que par les soirs d'été il se produisait entre le plateau surchauffé et la fraîche vallée un étrange phénomène. Sans un souffle, sans un frémissement d'air, le murmure de l'oued s'enflait, un grondement d'eaux montantes avançait vers le village, emplissait l'atmosphère. Il s'accompagnait de stridulations d'insectes, de senteurs aussi... la mousse... la menthe... et on se penchait à la fenêtre comme au bord d'un puits.

Leur promenade s'est poursuivie au hasard, le long des rues, dans un village frappé de léthargie. Juliette regrette de se montrer piètre cicérone.

Il m'est difficile d'ajuster la certitude de mes souvenirs sur la réalité environnante. Ma mémoire résiste. Des constructions oubliées surgissent, d'autres me sont inconnues ou ne sont pas là où je les attendais. Ici, une rue à la place d'un terrain vague, là, des murs haut levés me cachent une façade...

Elles passent sans s'arrêter devant l'école, fermée pour cause de ramadan.

- Mon école, du cours préparatoire au certificat d'études. Un bâtiment supplémentaire lui a été adjoint. Projeté, réalisé par

eux, les autres, ceux qui se sont donné après nous, des droits sur le village. Chaque transformation l'éloigne de moi un peu plus. Il m'échappe. Abandonné, je l'aurais mieux reconnu. Quand nous l'avons quitté, nous pensions que sans nous il ne pourrait vivre. Or je le retrouve agrandi, transformé, entretenu avec soin, sinon avec amour, et se refusant à ma nostalgie.

Résonance de leurs pas sur la chaussée. Irène, à l'écoute, en fait la remarque.

- C'est la sécheresse de l'air » explique Juliette.

Voix de son père : " Tu pourrais dire son exceptionnelle pureté." Son père était toujours dithyrambique quand il s'agissait d'Ifrane.

- Curieux, remarque Irène, ce village bâti à l'occidentale et habité par d'authentiques marocains.

Il est vrai que son architecture ne correspond pas à leur genre de vie, à leurs traditions, à leur culture. Ils s'y sont introduits en bernard-l'ermites. Mais de la possession naît l'attachement. Je suppose qu'ils ont pour leur demeure des sentiments de propriétaire.

- Je ne m'attendais pas, reprend Irène, à trouver au Maroc, un village de ce type. Regrette-t-elle des murs en pisé sous une palmeraie ? Et ma surprise vient de ce que je suis justement sans surprise. Sous un ciel d'un bleu vigoureux, je vois un ensemble cossu de chalets montagnards aux toits exagérément abrupts.

- Pour donner moins de prise à la neige, éviter son entassement. L'hiver est rude sur le plateau. Sélectionné par sa mémoire, le mot "rude" a franchi ses lèvres, donné sa coloration à un lâcher de souvenirs : la cuisinière à bois qui exhale sa mauvaise humeur en bouffées noires, les bandes de chiens errants, les pieds des détenus enveloppés dans de vieux chiffons, le glapissement d'une hyène, et parce qu'il est nocturne, on le croit fou.

Ses souvenirs rejoignent ceux de sa mère qui, pour avoir passé une enfance pauvre à Dijon, redoutait l'hiver "tueur de pauvres gens" et se rétractait au spectacle glorieux que donnait la neige au Maroc. La lumière se déversait le long des pentes cristallisées par le gel dans un jaillissement d'escarboucles. Fête barbare à laquelle participaient les enfants, les siens aussi, ils disloquaient les pendeloques, abattaient les longues lances translucides suspendues aux toits.

Un fil d'étendage devenait yatagan, et ils en éprouvaient la courbe. Les arbres au bord de la route, figés dans une matière précieuse, dressaient des silhouettes d'idoles païennes. Mais que survint, venue de l'ouest, une pluie douce amorçant une brusque remontée de la température, et la neige rendait les armes. Sa mère, derrière la fenêtre, son éternel châle à franges sur les épaules, assistait à sa défaite et clamait : "La neige fond ! ".

Avec des soupirs, de vagues borborygmes, la neige, pénétrée de chaleur, se désagrégeait mollement, enfantait des filets d'eau, des coulées de terre noire...

Irène a profité de ce long silence pour se livrer, semble-t-il à quelque supputation...

- On doit pouvoir faire du ski...

- Et j'en faisais, j'ai reçu à douze ans ma première paire de skis en bois d'hickory, lourds et encombrants.

Et sa compagne, la prunelle soudain d'un vert revivifié

- Dieu merci ! il est toujours bien à sa place !

Des gens d'Ifrane, elle ne sait plus qui, lui avaient raconté que les Marocains l'avaient fait disparaître. Propos ridicules. Même l'espace qu'on lui avait ménagé, planté d'arbustes, est bien entretenu, gazonné et tout... Cet espace, Irène le croque en quelques mots :

- Autour d'un vieux lion de pierre, un mini square de province que le conseil municipal aurait doté, pour le rajeunir, d'un bassin avec jet d'eau.

Juliette proteste que ce lion n'est pas si vieux qu'elle le pense

- Je l'ai vu naître sous le ciseau de Monsieur Moreau, professeur au lycée de Rabat... Il fait partie intégrante de mon enfance. Mille fois, je me suis juchée sur son dos, mille fois je me suis égratignée au grain rude de la pierre... Qui le premier eut l'idée d'utiliser les talents d'un professeur de dessin pour donner forme à cette masse rocheuse, indestructible, qui émergeait du sol ? On était au mois de juin. Les écoliers avaient devant eux une éternité de vacances. La grande prairie, entre le Tizguit et le plateau avait été fauchée par les détenus, et les gestes du sculpteur s'accompagnaient de l'odeur des graminées fraîchement coupées. Les enfants pouvaient témoigner que ce rocher, depuis toujours, renfermait un corps de lion, car le ciseau, le burin et la gouge, maniés par des mains expertes, dégageaient un mufle débonnaire, la crêpelure d'une abondante crinière, une musculature au repos, la courbe souple d'une queue terminée par un pinceau de poils et prête à se soulever pour chasser une mouche importune.

Monsieur Moreau disparut sans laisser sa signature. Notre lion n'a donné la célébrité qu'au seul Ifrane. Il en est devenu le symbole. Des cartes postales le représentant, ont inondé le pays... Les Marocains malgré leur répugnance, pour la représentation dans la pierre d'une forme animale l'ont conservé. Mieux; ils l'ont honoré de quelques fioritures...

A "La rose d'Orient", l'hôtelier, il se nomme Hassan, leur accorde l'attention que l'on doit à des habituées. Juliette en profite pour lui demander si des Français sont restés à Ifrane.

- Quelques-uns, plus ou moins longtemps, mais Madame Marie-Louise, elle, le ton se fait chaleureux, n'est jamais partie.

- Marie-Louise, vous dites, et son nom ?

- Je ne sais pas, on l'appelait Madame Marie-Louise...

Juliette sollicite sa mémoire : n'était-ce pas cette nouvelle venue au village qui, par défi, avait fait construire une villa au moment où le Protectorat français vivait ses derniers moments, où le Sultan revenu de son exil malgache, était acclamé par une foule dont l'enthousiasme confinait à l'hystérie, où enfin une flambée de violence parcourait le pays.

La personnalité de cette femme l'avait suffisamment marquée pour qu'elle la revoie avec netteté, une haute taille, un visage déjà marqué par l'âge, des traits forts et beaux, et des yeux... elle se souvient surtout des yeux... clairs, d'une eau admirable... des yeux de Nordique.

- Elle est morte l'année dernière, a soupiré Hassan.

Regret amer d'arriver trop tard. Juliette aurait aimé rencontrer cette survivante d'un passé révolu, chercher dans ses paroles et sur ses traits, le secret d'une si longue fidélité. Maintenant, elle ne peut plus que supposer. Le maintien d'une présence française en territoire marocain ? Elle ne croit pas à cet entêtement là, préfère suivre la pente de sa propre inclination. Madame Marie-Louise, en découvrant pour la première fois, ce site privilégié du Moyen-Atlas, avait rêvé d'y vivre et d'y finir ses jours et elle était de ces femmes qui ont le rêve obstiné. Elle avait vu se fermer portes et fenêtres sans être saisie par l'envie moutonnière de fermer les siennes... Elle avait refusé l'exil. Elle était donc restée seule dans un village déserté. Elle avait vu les indigènes, jusque là relégués dans le "fondouk", investir les demeures inoccupées.

L'ancien tissu social parti en lambeaux, un autre se reconstituait, dans lequel madame Marie-Louise, étant femme, et femme solitaire, ne pouvait s'intégrer, cependant, elle avait entretenu de bons rapports avec la nouvelle communauté. Le ton de Hassan en témoignait.

Âme bien trempée, elle avait donné une leçon aux anciens d' Ifrane, à ceux, qui, arrivés des quatre coins de France ou d'Europe, se vantaient d'avoir été les premiers à peupler le village, à en composer le substrat. Les premiers, ils avaient pénétré une nature vierge, comme à l'aube des temps. Devant l'ombre gigantesque projetée sur le sol, par un gypaète dans son envol, ils s'étaient sentis des âmes de Robinsons. Puis, enhardis, ils explorèrent, et, pour mieux posséder, spolièrent. Ils ouvrirent des passages dans la forêt, débusquèrent de son fourré le sanglier, exhibèrent le corps de la première panthère tuée et elle ne serait pas la dernière, arrêtèrent net, d'une balle, les ébats gracieux du lynx, cet habitant de la forêt de Jaba. Et puis un jour, sous la pression des événements, ils avaient abandonné les lieux. Ils ne voulaient pas y voir remplacer le drapeau français par le drapeau chérifien, ni obéir à des lois imposées par ceux-là même qui, hier encore, leur obéissaient. Chaque départ en entraînait un autre. Mailles d'un tricot qui file... mais le dernier virage dépassé, la Zaouïa hors de vue et déjà, le regret s'emparait d'eux, ne les lâcherait plus... Perdant l'espoir d'une communauté réformée, ils s'étaient dispersés à travers la France, sans que les liens qui les unissaient ne se rompent, leur rappelant qu'ils restaient, avant tout et à jamais, des "Gens d'Ifrane".

Juliette refait surface au moment où le restaurateur pose sur la table le "tajine" rituel. Il est aujourd'hui aux cardes et cœurs d'artichauts. Un pont a été jeté entre ses clients et lui. Il n'entend pas l'abandonner.

- Vous l'avez connue, Madame Marie-Louise, vous êtes du pays ?

Je l'étais, répond Juliette, oui, je l'étais, mais je ne connaissais Madame Marie-Louise que de vue. Et vous, Hassan, vous rappelez-vous la famille Walter ? Mon père était Receveur des Postes...

Hassan hoche négativement la tête :

- Au temps des Français, j'étais trop jeune, mon père, peut-être... il travaillait à l'entretien des routes sous les ordres de Monsieur Martinez

Juliette se jette sur le nom.

- Martinez... quel Martinez ? Ils étaient deux frères. L'un petit et maigre, l'autre, plus large que haut… Une bonne tête, ce devait être celui-là. Il conduisait le "Pourquoi-pas", successeur du premier chasse-neige à étrave, écrasé par l'effondrement du toit du garage où s'accumulait une neige qui tombait depuis huit jours.

L'avancée du "Pourquoi-pas" dans les rues s'accompagnait de jappements de chiens, de cris d'enfants enfouis dans une neige fraîche dont ils éprouvaient vite, à la morsure de ses paillettes acérées, la traîtresse douceur. Et c'était à celui qui, au passage de l'engin, échapperait le dernier au geyser d'écume irisée projeté, soufflé par les tuyères. Monsieur Martinez passait sa tête à la portière, libérait son inquiétude en une bordée de jurons et invectives.

Hassan observe sa cliente avec intérêt, il a soufflé sur des cendres, ranimés des souvenirs... Il devine son état d'âme, la sienne se met à l'unisson.

- Moi aussi je suis Ifranien. Il a dit Ifranien, mot doux à entendre, Ifranien d'une autre espèce, d'un autre âge, Ifranien tout de même. Elle a envie de lui serrer la main, il éprouve la même envie, et, sachant qu'il va être compris, il raconte ... Il raconte que l'été dernier, d'un car de touristes est descendue une femme, elle s'est approchée de la maison, juste à côté, elle a embrassé la poignée de la porte. Une autre fois, deux Français, le mari et la femme, se sont arrêtés devant l'école. La femme a appuyé son front contre le portail et s'est mise à pleurer. Son mari n'arrivait pas à l'arracher du portail. Il examine sur Juliette l'effet produit par un chagrin exprimé d'une manière aussi spectaculaire. Il attend d'elle une réaction, dont il tirera un récit qui, colporté à travers le village, enrichira la mémoire collective de ses habitants. Lui, Hassan ne s'en cache pas. Le pathétique d'un gestuel que chacun ici-bas, dans son propre langage, peut traduire ainsi : "J'ai été arrachée à ces lieux aimés" lui est allé droit au cœur. Peut-être même a-t-il les yeux humides car il éprouve le besoin de les essuyer sur une manche de sa veste...

A ce moment un des mitrons, sur le seuil de la cuisine, le hèle. Profitant de sa courte absence, Irène se penche vers Juliette pour lui murmurer que l'ami Hassan a aujourd'hui l'humeur sentimentale, humeur qu'elle attribue aux fatigues du Ramadan.

Précédé de l'odeur exacerbée d'un bouquet de menthe qu'on vient d'ébouillanter, Hassan réapparaît. Il les prend, maintenant à témoin d'une indignité « L'hôtel Balima va disparaître. "On parle de le faire sauter". Juliette le savait. Des gens d'Ifrane l'avaient prévenue :

- Aïe ! Ma "pôvre" ! La vue qu'on a du haut des étages, sur le palais, le Roi ne supporte pas !

Irène les regarde, incrédule.

- L'hôtel Balima, et dans sa bouche les deux noms perdent soudain leur charge affective, nous l'avons aperçu ce matin, c'est ce grand bâtiment adossé à la forêt de cèdres et surplombant la vallée?

L'affliction de Hassan redouble :

- Un hôtel de cent chambres, gémit-il, quand il implosera, les gens du village pleureront.

- Voyons, le ton posé d'Irène est celui que l'on prend pour mettre de l'ordre dans un univers de déraison, voyons, il faut protester, faire signer une pétition.

- Une pétition ! N'ayant pas l'usage du mot, Hassan en a perdu le sens. Juliette n'ose pas expliquer que les Ifraniens n'ont pas plus de droits que des enfants face à un père abusif. Elle souffle :

- Vous n'y pensez pas, les désirs du Roi ont valeur d'ukases. L'hôtel Balima l'importune. Il faut le détruire. Delenda est Carthago ! Et il sera détruit.

Au sortir du Restaurant, Irène, se réjouit d'avoir trouvé chez le jeune Marocain des qualités reconnues, cataloguées par elle comme estimables, porte sur lui ce jugement bref, mais positif.

- Sympa ce garçon, et elle ajoute, mais je m'étonne, l'amour du village natal, cela existait-t-il donc encore ? Elle en parle, pense Juliette, comme d'une plante ou d'un animal en voie de disparition et que l'on retrouve dans un endroit inattendu.

- Mes parents, poursuit Irène, en congé regagnent Melley où ils sont nés, mais c'est plutôt par économie. Il y a longtemps que je ne les suis plus. Pour moi la maison de campagne, la solitude, c'est la galère ! Je suis trop habituée sans doute, â la vie dans un appartement, aux sorties en groupes. Vous ne croyez pas que l'ami Hassan en rajoute, histoire de vous faire plaisir ?

- Non, non, Juliette ne le croit pas.

- Pourtant l'hôtel Balima leur rappelle le temps des Français, leur pouvoir, il en est le symbole.

- Vous dites le temps des Français, mais à Ifrane cela représente trente années de rapports quotidiens, de vies mêlées. Bien sûr, les Indigènes habitaient le "fondouk", mais le village leur était familier. Ces demeures dont ils ont hérité, ils les connaissaient bien, pour y avoir besogné et servi. Ils nous regardaient vivre, ils nous sentaient vivre. Sous l'effet d'une lente imprégnation, tunique tissée sur eux, maille à maille ils se sont trouvés investis, après notre départ, d'une nouvelle identité, celle d'Ifraniens. L'hôtel Balima était notre orgueil, il est devenu le leur, et d'imaginer sa disparition brutale, qui laisserait le village mutilé, lui cause un choc, à cet homme...

- Et maintenant il recueille avec une naïveté touchante, le témoignage de vos regrets... Difficile pour moi de comprendre l'atmosphère passionnée qui entoure cet ensemble de maisons éparpillées... construites d'hier, semble-t-il, et, pardonnez-moi, Juliette, Ifrane me semblerait banal sans la présence d'une mosquée au milieu des tuiles rouges et de la résidence royale, flambant neuve, folie pour milliardaire qui émerge des cèdres. Inutile de chercher une trace de vétusté, un vestige grâce auquel on pourrait découvrir une culture, une histoire. L'histoire d'Ifrane... Ifrane a-t-il un passé ? Juliette racontez-moi.

Juliette ne s'est pas fait prier. Elles sont allées s'asseoir sur un banc, dans le petit square, face au lion. Irène a allongé ses

jambes, tendu au soleil un visage fervent. Elle porte un survêtement bleu marine, signe évident de ses activités sportives. Fidèle à ses habitudes, elle a commencé la journée par un footing dont elle est revenue, paraît-il en "super-forme".

- Dans les tout commencements, ne vous effrayez pas - ils ne remontent pas loin, une soixantaine d'années à peine - le plateau était nu, désert, encombré de croupes rocheuses qui se succédaient en vagues pétrifiées Aucune fouille dans ces profondeurs ne mettrait à jour le moindre vestige préhistorique ou archéologique. Depuis toujours un lieu d'errance pour la hyène et le chacal, un "no man's land" où s'observaient sans s'affronter, les tribus berbères. A ses pieds, renforçant son aspect désolé, la fraîche vallée du Tizguit. Déjà connue et appréciée sans doute des Romains de Volubilis, ils la nommèrent "Horti", les jardins. Le nom déformé devint "Tourtit". Nous sommes ici sur le plateau de Tourtit.

Son histoire commence le jour où une piste partie d'Azrou, atteignit une plaine volcanique qu'elle pénétra et traversa… Peu après, comme pour prouver qu'il était devenu accessible, une voiture résidentielle, cahotant et tressautant, le parcourait et s'arrêtait face à la vallée. Il en descendit un chauffeur de maître et un personnage en jaquette et chapeau haut de forme. Le Secrétaire Général du Protectorat français en personne.

Je me plais à penser qu'il faisait une de ces journées où l'air vif et tonique pour avoir voyagé sur la neige s'attendrit par bouffées, en tiédeurs et senteurs printanières, où le Tizguit déborde en ruisselets capricants. Au-dessus du haut-de-forme immobile, une buse décrivait des cercles concentriques.

Alors le Secrétaire Général frappa le sol de son escarpin verni : «Ici, dit-il, sera le village»... et le village fut. A l'appellation

- Cet embryon de village, Irène, vous ne l'auriez pas trouvé banal. Imaginez en face de nous, sur un espace chaotique, trois chalets, trois modestes constructions en bois. Il y en avait peut-être davantage, mais, ayant échappé à mon attention enfantine, je ne peux leur donner droit à l'existence. Juste à côté, cette grande bâtisse que ce matin même vous avez trouvée sans grâce existait déjà. Je me souviens du jour où les ouvriers ont posé la verrière de la façade. Elle ne devint jamais ce à quoi elle était destinée : un Casino. Elle servit au fil des ans, à de multiples usages. Et, là-haut, ostensiblement à l'écart sur une hauteur arasée et devenue plate forme, s'ouvrit un chantier qui devint entre "midi et trois", le but de la promenade paternelle. L'ouvrage inspirait à mon père des commentaires enthousiastes. Une armée de Portugais y travaillait. L'hôtel aurait cent chambres et le volume d'une cathédrale.

Nous, les Walter, père, mère, un garçon et deux filles, logions dans un des chalets, enfin, dans une moitié, l'autre étant réservée à l'usage du Receveur des Postes, mon père. Le couloir qui les séparait nous ayant été généreusement imparti, ma mère y accrocha ses casseroles en aluminium. Le chalet s'ouvrait sur une véranda à laquelle on accédait par un escalier de trois marches. Un réchaud "Puritan" fut poussé contre la paroi extérieure, entre les deux portes. Il était un des points d'arrêt de ma mère dans sa circumnavigation domestique.

Les deux autres étant la machine à coudre et le standard téléphonique, où elle pouvait, enfin pensions-nous, se reposer un peu en plantant des fiches en face d'elle dans des trous réservés à cet effet.

Nous venions de quitter Rabat, nos grands-parents, oncles et tantes, et nous les enfants ressentions cruellement cette séparation. Il me semble que nous avons passé le premier été, cantonnés sous la véranda, à tourmenter le chat ou nous livrer à des acrobaties sur la balustrade de bois. Il y avait entre le chalet et l'espace vide qui nous était offert, une limite que nous n'osions franchir, retenus par la vigilance inquiète de ma mère et, plus encore, par la frayeur que nous causaient les explosions de dynamite. Quand le son nasillard de la corne se faisait entendre "Attention ! Une mine" nous rentrions précipitamment.

On remodelait le paysage, Ordre du Secrétaire Général. Place aux maisons. Les masses rocheuses sautaient les unes après les autres. Certaines furent épargnées. On les appela des collines, nos collines. D'autres restèrent à demi éventrées, comme victime d'un bombardement. Les premières pluies d'orage firent apparaître dans leurs anfractuosités, des chatoiements de scabieuses, d'adonis gouttes de sang et ce fut le seul bienfait de la nature à notre égard, cet été-là. Le terrain ayant été ainsi aplani on put tendre des cordeaux, poser des jalons. Sous nos yeux se dessinait un village en pointillés et nous imaginions, ici une épicerie, là un magasin de jouets ou de chaussures.

Nous attendions le soir, pour voir passer les "gens" : une troupe de forçats, auteurs de larcins ou meurtriers, malmenés par les "caporaux", prisonniers sortis du rang, devenus gardes-chiourmes... On les employait à la construction des routes. Je les appelais, paraît-il, les "zorphelines", parce que la toile grise dont ils étaient vêtus, devait me rappeler la blouse des orphelines qui chaque matin à Rabat, faisaient leur entrée en rang dans l'école maternelle de la Tour Hassan. Les Portugais défilaient à leur tour: pantalons de velours côtelé, veste lasse jetée sur l'épaule, chapeaux poussiéreux. Nous leur montrions le poing, leur lancions des injures, à notre grande satisfaction, ils nous injuriaient à leur tour. Enfin! Nous existions!

Irène, qui jusque là, a eu l'écoute exemplaire, éprouve le besoin de s'agiter, se tourne vers Juliette et se met à rire :

- De vrais sauvageons, j'ai peine à vous imaginer ainsi. Juliette, vous ne ressemblez pas à votre enfance. Juliette sourit :«Il en reste toujours quelque chose » « Et moi, alors, quels souvenirs vais-je garder de mon enfance citadine dans un quartier tranquille et dont le béton a quelque chose de définitif. Vont-ils être peuplés de portes, fenêtres, cages d'escaliers et ascenseurs ? ... Cette pensée me déprime. Excusez-moi, je vous ai interrompue... Vous viviez donc en pleine solitude. Mais est-ce qu'il n'y avait pas trois chalets ?

- Allons, leur évocation inévitable pourra-t-elle exorciser l'ancienne douleur ?

- L'un d'eux était l'abri épisodique du médecin, une femme, le Docteur Langlois, je ne me souviens que de son nom. Notre bonne santé la décourageait L'autre…Juliette marque un temps d'arrêt, elle évalue l'obstacle avant de le franchir… l'autre paraissait vide, mais nous savions, sans l'avoir jamais vu, qu'un gardien du pénitencier y vivait ou plutôt y dormait. Un soir, le chalet fut le lieu d'une scène dont nous ne comprîmes pas tout d'abord la signification, mais que notre prescience jugea ignominieuse: des plaintes, des coups sourds, des "a-han" de coupeurs de bois en plein effort... On châtiait un détenu. Il s'était évadé et on l'avait repris. Chacun des "caporaux", à tour de rôle, faisait appel à toutes ses forces pour asséner le coup de nerf de bœuf sur le dos de son compagnon de misère et ces "a-han", porteurs d'une jouissance profonde étaient plus horribles à entendre que les gémissements du supplicié.

Juliette se tait. Souvenir cloué au pilori de sa mémoire, il en suinte encore cette bile noirâtre qui a obscurci les premières années passées à Ifrane.

La femme, les enfants du gardien de prison, un jour, le rejoignirent. Nous nous en écartions comme de pestiférés. Ils portaient sur eux la flétrissure dont nous avions marqué le père.

A nouveau le silence. Si nous avions été d'une génération "télé", habitués à voir défiler des images violentes sur le petit écran je me demande si j'aurais éprouvé un choc aussi profond, aussi durable, je ne connaissais rien alors à la cruauté, pour la première fois, le spectacle m'en était infligé.

Irène proteste :

- Croyez-vous notre sensibilité émoussée ? Pour ma part, ma réaction aurait été la même. Quand vous pensez que je ne peux supporter de voir maltraiter, ne serait-ce qu'un chien, dans la rue…

D'un commun accord, elles se sont levées, ont repris leur promenade.

- Notre vie se réduisait à l'essentiel. Le pain et les autres denrées nous étaient livrés par Monsieur Delépine, un commerçant itinérant. Nous l'attendions comme le Messie. Il arrêtait sa camionnette, dressait la "guitoune", déballait les marchandises. Le soir, quand il avait allumé sa lampe, on voyait se mouvoir sa silhouette pachydermique en ombre chinoise sur la toile de la "guitoune". Il déplaçait les caisses, aménageait une couche. La nuit l'engloutissait. Le lendemain à notre lever, Monsieur Delépine et sa camionnette avaient disparu.

Nous buvions l'eau des sources. Peu à peu nous avions appris à connaître toutes les sources autour du Tizguit, même celles qui sourdent de terre, presque invisibles. Pour l'usage courant nous étions approvisionnés par la "tonne", une grande cuve transportée sur une charrette que tirait un mulet. Le Chef du pénitencier avait mis à notre disposition - ainsi qu'il le fit plus tard, pour les autres fonctionnaires - un forçat. Le premier fut Mekki. Il avait tué sa femme qui le trompait. Où était la faute ? Alors que nous avions sur lui, du moins le croyait-il, tout pouvoir, nous le traitions en être humain, n'avions pour lui que de bonnes paroles. Sa crainte se changea en dévotion. Il mit à notre service, sa force physique qui était grande. Il charriait l'eau de la tonne au chalet. Et il fallait voir avec quelle ardeur joyeuse il arborait des muscles tendus à l'extrême pour arracher du sol une lessiveuse remplie d'eau tiédie au soleil, gravir les trois marches et la poser sur la terrasse. La saison d'hiver nous le rendit encore plus précieux. Il fendait les troncs de chênes, faisait voler en éclats ceux de cèdres…

La neige nous prit au dépourvu. Si ma mère, la Dijonnaise, la reconnut, elle nous plongea, mon père et nous, les enfants, dans une commune admiration. Mon père suivit sa chute moelleuse avec une attention passionnée, nous faisant remarquer la délicatesse précautionneuse et, pour tout dire, féline, avec laquelle les flocons se déposaient les uns sur les autres. Cette contemplation le plongea dans une sorte de léthargie et il finit par s'endormir, la tête sur le guichet. Une douce et étrange lumière chassant l'ombre de chaque coin et recoin, régna en souveraine dans le chalet. La neige avait composé un paysage qui nous était à nouveau devenu étranger.

- Et puis, dit Irène au bout d'un moment pendant lequel elle est restée songeuse, vous avez grandi et le village aussi. C'est une invite à franchir le cercle magique enserrant les trois chalets et à s'avancer au-delà.

- C'est vrai j'ai grandi même temps que le village, et, sensible à la pulsion donnée, Juliette poursuit, mais pas plus que de ma propre croissance, je ne me suis souciée de la sienne. Je la vivais, l'intégrais dans mon vécu, simplement. Le commerce, longtemps réduit à une boulangerie et deux épiceries, l'une tenue par un ancien légionnaire, l'autre par un jeune Juif, à la peau tavelée de taches de son, se diversifia Les magasins dont nous avions rêvé, s'ouvraient les uns après les autres et aussi des hôtels, des restaurants, un café et sa terrasse.

A la manière d'une ménagère avisée qui monte son intérieur, le Secrétaire Général dota Ifrane d'un dispensaire, d'une école, d'un bureau de poste dans lequel, éblouis„ nous aménageâmes. Une église remplaça le chalet où officiait le premier prêtre. Enfin, avec un service de car quotidien, l'eau au robinet, le courant électrique fourni par une usine installée sur un bras du Tizguit, Ifrane eut tout ce qu'il fallait pour devenir un vrai village.

En même temps une population hétéroclite s'y installait, prenait racine, se refermait déjà en microcosme : la Gendarmerie, le pénitencier, le "Timdikine", lieu-dit où on logea dans des bâtiments à étage, ouvriers et employés.

Au sommet de la hiérarchie, le Contrôleur civil. Des habitudes étaient prises, des amitiés naissaient, des rivalités aussi. La "Vigie marocaine " contre "l'Echo du Maroc". La pêche au ver contre la pêche au lancer. Les villas et les chalets s'élevaient, alignés le long des rues, perchés sur les collines ou s'y adossant. Car elles étaient toujours là, ces diablesses de collines. L'ardeur que l'on avait déployée à les démanteler, ralentissait au fur et à mesure que s'espaçaient les visites du Secrétaire Général, et même s'éteignit tout à fait, après son départ pour l'URSS où il avait été nommé Ambassadeur de France. On combla leurs effondrements, la terre végétale faisant en sens inverse le chemin suivi depuis des millénaires, fut remontée de la vallée dans des tombereaux.

Des tilleuls argentés, des acacias, des prunus pissardi furent plantés. Ils provenaient de la pépinière qui avait été créée dès les premiers temps d'Ifrane, sur un élargissement de la vallée. Juliette s'en souvient encore, parce que le premier qui en fut responsable, un homme d'une force herculéenne, disait-on, se pendit dans sa cabane. Ces collines furent, avant que mon frère ne prenne seul sa course pour de lointains vagabondages, notre terrain de jeux. La valériane en touffes roses y fleurissait.

…Mais Juliette avait une tendresse particulière pour une petite plante qui les tapissait. Elle montrait tant de courage à survivre, tirant d'une pincée de terre, une parcelle de vie. Si démunie qu'elle fût, elle entendait affirmer sa personnalité et nettement se définir par une rosette d'écailles brillantes autour d'un cœur duveteux. Sous chaque pierre, une couleuvre, une vipère, un scorpion que nous nous gardions d'importuner. Nous pourchassions le lézard gris qui signe sa fuite d'une queue cabalistique. Mon frère, lui, capturait le gros lézard au dos bleu-vert, au ventre jaune de soufre, dont la gueule refermée, même au bout de la tête coupée, ne lâche plus sa proie.

Les années d'internat m'éloignèrent d'Ifrane. Nos vies se séparèrent. En mon absence, les constructions se multipliaient. Je croisais dans la rue des étrangers.

"IFRANE perle de l'Atlas", devint une station climatique à la mode. Les estivants affluèrent, envahirent notre prairie, vaste espace délimité par une boucle du Tizguit et livrée, en juin, aux frémissements des graminées et des papillons. Des jeunes gens et des jeunes filles, en bandes, animèrent les nuits d'été. Mon village m'échappait.

Arrivèrent les années quarante. De l'incendie qui ravagea l'Europe, ne nous parvinrent que les cendres. La vie du village en fut ralentie, devint celle d'une ruche malade. Les bâtiments des colonies de vacances abritèrent la convalescence des militaires, ceux-ci n'avaient que faire des charmes d'Ifrane. On vit des uniformes errer, mélancoliques, le long des méandres du Tizguit. Ifrane n'était plus qu'un lieu de passage ou d'attente. Je vis apparaître un jour, mon premier Américain ou plutôt sa tête, dans l'embrasure de la fenêtre de la salle à manger. Il avait grimpé le long du mât en haut duquel flottait les jours de fête, le drapeau tricolore. En m'apercevant, il pointa le doigt sur moi et s'écria avec l'accent de triomphe : "A girl ! a girl !"

Mil neuf cent quarante cinq, la paix signée, la France recouvra sa liberté. Les Marocains relevèrent la tête... Pourquoi pas eux ? Il y avait de l'hostilité dans l'air, peut-être à cause de leur regard... Elle nous prépara au départ collectif… L'image de madame Marie-Louise traversa Juliette avec la fugacité d'un météore… Après quelque résistance, il nous fallu leur accorder l'indépendance... Nous devions en envisager toutes les implications. Notre sort allait désormais dépendre de leur bon vouloir, peut-être même de leur libre arbitre... Cette pensée nous fut insupportable. Aux premiers qui partirent nous avions envie de crier "Attendez, nous partons avec vous". Nous avions envie de les suivre et nous les avons suivis !

- Eh bien, lance Irène qui s'est installée au volant de la Renault, en route pour le Val d'Ifrane !

- Je crains, dit Juliette en prenant place à ses côtés, que vous ne soyez déçue. L'herbe sera encore fripée par le gel, et les buissons d'aubépines toutes griffes dehors. D'ailleurs, pour vous, habitantes de lieux humides, qu'est-ce qu'une rivière, sinon une rivière, ni plus ni moins ? Ici, au Maroc, l'eau qui court et qui coule, claire et sans jamais se tarir, est un don de Dieu. Il faut, pour en sentir le prix, l'aborder un jour où, sous un ciel vide et blanc, le village assiégé, résiste, porte et volets clos, à la canicule. Atteindre alors le domaine de l'eau, du clair-obscur, des formes changeantes et furtives. Le velours d'une libellule devient ombre palpitante, le turquoise d'une autre, trouée dans le feuillage. La truite, portée par le courant, un reflet du soleil, même la grosse libellule, l'æschne, dont le vol brutal affirme qu'elle est ce qu'elle est, en s'arrêtant net, devient herbe et eau. Et sur cette apparence de feuille nouvelle-née, le regard exercé délimite le contour d'une rainette. La peau plastifiée, finement tendue sur le modelé délicat du corps en souligne les moindres détails, de la gorge qui bat à la découpe des palmes, aux ventouses de ses doigts, minuscules ballons de baudruche. Et chaque forme ne doit être qu'effleurée du regard, car elle est insaisissable. Ainsi, l'étonnant hygromètre, glisseur infatigable, acrobate fantaisiste, doué de plusieurs vies à la fois, devient dans le creux de la main, un infime amas de filaments épars.

- Vous m'indiquerez les endroits que vous désirez revoir. J'arrêterai la voiture.

Ce brusque rappel à la réalité impose silence à la petite voix intérieure et à son chant lyrique.

- Les trois points d'orgue du parcours sont l'Ile d'Amour dont la végétation furibonde a dû être disciplinée par les jardiniers du Roi, la source "Vittel" et la Cascade des Vierges. Toujours une référence à la France, vous n'y échapperez pas. Au fond, nous aimions Ifrane, parce qu'il représentait un espace français au Maroc. Le climat, la végétation, que beaucoup d'entre nous ne connaissaient que par ouïe-dire, nous confortaient dans cette opinion. Les beautés des environs étaient reconnues, magnifiées dans nos manuels scolaires. Nous étions, sans doute, au Maroc, les seuls écoliers â voir tomber les feuilles rousses des platanes. Mon père, surveillait avec délectation la croissance de ses tilleuls, des "tilleuls comme en France". Il était atteint d'une hypertrophie de son "moi" français, "moi" que d'ailleurs, étant né à Tunis, il s'était forgé de toutes pièces.

Ainsi que Juliette s'y attendait, le Val languit encore sous les rigueurs de l'hiver. Arrêt devant un trou d'eau, souvenir d'anciens pique-niques. A l'abri des remous, sous les frênes, l'eau dort, immobile. Irène admire sa profondeur verte.

- Couleur peppermint, elle me rappelle celle d'un gardon dans les Cévennes.

- J'y ai laissé tomber, un jour, une timbale en argent, marquée à mes initiales. Nous n'avons jamais pu la récupérer. Le trou est trop profond.

Elle se penche, éprouve sous ses doigts le contact d'une eau glacée, paralysante. Sa température restait à peu près constante toute l'année. Les estivants se défiaient de cette eau mal apprivoisée. Elle-même, Juliette, avait vu s'y engloutir la timbale, et jugé mystérieuse sa disparition soudaine. Son regard accroche un rayon de soleil entre les arbres. Si elle pouvait lui insuffler sa volonté, le diriger comme on dirige un rayon laser, il pénétrerait la couche de sédiments sous laquelle est enfouie la timbale, il en titillerait le métal, solliciterait son éclat, clin d'œil, petit salut.

- Je suis là. C'est Irène qui a parlé. Elle était partie en reconnaissance, de cette foulée rapide que Juliette admire.

- La rivière coule à ras bord, le courant est fort, super pour une descente en kayak.

- Plus bas, son cours est encombré d'îlots.

- J'ai fait une rencontre, devinez laquelle ? Une gravité de philosophe, une démarche de Duchesse.

- Je ne donne pas ma langue au chat, c'est une cigogne . Elle et ses congénères nichent dans les peupliers de la Zaouïa. Elles arrivent d'Afrique noire, toujours trop tôt, se laisseront surprendre par les dernières neiges, plusieurs y laisseront la vie.

Irène sourit :

- Tout vous est souvenir, n'est-ce pas?

- C'est vrai, et je mets dans leur recherche une ardeur de chien "truffier"»

La main d'Irène à peine posée sur la clé de contact s'immobilise. Signe d'embarras ou de préoccupation... Le premier. Rien jusqu'ici n'est venu troubler le cours lisse de leur séjour ifranien. La voiture reste sur la ligne de départ. La jeune fille tiraille une de ses boucles d'oreilles. « Qu'est-ce qui vous tracasse, mon petit ?» La question à peine posée, Juliette s'alarme. Si elle allait me demander de reprendre la route pour filer vers un Maroc plus couleur locale, vers le Sud… Et comme la jeune fille se tourne vers elle, hésitante, l'iris embrumé :

- Voyons, Irène, depuis notre arrivée, vous avez montré une complaisance telle que j'en suis confuse. Mais il ne faut pas pousser trop loin votre rôle de demoiselle de compagnie, vous n'êtes pas à mon service, et si vous avez un désir à exprimer, allez-y... vous voulez écourter votre séjour…

Irène se récrie qu'il n'en est pas question, elle n'est pas pour un survol rapide des endroits visités, préfère s'y attarder, ils perdent leur apparence de carte postale, y gagnent en épaisseur :

- Vous voyez ce que je veux dire ?

Juliette est rassurée sur ce point.

- Mais alors, quoi ?

- Vous ne voulez pas d'une demoiselle de compagnie, dites-vous, mais si je vous proposais un compagnon de voyage…

- Vous me prenez au dépourvu. Juliette reste interdite. Où le dénicherez-vous ?

- C'est un camarade de faculté. Il ne demandera pas mieux que de se joindre à nous Petite cachottière ! Et moi qui croyais en l'innocence de son regard. Irène devine le jugement porté sur elle et se hâte d'ajouter :

- Rien de préconçu de ma part, je vous l'assure. L'idée m'en est venue peu à peu, au déroulement agréable du voyage.

- Où est-il en ce moment ?

- Il passe ses vacances à Kénitra dans sa famille. Sa mère est française, des Cévennes, je crois. Son père est marocain. Irène s'interrompt, soudain consciente que cette dernière précision peut constituer un obstacle au projet. Vous n'y voyez toujours pas d'inconvénient ? Ton, où se mêlent à la fois le défi et la prière, il est celui de sa fille lorsqu'elle sollicite un accord qu'elle sait difficile à obtenir. Soit, elle l'obtiendra, cet accord. D'ailleurs l'essentiel n'est-il pas de rester à Ifrane ?

- Aucun inconvénient, si vous jugez ce garçon sympathique.

Un "camarade", Karim ? Voire ! Irène, pour l'accueillir, arbore une iris dont tout le gris a disparu et elle a eu hier, en courant au bureau de postes, le pied ailé. Cependant les retrouvailles sont cordiales, sans plus. "Salut ", "salut" Aucun laisser-aller dans leur attitude. Soit ! Juliette respectera cette discrétion Elle n'en est pas moins curieuse de savoir jusqu'où vont leurs relations et s'ils oseront ce soir, partager la même chambre. Karim a l'œil vif, mobile et gai, des traits réguliers. Juliette apprécie sa musculature. "C'est un costaud !" Même si l'arrondi des biceps préfigure l'embonpoint d'un Karim quadragénaire. Son teint mat est celui d'un garçon habitué aux sports de plein air. Juliette conclut qu'il ne doit pas être difficile à une jeune fille d'en tomber amoureuse. Il semble que le déroulement agréable du voyage, selon l'expression d'Irène subisse un changement de rythme.

- Comment, s'écrie Karim, vous n'êtes pas descendues au "Tourtit" ? Mon père me l'a recommandé, c'est un hôtel trois étoiles. L'hôtel Tourtit ? Juliette ne connaît pas

- Je vous aide à boucler les valises et on déménage, vite fait ! L'arrivée de Karim ? Celle d'un trublion. Ayant trouvé chez la jeune fille une auditrice complaisante, Juliette a pris l'habitude de s'épancher, de déverser librement le trop-plein de sa mémoire. La présence du jeune marocain va l'obliger à plus de circonspection. Supportera-t-il de bonne grâce, la main-mise qu'elle affiche sur ce territoire à coups de souvenirs ? Je lui abandonne le village et ses portes fermées, elles ne s'ouvriront plus pour moi. Mais la nature, elle, demeure inchangée, je la retrouve telle qu'elle était. Nous nous sommes reconnues. Elle est mienne par droit d'aînesse. Avant lui, j'ai foulé le sol de mes pieds nus, et assez longtemps pour qu'en me retirant, je me sente dépossédée.

L'hôtel Tourtit se veut luxueux, il est bâti sur la rive droite du Tizguit, derrière la prairie. Le hall d'accueil est de belles dimensions. Un couple est installé au bar. Juliette le devine étranger, un rien dans la mise, l'aspect physique. Aux sonorités gutturales de quelques paroles échangées, elle reconnaît des Allemands

Irène et Karim ont découvert la salle de jeux. Génial ! Juliette amusée, les regarde s'affronter autour d'un baby-foot. Irène y met une ardeur combative qui rappelle à Juliette le changement expéditif du pneu au sortir de Casablanca Elle ne quitte la salle, qu'après avoir tiré de chaque machine, en la brutalisant, des cliquetis, couinements et autres bruits incongrus. Karim a l'air content de sa partenaire. D'une main amicale, il lui ébouriffe les cheveux : "Cette petite tête !".

La salle à manger, dans sa solitude, paraît encore plus vaste . Les Allemands ont jeté l'ancre à l'autre extrémité. Leur présence ne se manifeste qu'en murmures, et tintements de fourchettes.

- Il paraît, Madame Aubert, dit Karim en s'asseyant, que votre séjour à Ifrane n'est pas le fait du hasard, le choix d'une touriste... C'est un retour aux sources, en quelque sorte. Vous êtes native du pays.

- Presque, j'avais cinq ans lorsque mes parents sont venus s'y installer.

- Eh bien, vous me donnez l'occasion de découvrir le Moyen-Atlas, je vous en remercie.

- Pas possible ! Vous ne connaissiez pas Ifrane ? Karim se met à rire :

- Vous semblez scandalisée. Je vous donne une piètre idée du Marocain que je suis.

Juliette est décontenancée, l'adversaire se dérobe.

- Je passe habituellement les fêtes de Noël à l'Ouka[1] et l'été je fréquente les plages de l'Atlantique. Quand je ne suis pas dans les Cévennes. Juliette le dévisage avec intérêt. Il n'observe pas le jeûne. Le Cévenol qui est en lui mange même de fort bon appétit Elle prend alors conscience qu'elle a devant elle, un être hybride, un pied en France, l'autre au Maroc. Quand elle le connaîtra mieux elle se risquera à lui demander comment il vit cette position inconfortable.

- Je connais Ifrane de réputation, le Roi y a sa résidence d'été. De cette résidence, son interlocutrice s'empare aussitôt.

- Je l'ai visitée avant même qu'elle ne soit terminée. J'ai pu admirer le luxe des mosaïques, la finesse du stuc travaillé. Elle a été inaugurée en mil neuf cent quarante deux. Les tribus berbères accourues, s'étaient rassemblées en signe d'allégeance envers leur Souverain. Pour la première fois, elles se reconnaissaient en lui.

Juliette est mue par une impulsion soudaine, elle va, chez ce Karim inattendu, réveiller, faire vibrer la fibre marocaine. Et d'évoquer avec complaisance le déploiement dans la Prairie des brunes "khaïmas"[1] devant lesquelles s'affairaient les femmes. Leurs gestes s'accompagnant du tintement des lourds bracelets d'argent. Leurs robes aux teintes pourpre et safran, assourdies par la transparence d'une tunique tissée de fils de soie. Les enfants jouent alentour et jusque sous les pattes des chevaux qui semblent avoir été entravés à seule fin de faire scintiller au soleil leur harnachement d'or et d'argent.

Les allers et venues des hommes d'une khaïma à l'autre, la lente procession jusqu'à la tente caïdale, dressée en haut d'une colline d'où s'élancera, pour une ardente fantasia, le galop des cavaliers. Au fond de la salle, les deux Allemands, la tête levée, écoutent... Et Karim, a-t-elle réussi auprès de lui ? Karim, l'air amusé, lui adresse un sourire appuyé. C'est elle, Juliette, qui l'intéresse, ou plutôt, ce qu'il doit nommer en son for intérieur, le "cas Juliette Aubert "

- Que d'images perdues, soupire Irène, dommage, Karim que tu n'aies pu assister à cette fête, tu l'aurais filmée avec ton caméscope. Juliette néglige l'interruption :

- La journée s'avançant, éclate alors le son des "bendirs"(tambourins), et des "raïtas"[2], tambourinements et stridences mêlés. Les danseurs prennent place pour le "haïdous". Visages sans regard, lèvres scellées. Peut-on appeler danse cette agitation spasmodique de corps privés de conscience, livrés au seul rythme des da-da-doum, da-da-boum, da-da doum que traverse le filet aigre des raïtas. Les jambes sont fléchies, les mains tendues, paumes offertes... Imaginez un immense anneau qui oscille... la musique se poursuit avec une inflexibilité lancinante. Le temps est aboli, quelquefois, l'un des danseurs, homme ou femme s'écroule, l'écume aux lèvres...

- Dommage, soupire derechef Irène. Il ne reste de cette fête d'autres traces que celles laissées dans les mémoires. Tape amicale sur le front de Juliette, dans une mémoire, la vôtre !

[2] raïta :clarinette, sueur des bombardes bretonnes

- Les images recueillies par un appareil, auraient-elles donné une idée de la foule dans sa mouvance, son déploiement harmonieux, une idée du moelleux, de l'ampleur des étoffes, accompagnant ou prolongeant les gestes, faisant de chaque Berbère un être en majesté.

Et les visages, je ne vous ai pas parlé des visages. L'ossature apparente souligne des traits si caractéristiques. Les pommettes sont hautes, le nez droit ou busqué, mais toujours noble. Les femmes ignorent le port du voile. Jeunes, elles sont belles avec leurs joues et leurs lèvres pleines, la rondeur de leur menton soulignée d'arabesques bleues. Ils semblent tous issus de la même famille, comme si la nature, satisfaite de son oeuvre, s'en était contentée une fois pour toutes, sans pousser plus loin son effort d'imagination.

La fête a duré huit jours...

Juliette n'ira pas jusqu'au bout de son récit, taira le matin du huitième jour, lorsque les Ifraniens retrouvèrent leur Prairie. Il ne restait de l'occupation berbère que quelques pierres calcinées, du crottin de cheval et de grands pans d'herbe froissée. Ils levèrent la tête... là-haut, le palais du Sultan. Pour la première fois, ils pressentirent, dans cette position dominante, quelque chose de menaçant.

16

Juliette a eu un moment d'humeur. Karim ne s'est laissé tenter par une promenade en forêt que contre la promesse qu'on apercevrait des singes dans les cèdres.

- Si nous pouvions surprendre leurs ébats, j'en tirerais avec mon appareil un film intéressant.

Il a trouvé une excellente occasion d'utiliser le caméscope, de jouer avec. Irène s'est munie d'une paire de jumelles et Juliette se charge de l'appareil photo. Dans le hall, ils ont croisé les Allemands harnachés de la même façon, ils se sont salués d'un air de connivence, en gens goûtant les mêmes plaisirs.

- Ces singes sont des magots laineux. Depuis que les panthères ont disparu, ils n'ont plus de prédateurs et ont dû proliférer.

- Vous connaissez bien la faune de la région...

- Il fut un temps, oui... j'ai eu l'enfance vagabonde. Voix de sa mère : "Rémi-Juliette-Aline ". Les trois enfants réunis sous le même vocable. L'appel reste sans réponse. La fenêtre se referme. Un sanglot de fillette éclate au plus profond d'elle-même, est vite réprimé, poisson qui se débat dans une nasse et monte, inerte à la surface. Juliette soupire :

- Je connais la flore aussi, mon père herborisait. Il envoyait à l'Institut scientifique chérifien, les spécimens dignes d'intérêt. Ce pouvait être une tulipe de Darwin délicatement parfumée ou une truffe. Notre découverte la plus inattendue : des pieds de pivoine sous un cèdre.

- Des pivoines, remarque Irène, j'en ai trouvé en Grèce, dans la montagne... Le ton est neutre.

Pour vous la rencontre fut anodine. Pour nous elle fut un émerveillement… nous les avons crues vestiges d'un parc abandonné. Les fleurs rouge-violacé, s'élevaient au-dessus d'un feuillage en bouquet.

Elle retrouve dans toute sa fraîcheur l'impression première. Chacune d'elles n'était pas seulement un ensemble de pétales opulents, enserré par une verte collerette, elle était aussi une frange d'étamines aux anthères si lourdes d'un pollen soyeux que l'on s'étonnait de ne pas les entendre bruire sous les doigts. Elle était encore un pistil séparé en deux languettes courbes, extrémités élégantes pour babouches lilliputiennes.

Elle s'est installée à l'arrière de la Lancia, elle a sous les yeux la nuque du conducteur, une nuque dont l'arrondi est bien modelé, il s'en dégage la discrète senteur d'une coûteuse eau de toilette. La coupe de cheveux est soignée. Important, la nuque chez un homme. Elle le classe, fait partie de son "look", comme on dit aujourd'hui... La voiture file entre les cèdres à gauche et la plaine du Koudiat à droite. Juliette la réintègre dans sa mémoire, avec son éparpillement de pierres grêlées projetées, parle volcan en d'anciennes colères. Karim trouve à son relief de la douceur. « Le sein d'une femme endormie... » Juliette réprime un sourire, l'amoureux qui sommeille en lui, montre le bout de son nez. Cette heureuse disposition d'esprit change lorsque la voiture doit quitter la route pour s'engager sur la piste qui traverse la grande forêt de cèdres entre Ifrane et Azrou. Il grogne, parce qu'un premier cahot malmène la Lancia. Il éprouve pour sa voiture, sa "tire", une tendresse d'amant, lui prodigue les attentions bien apparentes celles-là.*

Irène baisse la vitre.

- Superbe ! une forêt-cathédrale. Jamais comparaison ne m'a paru plus juste. Les cèdres en forment les colonnes et la voûte... une cathédrale toute pénétrée de lumière. Rien à voir avec une sapinière... vous avez déjà pénétré dans une sapinière ? c'est oppressant... Et Karim, comme se parlant à lui-même :

- Dans les Cévennes, les châtaigniers sont atteints d'une maladie qui les fait périr les uns après les autres.

C'est un hommage rendu par le biais à la vigueur des cèdres environnants. Juliette est comblée. Aucune note discordante. Elle redécouvre sa forêt en bonne santé, l'attribue à son isolement.

- Les Berbères ne fréquentent pas la forêt, ils s'y sentent mal à l'aise, craignent de rencontrer Aicha Kandicha, la sorcière. Elle attend de Karim, un commentaire. Mais l'a-t-il entendue ? Il vient d'éviter de justesse une grosse racine qui se tord, reptilienne, en travers de la route, et il jure tout bas.

Sur une injonction de Juliette, la Lancia stoppe brusquement…

- Le cèdre Gouraud, je l'avais oublié. Pour un peu on le dépassait.

Le géant s'élève au milieu d'un espace déboisé, assez vaste pour que ses branches puissent en toute liberté déployer leur envergure.

Il faut huit hommes, pour en faire le tour. Une plaque désigne son identité. La portait-il autrefois ? De quelle manière ce jeune Marocain, mâtiné de Français, réagira-t-il ? Le nom du général Gouraud le rapprochera-t-il de sa mère ou au contraire, éveillant son hostilité, le poussera-t-il vers son père ?

Ah ! s'exclame-t-il, je suppose que devant ce superbe spécimen de la gent arboricole, le Général a soulevé sa célèbre casquette...

- Dis donc, proteste Irène, tu confonds avec le général Bugeaud.

- Excusez-moi, je m'y perds dans cette cohorte de généraux.

Il s'en tire par la raillerie. Juliette fait poser les deux jeunes gens devant le cèdre.

- Pour la photo souvenir. Puis Karim s'empare de l'appareil. Au tour de Juliette et d'Irène et tandis qu'il cherche à centrer leur image dans le viseur :

- Vous savez, Juliette, que le jour de mon arrivée, je vous ai prise pour la sœur aînée d'Irène.

Compliment pris à la légère, don poids plume qui vous permet de considérer l'existence et votre aspect dans la glace avec plus d'optimisme (cheveux châtain doré grâce à l'artifice du coiffeur, silhouette mince, elle peut encore faire illusion).

A quelques pas de là, deux indigènes se tiennent devant un étal où sont alignés quelques minéraux. Comme écrasés par la majesté des lieux, conscients de n'y participer en rien, ils ne bougent ni pieds, ni pattes, à peine s'ils osent respirer.

Irène s'est engagée dans la forêt.

- Je pars en reconnaissance, crie-t-elle, est-ce que vous me suivez ?

- Allez, allez, dit Juliette, je préfère rester sous mon arbre, et puis j'ai l'intention de choisir quelques pierres, je prendrai mon temps. Et à Karim qui s'éloigne à son tour :

- Ne vous écartez pas trop, avez-vous au moins le sens de l'orientation ?

- Soyez tranquille, nous ne nous égarerons pas, d'ailleurs, il n'est pas question de vous abandonner longtemps.

Il renverse les rôles, c'est lui qui se veut protecteur et il ajoute en montrant les deux indigènes :

- Ils vous ont vu venir, discutez le prix.

Oui, elle a bien l'intention de discuter le prix, mais pour le seul plaisir d'une palabre. Elle réutilisera avec bonheur quelques mots d'arabe. Elle leur donnera ce qu'ils demanderont. Ils ne portent pas la djellaba citadine. La leur, de laine épaisse, est celle des montagnards berbères. Ils ont trouvé dans ce commerce improvisé, un moyen d'échapper à leur état de berger. Ont-ils gagné à cette reconversion ?

Elle examine les pierres une à une. La plupart sont des améthystes Elle les reconnaît pour en avoir trouvé dans les ravins de Bensmine, lorsqu'elle accompagnait son père à la chasse. Elle remplissait le sac à dos de bombes volcaniques. Fracassées à coups de marteau, elles livraient parfois un cœur d'améthyste. Hélas, celles-ci ont été fractionnées, multipliées, pour en faciliter la vente. Elle en choisit plusieurs parmi les plus importantes. Les deux berbères ont mis une grande célérité à enfouir le produit de la vente dans les profondeurs du burnous, puis, estimant sans doute avoir gagné leur journée, s'escamotent à sa vue. L'étal reste vide. Juliette est seule. Elle a rangé ses acquisitions dans son sac, y ajoute, ramassé à terre, un éclat de ce bois qu'elle pourrait décrire les yeux fermés : des fibres longues, légères et tendres , sève et résine mêlées les ont imprégnées d'une essence odorante, couleur de soleil couchant, entre le rose et l'orange. Autour d'elle un épais silence. Un silence si total qu'on entendrait choir, sous les cèdres, une aiguille. Pas un souffle d'air. Le vent ici n'a pas droit de cité. Et soudain, elle se croit transportée dans un monde enchanté où on assiste, sans surprise, à la transgression des lois régissant le règne végétal. De l'autre côté de la piste, des branches se balancent, il y a du caprice, de la fantaisie, dans leurs mouvements. L'agitation gagne de proche en proche. les troncs eux-mêmes perdent leur rigidité, montrent des muscles, les font jouer, se mesurent les uns aux autres. En même temps que Juliette comprend, elle les voit. "Les singes ! " Des groupes, des grappes de singes ont investi les arbres. Une incorporation parfaite à leur habitat naturel les rendait invisibles. Maintenant, ils se détachent des branches, des troncs, traversent la piste, la main tendue. D'abord des mâles, puis les femelles alourdies par le port des petits et tout en protubérances. Juliette n'a pas le temps d'esquisser un geste que déjà conscients de leur témérité, pris de panique, ils s'enfuient.

Juliette n'est pas au bout de ses surprises. Karim et Irène réapparaissent, graves et silencieux. Ils avancent main dans la main. Leurs regards ignorent celui de Juliette. Sur le front de Karim, une mèche rebelle qui en dit long. Juliette a compris... Ils viennent de s'aimer...Ils ont fait l'amour, peut-être pour la première fois, sous les cèdres... sous les cèdres ? Ils sont absous. Et de sa voix la plus naturelle :

- J'ai reçu une visite... Les magots laineux, vous les avez effrayés…

Karim fait un geste vague de la main...

J'ai oublié mon appareil dans la voiture, mais rien n'est perdu, ils reviendront.

Irène passe devant elle, va s'asseoir au pied du cèdre. A Karim qui la suit, elle tend la main, l'attire, jusqu'à' ce qu'il vienne s'allonger et lorsqu'il pose sur son ventre, sa tête lourde et, possessive, elle tressaille.

Puis ils ne bougent plus. Leur immobilité impose silence à Juliette. Elle s'en veut de le laisser s'éterniser. Elle a l'impression amère que ses paroles ne les atteindraient pas Enfin, Karim se soulève à demi, et prenant conscience qu'une ombre insidieuse a gagné la forêt se tourne vers Juliette, l'invite à les rejoindre.

- C'est l'heure, dit-il, de Lalla Kandicha[1]

- J'ai, dit Juliette en posant sa tasse de café qu'elle vient d'achever, un oncle Robert qui a soixante quinze ans. A cet oncle, que j'aime beaucoup j'ai fait une promesse, celle d'aller à Sidi-Brahim. Ce n'est pas loin, deux kilomètres de piste après la Zaouia. Je n'ai, d'ailleurs, jamais su comment mon oncle, propriétaire à Rabat, d'un magasin de cycles, avait découvert ce coin négligé des touristes. Peut-être au cours d'une partie de pêche. Il pratiquait la pêche au lancer, c'est à dire qu'il courait comme un dératé le long de la rivière, sa ligne appâtée le suivait au fil du courant. Il ne s'arrêtait que pour décrocher une truite et amorcer de nouveau. C"est ainsi qu'il dut atteindre Sidi-Brahim. Il ne pouvait aller plus loin. Là, en effet, s'achève le cours du Tizguit, commencé au pied du Tizi N'tretten. Redevenu oued, il est spolié d'une partie de ses eaux par une "séguia"[2]. Les autres disparaissent dans les effondrements, les fissures de son lit.

Sans la présence de mon oncle Robert et la tribu des Aït Our'tindi, l'endroit aurait paru de prime abord aussi triste qu'une fin de vie. Tel ne fut pas le sentiment de l'oncle Robert. Au-delà du Tizguit, s'étendait le territoire des Ait Our'tindi, un espace encombré de bombes volcaniques, les mêmes qui jonchaient la plaine du Koudiat et sous lesquelles mon oncle devina une terre riche et vierge. Les Berbères ignorants, possédaient un filon qu'il convenait d'exploiter. La passion de planter, d'un seul coup, s'empara de l'oncle. Il se fit arboriculteur.

Que sont devenus ses arbres ? Si vous m'accompagnez à Sidi-Brahim je pourrai répondre à cette question et en même temps, je vous invite à découvrir la vie berbère du Moyen-Atlas.

Cette proposition ne provoqua chez Karim aucun enthousiasme. Irène s'indigna :

- Honte à toi, Karim. Il s'agit de ton peuple.

- Je n'ai pour le bled marocain, aucune affectivité particulière, je l'avoue, je l'avoue...

- Vous ne connaissez du Maroc que la vie citadine. Vous n'êtes pas curieux de découvrir sous cette couche superficielle, la strate plus profonde dont vous tirez vos origines ?

- Il me semble que j'entends ma mère, c'est la même chanson, en foi de quoi je suis tenu de faire un séjour au moins une fois l'an, chez ma grand-mère. Elle habite une petite ferme près de St. Jean du Gard. Je m'y plais, d'ailleurs, même si je suis voué à la marmite de châtaignes et au café bouilli. Il ne me déplaît pas non plus de l'aider à laver la vaisselle sur une pierre d'évier avec de l'eau pompée au puits... Je ne suis pas, comme vous le croyez, un inconditionnel de la ville. Les Ait Our'tindi poussent encore plus loin la simplicité, sans pour autant ressembler aux paysans de Le Nain. Ils sont autres. Est-ce le fait de passer leur vie entre ciel et terre ? Ils ont le geste libre et aisé. La main tendue, toujours, non pour quémander, mais pour offrir. Ils possèdent peu et ce peu ils le laissent filer entre leurs doigts dédaigneux. Point de mur autour d'eux, ni de toit sur la tête, non plus de porte close entre le dehors et le dedans, seulement la frontière mouvante d'une tenture rabattue. Leurs Dieux lares se contentent de l'abri précaire d'une khaïma. Si elle est vite roulée, transportée à dos d'âne, de mulet, ici ou là, selon les saisons, l'humeur du temps, l'herbe qui pousse, elle est aussi vite dressée, soutenue par deux mât auxquels on accroche la baratte rudimentaire, l'outre en peau de chèvre. Les rapports humains étant, dans leur vie, essentiels, l'étranger qui passe est accueilli, honoré d'un verre de thé à la menthe, que l'on prépare avec une lenteur voulue, le temps de tisser des liens de reconnaissance, d'alliance, voire d'amitié.

Pour l'hôte, les femmes préparent la "Hartita", pâte légèrement salée faite de farine et de blanc d'œuf, cuite sur un plat d'argile, elle se transforme en galettes croustillantes.

Dans un coin, une vieille file… c'est ainsi, occupée à cette tâche, que j'ai vu pour la première fois la vieille Itô. Une de ses jambes repliée sous elle, l'autre contre laquelle s'appuyait le fuseau, à demi dressée, était aussi sèche que le bois de l'outil et son genou dénudé avait le poli du vertillon de pierre. Dans la masse floconneuse qui s'écoulait peu à peu, on voyait courir l'ombre noire de ses doigts. Chaque fois qu'elle donnait au fuseau une impulsion nouvelle, elle nous lançait le regard fauve de ses yeux d'oiseau de proie, regard qui devait s'adoucir avec la fréquence des séjours de mon oncle auprès des Ait Our'tindi.

Aïcha était sa fille, Raho, son gendre, tous deux étaient au service de mon oncle. Aïcha... geste de servante, port de reine... gracieuse était la courbe de sa joue et celle du menton fleuri d'arabesques bleues. Elle s'acquittait chez lui de toutes les tâches domestiques et de bien d'autres encore, laisse-t-on entendre dans la famille. Raho piochait autour des arbres. Il avait le regard doux, le sourire bienveillant...

Je voudrais les revoir, savoir se qu'ils sont devenus, leur destin ne m'est pas indifférent... ne vous croyez pas obligés de m'accompagner... que de fois ai-je marché ou couru, seule jusqu'à Sidi Brahim. Il lui semble que son corps soit repris de la même impatience

- Il n'en est pas question. Nous irons avec vous. Aucun problème. D'ailleurs vous avez fait une promesse, nous vous aiderons à la tenir.

Karim continue d'assumer son rôle protecteur auquel Juliette se plie volontiers. Leurs rapports en sont facilités et se transformeraient même, si leurs relations devaient se prolonger en une affection réciproque.

- Quant à moi, Irène se lève d'un bond, pour le Maroc profond, je suis partante.»

Juliette va chercher très loin sa respiration. Elle ne trouve pas de mots pour exprimer sa déconvenue. Aucune trace de verger... les arbres ont disparu. Plus d'une centaine. La maison de l'oncle Robert a été démantelée. Seul demeure encore l'enclos du vieux verger. On l'appelait ainsi parce qu'il avait été planté le premier. Limité par une haie d'épines, il s'allongeait entre la séguia et la piste. Par quel miracle est-il demeuré un cerisier, faisant figure de relique. Est-ce le cerisier de Sefrou ? Elle l'aurait reconnu. Il avait un feuillage gracile qui gardait, même en été, un vert printanier, contrastant avec la vigueur de ses fruits, dont le jus sirupeux, d'un noir d'encre, tachait les doigts. C'est vers lui qu'elle se dirigeait en premier quand elle pénétrait à l'aube dans le verger avant que les cueilleurs ne s'en emparent. Une poussière douce et froide coulait sous ses pieds nus. Serait-ce alors un des bigarreaux tigrés, un cœur de pigeon, un "Ramon Oliva" ? D'autres noms lui reviennent en mémoire. Que sont devenus les pommiers "Winter banana", et "Grand Alexandre" , les reines-claude et les mirabelliers, les abricotiers "Luizet" et "Royal", les poiriers ... l'oncle Robert aimait à les énumérer. Chacun d'eux était pour lui un titre de gloire. Ils n'ont pu survivre, elle le devine, à la sécheresse, aux cueillettes hâtives, aux divagations des animaux. Les Berbères, par indifférence, négligence, les ont laissés lentement mourir. Pauvre oncle Robert, qui voyait les vergers se multiplier et la vallée, devenue corne d'abondance, perpétuer sa louange. Elle aurait aimé poser sur ses genoux d'invalide des photographies qui auraient concrétisé ses rêves…

Au bout de l'enclos, son regard découvre soudain la bicoque de Raho : " Tiens, un mazet !" s'écrient Irène et Karim avec un tel ensemble qu'ils éclatent de rire. Ils sont légers, heureux, hors d'atteinte, ignorent l'étendue des dommages et de sa déception.

- C'est mon oncle qui l'a fait construire pour Raho et sa famille. Une femme qui n'est pas Aïcha se montre à la porte, mais en les apercevant, rentre avec la précipitation d'une fourmi affolée. Mue par une impulsion contraire, une fillette s'avance hardiment, l'air moqueur. Ils la trouveront derrière eux, attachée à leurs pas pendant leurs pérégrinations.

Pas une khaïma en vue. Le regard bute sur des roches arrondies en dos de tortues géantes. Troupeau inamovible que Juliette retrouve avec un certain attendrissement. Les Aït Our'tindi seraient des semi-nomades, ne sont pas au rendez-vous, elle doit en convenir. Ils n'ont pas encore quitté Sidi Abderrahman où ils prennent leurs quartiers d'hiver. Ont-ils craint pour leurs bêtes, la traîtrise d'une dernière neige ? Elle pointe le doigt vers un lointain vague : "Là-bas c'est Sidi Abderrahman !" Comme si une borne limitait leur parcours, les promeneurs s'arrêtent. A droite, une dernière colline sanctifiée par un marabout, à gauche un dernier bouquet de frênes bordant le Tizguit asséché annoncent la fin d'un paysage. Un autre commence, fait d'une étendue caillouteuse. Une piste qui s'y enfonce, et s'y perd, en souligne la vastitude.

- Autrefois, à Pâques, quand mon oncle ayant bouclé pour six mois le magasin de cycles, arrivait, il trouvait, déjà installés, le douar et son monde familier. Raho avait quitté sa maison et rejoint les siens, sa khaïma s'accrochait au flanc de la colline, près du marabout. Les autres s'éparpillaient ou recherchaient la promiscuité selon une logique qui leur était propre. Elles étaient entourées de chiens vociférant, de poules véloces. Entre les pierres, la terre égratignée recevait les semences d'orge et de maïs. Les femmes aux hanches paresseuses vaquaient à des occupations qui n'en finissaient pas. Sous la khaïma, les hommes palabraient. Le gros du troupeau communal étant parti en transhumance. On gardait pour les festins rituels quelques bêtes dont un jeune berger, adossé à une roche et tricotant une " taghirouine"[1] surveillait l'errance

- Pour l'instant, remarque Karim, il n'y a pas un chat. Est-ce que vous vous rendez compte, Juliette, que les années ont passé ? Vous croyez que votre tribu est restée figée dans les mêmes habitudes ? Vous m'étonnez... elle a peut-être disparu. Les vieux sont morts, les jeunes, comme tous les fils de blédards du monde ont rejoint la ville. D'ailleurs comment peut-on vivre dans un endroit pareil ? Cette terre ne porte aucune trace de travaux humains.

- Et pourtant, ils y vivaient…

- Dites plutôt qu'ils survivaient… "Ils survivaient ". Ces mots frappent Juliette, éveillent un doute qu'elle portait en elle et qui ne demande qu'à se faire jour. Elle reconnaît qu'on entendait autour des khaïmas plus d'abois de chiens que de cris d'enfants. La tribu des Aït Our'tindi était-elle sur son déclin ? A bout de souffle ?... Aïcha et Raho n'avaient qu'un fils, et Aziza la sœur d'Aïcha suscitait déjà l'inquiétude de sa mère.

- Cette enfant, disait-elle, est d'une minceur telle que l'on s'étonne de ne pas voir glisser le long de son corps sa robe de cotonnade sale…Le petit Moha… elle ne se rappelait pas l'avoir vu grandir... Il lui était apparu devant la khaïma le jour où elle-même venait de pénétrer pour la première fois. A demi-nu, le ventre rond, la bouche encore modelée par le sein maternel... ses petits pieds étaient chaussés de babouches brodées, ces babouches berbères aussi souples que des mocassins et prolongées à l'arrière par une languette soutenant la cheville.

Lui était resté interdit devant les visages étrangers. Sans répondre aux tendres appels de son père, il s'était réfugié dans le giron de la vieille Ito qui l'avait caché sous un pan de sa "handira"[2].

- Je ne me suis jamais souciée de la précarité de leur vie, non par indifférence, mais parce que je portais sur cette vie, un jugement positif. Elle était paisible, faite de gestes essentiels et, pour tout dire, proche de l'enfance. On en apercevait facilement les tenants et les aboutissants. Si j'avais dû établir une échelle de valeurs entre les miens et les Aït Our'tindi, ces derniers ne se seraient pas trouvés en position d'infériorité, et il ne m'aurait pas semblé injuste de naître et de vivre sous la khaïma.

Mon oncle ne me suivait pas sur ce terrain. Il voulait ménager aux indigènes un meilleur avenir. Il s'était mis en tête de leur enseigner l'arboriculture. Raho, pour lequel il éprouvait de l'amitié, serait le premier initié. Mais quand vint l'époque de la taille, Raho arrêta le bras armé du sécateur et avec des accents pathétiques :

- Arrête, M'sio Robert, ne détruis pas l'œuvre de Dieu ! Raho était le chantre de la tribu. "Il ne comprend pas, s'indignait, mon oncle, que loin de détruire l'œuvre du Créateur, je la magnifie !"

Les Aït Our'tindi étaient donc restés indéfectiblement attachés à l'élevage du mouton, méprisant même la petite communauté arabe de la Zaouïa qui, en vendant à Ifrane les produits de ses jardins, s'enrichissait.

Accrochée à son territoire, sans jamais s'y enraciner, mettant ses pas dans les pas des ancêtres, perpétuant leurs gestes, la tribu continua de mener une vie parallèle à celle des Roumis", et lorsque Raho piochait autour des arbres, vêtu d'une cotte dépenaillée qui le transformait en paysan du moyen âge, à quoi pensait-il en voyant s'éloigner les siens, vers Sidi Abderrahman, une fois l'automne venu. Se sentait-il privilégié ou attaché aux arbres, comme une chèvre à son piquet ? La maladie de mon oncle, son départ, lui ont rendu la liberté.

- Alors Irène, jetant un regard sur l'horizon vide :

- Il serait intéressant de retrouver leurs traces, suivre leur évolution. Vous nous en donnez une idée superficielle. Une vie à l'état brut, c'est un peu simpliste. Leur communauté devait connaître des règles de vie... des contraintes, des interdits. Il faudrait retrouver leurs mythes et leurs rites... Bon sujet de thèse pour un étudiant en sociologie... »

Karim semble approuver.

- Et vous, Juliette, vous veniez souvent à Sidi Brahim ? Le ton est incrédule. Le paysage, Juliette en est consciente aujourd'hui, est sans grâce, ni beautés naturelles. On n'y trouve pas non plus cet agencement harmonieux, courbes et plats, bosquets et cultures, résultat d'un équilibre entre l'effort séculaire de l'homme et la résistance de la nature.. Elle n'était pas si exigeante autrefois ou plutôt, elle avait d'autres exigences...

Je courais vers la liberté. Le temps n'était plus celui de l'internat, de la maison, ridiculement émietté en heures, minutes, secondes. Il était vague et diffus, s'écoulait en images et sons. J'y puisais, à volonté, des moments d'une durée indéterminée. Je me donnais le droit, la nuit, d'être alerte et insomniaque. Mais j'aimais l'aube aussi...

Elle a passé la nuit chez son oncle, qui a dressé pour elle un lit de camp, dans la petite cuisine. Dehors, un ciel immense, transparent, se colore de rose à l'est. L'air est léger. Sous la lumière rasante, les ombres projetées par les roches, les touffes de chardon s'impriment sur le sol avec une délicate précision et donnent au paysage un relief qui correspond à la netteté des sons : appels d'un berger, abois rauques et, tout proches, les petits cris brefs du traquet-moteux courant au ras du sol. Le toupet blanc qui emplume son croupion se soulève de-ci, de-là, avec la vivacité d'un feu follet.

- Je me laissais aller à l'engourdissement de la méridienne et je m'endormais dans le vibrato intense des courtilières. Je revendiquais le droit à la flânerie, au vagabondage. Mais pour vous deux, ô éléments d'une jeunesse où la maîtrise du geste est essentielle, ces mots ont-ils encore un sens ? L'action dirigée, jamais gratuite, n'est-ce pas ? La neige n'est plus que skiable, et je dis : rivière, vous pensez canoë ou dinghy. Si je dis ciel… avion à piloter. Un chemin vicinal devient espoir de route carrossable pour un cent trente à l'heure...

- J'en conviens, j'en conviens, l'interrompt Irène. En tout nous recherchons une stimulation, mais n'est-ce pas la meilleure manière de vivre?

- Ou une espèce de fuite en avant.

La discussion s'arrête là. Comme ils rebroussent chemin et passent à nouveau devant le "mazet".

- J'y ai vu mourir la vieille Ito. Décharnée à l'extrême, recroquevillée sur sa couche, tout en creux et saillants, elle me faisait penser à une chauve-souris engourdie dans le sommeil d'hiver. Mon oncle la regretta plus que je ne l'aurais cru. Il était attaché à la vieille femme. Elle se confiait à lui, racontait sa vie dont un des épisodes m'empêcha longtemps de lui tendre la main. Pendant la " pacification", elle avait fait rôtir un légionnaire dans une des grottes de la Zaouia :

- Il était gras, s'étonnait-elle, si gras que le feu prenait jusque dans les braises, et, ajoutait mon oncle : "A ce souvenir, elle en gloussait encore de plaisir".

Elle a été enterrée au pied du marabout. Les traînées brunâtres qui couvrirent le lendemain les joues des femmes de la tribu attestaient qu'elle avait été pleurée ainsi qu'il convenait.

Au moment d'atteindre la voiture, des pas rapides les font se retourner. La fillette qui courait derrière eux les aborde cette fois. Elle offre aux deux femmes quelques fleurettes - des gouttes-de-sang – et à Karim trois œufs enveloppés dans un chiffon sale. Le regard du jeune homme rencontre celui de Juliette, il ne met pas la main à la poche, remercie avec toute la chaleur requise. Juliette reprend espoir.

Le geste de la fillette, c'est, accroché au buisson, le flocon de laine qui marque le passage du troupeau, c'est le signe de la présence des, peut-être toujours faméliques Aït Our'tindi.

Karim parle de son départ prochain :

- Déjà ?

- Eh oui, déjà. Je regrette, famille oblige... Nous fêtons chez nous la fin du ramadan... Mon père y attache autant d'importance que ma mère aux fêtes de Noël.

Juliette les invite à passer en tête à tête la dernière journée. Ils projettent de monter au Michliffen[1].

- Vous y trouverez des cèdres et, si le cœur vous en dit, vous pourrez marcher dans la neige. La route qui y monte, longe jusqu'au N'tizin N'tretten la vallée du Tizguit. Avant de conduire à la station de ski, elle était piste de transhumance. Pour des gens dont la seule richesse était le mouton, cette voie était une nécessité et le prolongement de leur économie.. Je me souviens avoir vu passer les troupeaux, et, l'imagination aidant, je suivais leur parcours. Par bribes glanées auprès de jeunes bergers, mon oncle m'en avait fait le récit.

- La lente remontée, la halte du soir, les moutons parqués dans la "Zerreba", l'enclos entouré d'épines, les chiens qui vont et viennent, inquiets, flairent l'approche d'une hyène ou d'une bande de chacals. Les bergers autour du foyer alimentent sans cesse la flamme et la conversation, l'une éloignant les bêtes sauvages, l'autre les J'nouns[2]. De temps en temps éclate un glapissement suivi des rauques aboiements d'un chien. Au petit matin, les bergers se laissent aller au sommeil, ramènent le capuchon du burnous sur leur visage et s'endorment à même le sol, tandis que les braises continuent de rougeoyer. Cependant la panthère qui les a suivis toute la journée, se tient à la lisière de la forêt, trop prudente pour quitter le couvert. L'odeur du mouton lui parvient, mais aussi celle de l'homme. Elle s'enfonce dans les profondeurs de la forêt. Elle se contentera du magot laineux qui fait son ordinaire. Les premiers rayons du soleil annonçant l'heure de la traite réveillent les brebis, l'agitation gagne de proche en proche. Les bergers se lèvent à leur tour, le regard encore plein d'ombre, les gestes lourds. Ils vont à la source se rincer la bouche, raniment le feu sous la théière, partagent les galettes réchauffées sur la pierre et enduites de beurre fondu. Ainsi sans se presser, cheminant au gré de l'abondance des pâturages printaniers, ils atteignent les sources du Tizguit, au pied du Tizin N'tretten, franchissent le col des chèvres à deux mille mètres d'altitude et atteignant les hauts plateaux où les attendent, installées par une avant garde, les tentes d'été… Là, les troupeaux égaillés resteront jusqu'à l'automne. Une année, la neige précoce les surprit et fit périr toutes les bêtes. »

- Qu'en est-il aujourd'hui de cette activité ? Je ne sais pas... ne reste-t-il d'eux que leurs fantômes ?

Juliette a voulu revoir l'ami Hassan, elle a une question a lui poser et elle espère qu'il pourra satisfaire sa curiosité. Il semble heureux de la revoir

- Je vous croyais partie, envolée. Apparemment il ne lui en veut pas de sa défection soudaine.

- Dites-moi, Hassan, savez-vous où a été enterrée Madame Marie-Louise ? Et elle pense aussitôt que ce ne peut pas être au cimetière d'Ifrane…

De notre temps déjà, on ne lui confiait pas les morts sans appréhension... Quand Monsieur Blanchemain, le pépiniériste mourut de mort violente, on le retrouva un matin d'hiver, pendu dans sa cabane. Ni parents, ni amis ne vinrent réclamer le corps. On choisit en hâte l'emplacement du cimetière, on abattit quelques arbres, on débarrassa la terre de sa neige. Une fosse fut creusée, on y déposa le corps du pépiniériste. Dès la nuit suivante, les hyènes le déterrèrent. Le cimetière en acquit une mauvaise réputation. Il semblait hostile aux morts qu'il recevait. Et puis, il était trop neuf, il n'inspirait pas le recueillement. On ne pouvait, en allant d'une tombe à l'autre, rechercher la lignée des ancêtres, y puiser le réconfort qui vous rend l'idée de la mort supportable. Il n'était point mémoire du passé, il resta isolé, étranger au village et quand les Ifraniens le quittèrent, ils ne laissèrent pas dix tombes derrière eux.

Hassan répond que Madame Marie-Louise n'a pas été enterrée, ni ici, ni ailleurs. Son corps a été brûlé, comme celui d'une femme hindoue, déclare-t-il avec une espèce de fierté.

Imagine-t-il son corps consumé dans un brasier ardent, entouré de fumées d'encens? C'était sa volonté, Madame Marie-Louise était une femme hors du commun. Elle avait eu une fin à sa mesure..

S'il ne formule pas cette opinion, c'est cependant bien ce qu'il pense.

- A cette même table où vous êtes assise, son fils a pris ses repas.

- Elle avait un fils ? Cet élément lui avait échappé, elle ne sait comment l'insérer dans l'existence de celle qui n'avait jamais voulu quitter Ifrane.

- Oui, un fils. Je lui ai parlé, il m'a répondu qu'il était venu pour ramener au pays les cendres de sa mère.

Hassan arrondit les lèvres pour mimer ce qu'il pense être le geste convenable à l'accomplissement du devoir filial, puis il souffle délicatement sur les cendres et les disperse.

- Madame Marie-Louise n'avait qu'une idée en tête, rester à Ifrane, même après sa mort, conclut-il. Juliette apporte à l'histoire de Marie-Louise cette dernière touche

- Vous vous rappelez Irène, c'est cette femme qui…

- Oui, oui ! Je me la rappelle… Le regard d'Irène s'emplit d'une vague nébulosité. Karim est parti. Il leur a fait promettre de venir le rejoindre à Kénitra sans tarder.

- Mes parents vous attendent avec impatience, vous verrez, ils sont sympas.

Irène s'est approchée de lui, s'est haussé sur la pointe des pieds pour être à sa hauteur. Leurs lèvres se sont effleurées, juste une palpation, un battement. Elle s'est reculée ensuite, et lui mi-amusé mi-attendri a ébouriffé la crinière blonde, d'un geste qui lui est maintenant familier : "Cette petite tête !"

Son départ a laissé un vide que Juliette se hâte de combler en entraînant sa compagne dans des excursions qui les conduisent au lac de Daiet Ahoua trouvé plaisant par Irène à cause de ses rives boisées, puis au village berbère d'Azrou, simple marché à l'origine. Ses maisons, d'abord nichées au fond d'une cuvette, ont grimpé de plus en plus haut, le long des parois, jusqu'au débordement. Irène s'attarde devant les échoppes du souk où sont exposés les multiples produits de l'artisanat marocain.

- On en trouve à Lyon, je les regarde en passant, mais ici, dans leur cadre naturel, ils me paraissent plus beaux, plus tentants.

Et, ajoute Juliette, chargés d'une symbolique qu'ils perdent à l'exportation.

Irène examine, palpe, compare, sous l'œil complaisant du marchand, enfile un lourd bracelet et orné de cabochons… "Pour ma mère, elle l'aimera, on dirait un bijou scythe, venu du fond des âges" …fait d'autres acquisitions, des cuirs surtout. A cause de l'odeur qu'ils ont conservée.

Elle a voulu faire à nouveau le tour d'Ifrane, cette fois ci sans le stress des premiers jours, n'est-ce pas Juliette ?

Elle prend des photos… le village sous tous les angles… l'ami Hassan :

-Non, non ! n'ôtez pas votre bonnet. Déclic. Pose de nombreuses questions. Juliette satisfaite s'en amuse

- Avez-vous l'intention de vous rendre propriétaire des lieux ?

Arrêt devant l'église désaffectée. Une église sans clocher.

- Notre nouveau curé avait fait installer aux quatre points cardinaux, des hauts-parleurs branchés sur un électrophone. Si le son des cloches ne se répandait pas dans les airs avec l'ampleur attendue – du son en conserve, opinait mon père - il n'en avait pas moins retenti dans des lieux aussi prestigieux que Notre Dame de Paris ou la cathédrale de Strasbourg.

Le cimetière est abandonné, informe, les jeunes gens assis sur les tombes, discutent, un livre ouvert sur leur genoux. Le regard d'Irène s'attarde.

"Scène significative, ici se lit l'histoire d'Ifrane, en deux temps. On pourrait accrocher à son passé quelques médailles honorifiques." Elles longent maintenant la route d'Azrou.

Ainsi dans cette demeure, à droite, le jeune Prince, maintenant, le Roi, Hassan II passait ses vacances en compagnie d'une gouvernante. Et celle-ci, plus en retrait, aux allures de castel, abrita au début des années quarante, le Comte de Paris et sa famille. Mêlés aux villageois, ils se livraient, sur les collines avoisinantes aux joies du ski. Enfin Ifrane a reçu le Général De Gaulle, parcourant le Moyen-Atlas. Il y fit une halte, serra quelques mains dont celle de mon père.

Elles terminent le parcours en montant une rue bordée de villas et dominant la vallée.

- Je me demande si l'auberge de jeunesse existe toujours. De l'endroit où nous sommes, on ne pouvait la voir, elle est cachée par d'épaisses frondaisons. Irène dit qu'elle est une adepte des auberges de jeunesse et s'étonne:

- Déjà de votre temps... ?

- Oui, déjà de mon temps elles existaient et même bien avant... la nôtre a été ouverte peu de temps avant la guerre. J'ai de bonnes raisons de m'en souvenir. Mon premier amour m'y avait donné rendez-vous.

- Ah ! S'écrie Irène joyeusement, une médaille de plus, et celle-ci aurait manqué... Images exhumées, jaunies par le temps , si souvent tournées et retournées qu'elle en a épuisé depuis longtemps toute la force émotionnelle . Un fragment s'en détache...

-Il m'attendait adossé au mur, en croquant une pomme. Quand il m'a vu arriver, il s'est avancé, et par jeu, a porté le fruit à ma bouche. J'ai senti sous ma langue l'empreinte de ses dents. Une salive insidieuse enrobait la chair de la pomme, dénaturait son goût. Je devais faire une drôle de tête, car mon amoureux éclata de rire.

Irène rit à son tour, et, comme soulevée par une impulsion :

- Juliette, est-ce qu'on épouse son premier amour ?

Le premier amour ! C'est un feu de cèdre, intense, coloré, odorant, vite allumé, vite consumé... on n'épouse pas son premier amour.

Elles sont parties à leur tour, chassées par la pluie.

- Une pluie de novembre ! se plaint Irène, frissonnante.

- Dites plutôt, une de ces pluies qui corrodent et laminent sous les buissons exposés à l'ombre les dernières plaques de glace que perceront en une nuit la pointe d'une herbe, la tige fragile d'une violette.

La pensée de Juliette se porte sur le séjour qui les attend à Kénitra, sur Karim et ses confidences juste avant qu'il ne s'éloigne.

- Ce séjour a été très important pour moi, enfin, pour mes rapports avec Irène. C'est à vous que je le dois Juliette, j'espère que de votre côté, vous ne garderez pas un trop mauvais souvenir de mon passage... j'ai peut-être été gênant…

- Pas du tout, proteste-t-elle, sincère.

- Alors vous aviez besoin de vous recueillir, de rester en tête à tête avec le pays de votre enfance... je l'ai deviné...

Un Karim attentif et sensible se dessinait en filigrane.

- Vous n'avez pas dû le quitter de gaieté de cœur. Juliette laisse percer son amertume.

- C'est le moins qu'on puisse dire.

- Je suis passé par là moi aussi... j'ai connu le même problème. Je suis né en France. J'y suis resté jusqu'à l'âge de huit ans. Et puis mes parents sont venus habiter le Maroc. J'ai vécu difficilement cette transplantation. Ça a même été dur, dur. J'ai rejeté avec violence mon appartenance maghrébine. J'ai réintégré le ventre de ma mère. A douze ans, j'ai consenti â avoir un père, je me suis laissé apprivoiser, je l'ai aimé... mais sans abandonner pour autant les relations privilégiées que j'avais avec ma mère. Puis, étudiant au lycée de Casablanca, maintenant à la Faculté de Lyon. Le Maroc dans son identité, la France, dans ses profondeurs, j'ignore. Je garde mes distances. Je n'ai pu choisir, ni faire l'amalgame. Quelquefois je sens le sol tanguer sous mes pieds... c'est pourquoi j'aime les math… leur stabilité, leur neutralité. Dans le domaine des mathématiques, je trouve enfin réunis mon père et ma mère.

- Des regrets?

Interrogation rapide d'Irène qui finit par s'inquiéter de son mutisme prolongé. Elle se concentre sur la conduite de la voiture. Le compteur marque cent vingt.

- Je me sens calme. Connaissez-vous ce vide que l'on éprouve après l'assouvissement d'un désir ? C'est présentement mon état d'âme.

En fait, elle s'est refermée sur ses souvenirs qui lui restituent un Ifrane plus réel, plus vivant, que la coquille qu'elle laisse derrière elle, vidée de sa substance, de tout ce qu'elle tenait pour précieux...

- Vous habitiez un endroit super chouette.

- Votre côté sportif est comblé, n'est-ce pas ? Lacs, forêts, montagnes...

Irène raconte une fois de plus, son enthousiasme n'étant pas épuisé, leur virée au Michliffen. Une belle route, leur rencontre avec des cavaliers. L'arrivée au Michliffen. Ils ont dévalé un versant, à toute pompe et puis grimpé… grimpé… une grimpette terrible à travers les cèdres, chacun testant l'endurance de l'autre. Karim avait calé le premier... et les gens sont sympa... on peut discuter... je me sens pousser des babouches aux pieds.

- Que pensez-vous du Maroc?

Monsieur Tarik, le père de Karim s'adresse à Irène et Juliette qui, de l'autre côté de la table, lui font vis à vis... Il n'est pas sans savoir que Juliette y est née, feint de l' ignorer, leur confère à toutes les deux la qualité de touristes et les rares allusions que fera Juliette à sa jeunesse marocaine, ne seront pas relevées.

Le Protectorat ? Monsieur Tarik ne connaît pas. Son pays est sorti tout équipé, ponts et routes, dispensaires et écoles, de la fête du Roi, Hassan II.

A la question posée Juliette répond qu'elle est enchantée de son voyage dans le Moyen-Atlas et Juliette se dit impressionnée par le grand nombre d'immeubles neufs ou en construction.

- Mais encore ?

- Les femmes en ville sortent maintenant dévoilées.

Monsieur Tarik approuve satisfait.

- Les femmes s'émancipent, certaines se lancent dans les affaires... les mentalités changent, le Maroc bouge, s'ouvre à la libre entreprise.

Le père de Karim sait de quoi il parle. Lui-même vient de monter une usine, elle fabrique des pâtes alimentaires.

Monsieur Tarik est un homme qui a réussi. Au physique, il est de taille moyenne, l'embonpoint tapi dans les formes vigoureuses de son fils, s'étale chez lui. On sent que sa mine débonnaire, son rire facile lui sont inhérents et ne doivent rien à sa prospérité présente... Du regard, il invite sa femme à partager sa satisfaction. Dans cette famille d'yeux noirs, Janine Tarik est la seule à avoir les siens d'un noir minéral, le visage est large, mais les traits finement dessinés, le teint bistre, la bouche mobile que l'on devine prompte à la répartie.

Pour l'instant, elle ignore son mari, tout occupée qu'elle est par l'opération repas et son bon déroulement. D'un oeil vif, elle parcourt la tablée, s'assure que chacun est bien à la place qui lui a été assignée. Karim aux côtés d'Irène, puis Juliette. En face, Yasmine, sa benjamine, encadrée par ses parents, au bout de la table, une chaise vide attend sa mère. Si Juliette avait parié qu'on leur servirait pour le repas d'ouverture, le couscous rituel, elle aurait perdu. Khadîdja, la servante, pose sur la table deux plats en terre vernissée. Dans l'un, deux poulets dont la peau dorée résiste de justesse à l'éclatement, dans l'autre, une pyramide de luisantes châtaignes. On se récrie d'admiration.

La mère de Janine Tarik, que chacun ici, appelle Mamie Biscotte, sort de la cuisine, en s'essuyant les mains à son tablier. Elle reçoit avec simplicité les compliments qu'on lui prodigue. Mamie Biscotte manifeste sa présence par une activité incessante, mais réduite à une seule fonction : servir. Elle entend être le lien entre la cuisine et la salle à manger, malgré les objurgations de sa fille.

- Maman, si tu t'asseyais un peu ! Laisse faire Khadîdja.

- Je l'ai persuadée - Monsieur Tarik a le souci d'entretenir la conversation - d'enduire les volailles de safran avant de les mettre au four, et de les entourer d'oignons émincés cuits à l'étuvée et enduits de miel et de cannelle, vous trouvez ainsi autour et au milieu de la table, la conjugaison heureuse, j'ose le dire, de nos deux cultures.

Ces mots sont suivis du murmure approbateur qu'il attendait.

- Nous devons la présence de ma mère, donc des châtaignes... à un cauchemar qu'elle a eu. Elle a cru qu'un malheur nous menaçait et elle est accourue...

Et Mamie Biscotte qui a suivi les paroles de sa fille avec une attention approbatrice.

- A tire d'aile et mes bocaux sous le bras.

Le passage des plats d'un convive à l'autre amenant une trêve, chacun peut alors observer, par la porte ouverte du salon, Madame Tarik mère, la seconde mamie, assise sur le divan dans la position d'un sage hindou, position dont elle semble ne jamais se départir, sauf, du moins Juliette l'espère pour dormir.

La vieille dame refuse de s'asseoir à la même table que les hommes, fussent son fils et son petit-fils. Des voiles blancs emmaillotent son visage, de la grosseur d'un poing. Une assiette que Mamie Biscotte remplit au cours de ses va et vient est posée entre ses genoux.

- Ma mère est hadja[1], déclarent fièrement Monsieur Tarik et sa femme ajoute :

- On lui a offert un tapis de prières avec boussole incorporée.

Karim se penche pour souffler qu'elle ne sait pas s'en servir et qu'il l'a surprise en train de prier, le dos tourné à La Mecque.

Cependant que Mamie Biscotte affirme qu'elle, elle va à Lourdes :

- C'est moins loin ! Les "oins" sont cévenols, ils s'étirent.

Au moment du dessert, petits fours et grains de grenade parfumés à la vanille

- Goûtez, c'est délicieux.

Une femme noire fait son entrée, on devine, sous l'ample djellaba, des formes plantureuses. Tandis qu'elle fait le tour de la table, serrant la main de l'un, embrassant l'autre, on la présente comme Zohra qui a élevé Yasmine.

- L'autre jour, elle s'est évanouie dans la cuisine.

Voix de Yasmine. Pour la première fois, elle manifeste sa présence, c'est une fillette d'une douzaine d'années, aux traits délicats. Les regards convergent sur elle, la découvrant soudain.

On explique :

[1] hadja :féminin de hadj, titre de ceux qui ont fait au moins une fois le pèlerinage à La Mecque, dans leur vie

- Sa passion pour les appareils électrique la perdra... le four électrique non débranché, lavé à grande eau, s'est vengé...

Zohra baise l'épaule de Karim avec ferveur, puis elle va s'accroupir aux pieds de Madame Mère, avec laquelle elle s'entretient en chuchotant. Juliette rencontre le regard d'Irène chargé de grises interrogations et réprime une intempestive envie de rire.

Un ciel embué, au bleu incertain. Le petit déjeuner est servi dans le jardin par Khadîdja. Une branche de bougainvillier, lourde d'humidité, s'est détachée pendant la nuit et elle la soulève pour franchir la porte. Ses pieds nus foulent un gazon anglais, vaporisé de frais. La table a été dressée sous les orangers. Des bruits d'eau joyeusement bousculée proviennent de la piscine, invisible, parce que située derrière la maison. Ils ajoutent encore selon Juliette, à l'agrément des lieux. Et tout en prenant place auprès de son hôtesse

- Autrefois, les jardins côtiers, étaient déjà, vus du plateau d' Ifrane, riches et colorés, mais le vôtre l'est particulièrement. Madame Tarik sourit

- Le mérite en revient à mon vieux jardinier. Il est excellent, a le goût de son métier, je lui ferai part de vos compliments.

Il s'ensuit un échange d'amabilités interrompu par l'arrivée de Karim et d'Irène. Ils sont en peignoir de bain et empreints de cette vivacité allègre que dispensent, à l'égal du grand air, les jeux dans l'eau. Madame Tarik sert le thé, pousse vers eux une assiette de biscottes beurrées.

- Je me sens, déclare Irène, un appétit... géant ! Elle est dans de bonnes dispositions et Juliette espère qu'elle s'y maintiendra. Les deux jeunes gens ont pris l'habitude de se livrer à des escarmouches, vite réprimées d'un geste, d'un sourire... Escarmouches tout de même. Légers accrocs sur la trame jusque là unie de leurs rapports. Karim se cantonnerait volontiers dans son domaine, maison, jardin, où, se plaint Irène en aparté, il est entouré d'attentions excessives. De la part de sa grand'mère, de sa mère, passe encore, mais de Zohra !

- Karim chéri par-ci, Karim chéri par-là. Elle lui reproche son manque de curiosité. Elle, Irène, flâne dans les ruelles de la kasba :

- J'aime l'artisanat marocain, c'est un art de berger, de nomades, de gens qui passent. On le dit rudimentaire parce que la matière travaillée garde encore quelque chose de son état brut. Cela me convient. Je peux toucher le poil du chameau, la toison du mouton, la corne, l'épaisse argile. Des odeurs traînent... suint, résine, cuir, huile d'argan... j'aime... et je me découvre aimant cela.

- Toi, Karim, tu devrais comprendre.

Elle a lié connaissance avec un vieil artisan qui travaille devant elle le bois de cèdre. Elle l'interroge. Flatté par son attention, il raconte sa vie, s'épanche avec une douceur résignée.

Aujourd'hui, elle est décidée à se montrer aimable. Elle grignote une dernière biscotte, finit sa tasse de thé et, sourire engageant :

- Dimanche, jour de marché. Je vais connaître un marché marocain, une photo, dans un magazine, m'en a donné un aperçu. Depuis, j'ai toujours eu envie... Vous venez avec moi Juliette?

Karim se résigne :

- Je vous servirai de guide.

En passant sur le visage de son fils, le regard de Janine Tarik se charge de tendresse. Une flamme derrière le noir minéral.

Est-ce intentionnellement, avec un malin plaisir que Karim dirige d'emblée leurs pas vers le domaine des bouchers ?

Irène avait déclaré un jour qu'elle n'aurait pu faire des études de médecine, elle ne supportait pas la vue du sang... il lui faut, ici, l'affronter. Le sang s'égoutte des quartiers de viande jetés brutalement sur l'étal, s'écoule, imbibe le sol. Des crânes éclatés présentent, comme des coques leur amande, de sanguinolentes cervelles.

En dépit de l'âge, des années écoulées, la réaction de Juliette reste la même : se détourner, s'enfuir. Ce n'est pas tant l'hémoglobine répandue qui la rebute, mais la violence qui lui est sous-jacente… Sur les traits osseux des bouchers, se lit encore, l'effort déployé pour abattre la bête et on ne s'étonnerait pas de découvrir une hache posée à leurs côtés.

Deux petits porteurs se sont attachés à leurs pas. L'un s'est muni d'un couffin, l'autre d'un sac en plastique jeté sur l'épaule. Ils implorent, s'obstinent, malgré le refus impatient de Karim.

Les voici maintenant devant les primeurs. Le spectacle change, l'état d'âme aussi. A même le sol, des amoncellements en collines, en montagnes, de pommes de terre, carottes, fèves, petits pois, haricots, cerises, fraises. Du sommet d'une pyramide, un chou, toutes feuilles déployées, se fait aussi large qu'une vasque. Des cerises roulent à leurs pieds.

- Tu goûtes, Madame ! Irène s'extasie, parle de généreuse prodigalité, entraîne enfin, l'adhésion de Karim.

- Le Roi a eu le mérite de donner la priorité à l'agriculture et au Maroc les habitants mangent à leur faim.

Au milieu des chalands, une vieille femme accroupie, aux yeux chassieux, vend mesure par mesure, des pois chiches cuits qu'elle puise dans une cuvette émaillée.

- Elle ressemble à la mère d'Aladin... la même posture... vous vous rappelez ce conte des mille et une nuits.

Karim sourit :

- Tu es décidée à tout voir avec des yeux d'enfant»

- Si tu pouvais avoir les mêmes, riposte-t-elle.

Autour d'eux une foule silencieuse s'écoule. Les lèvres des femmes sont scellées, leurs paroles encore occultées par un voile invisible.

Dans leur va et vient devant les sacs d'épices, les djellabas réveillant des senteurs de plantes et épices dont elles portent la couleur : cannelle, safran, kamoun pilé, verveine et menthe fraîche...

La concurrence des deux petits porteurs atteint son point culminant. Ils en viennent aux coups, ne se ménagent pas, les horions : une lèvre fendue, un nez saigne. Irène s'agrippe à l'épaule de Karim, la secoue :

- Qu'est-ce que tu attends pour les séparer?

- Qu'ils se débrouillent. Le jeune homme hausse les épaules. Autour des pugilistes, la foule s'agglutine, des paroles apaisantes enfin sont prononcées. Devant le visage, devenu tout pâle de Juliette, Karim entraîne les deux femmes hors du marché.

Le geste brusque que fait Mamie Biscotte pour ramasser son aiguille à tricoter déclenche dans le massif d'hibiscus, un frou-frou d'ailes et la fuite d'un oiseau en livrée grise. Celui-là même qui au petit matin fait entendre sa note volubile et d'une fluidité d'eau vive.

- Je n'arrive pas, dit Janine Tarik, à me familiariser avec les oiseaux de ce jardin. Ils m'ignorent et je les ignore. Tandis qu'à St. André, chez nous, dans les Cévennes, ils font partie de notre vie. Ma mère nourrit l'hiver, le pinson„ hôte permanent du vieux cerisier et nous surveillons à la première pelletée de terre retournée, en automne, la réapparition du rouge-gorge, ce fugueur…

Les paroles de son épouse tirent Hassan Tarik de sa somnolence:

- J'ai l'habitude d'escamoter le repas de midi, à la manière américaine, je me contente de n'importe quoi d'un fruit par exemple et d'une tasse de café. La convivialité y perd, mais la digestion est plus facile...

Juliette en conclut que la présence de leur hôte, chaque jour, au déjeuner, est une marque de civilité envers ses invités.

Irène est allongée dans le hamac habituellement occupé par Yasmine, aujourd'hui, celle-ci est absente, des amis sont venus la chercher pour une randonnée à cheval. Irène s'étire avec satisfaction - relaxation complète - pousse un soupir heureux.

- Ce jardin est un paradis !

Juliette s'inquiète :

- Se laisserait-elle prendre aux délices de Capoue ? Allait-elle dévier de sa vraie nature ? Devenir ronde et indolente ? Contrairement à toute attente, le visage de Madame Tarik prend l'expression sévère que doivent lui connaître ses élèves du lycée de Kénitra où elle enseigne les math.

- Un paradis très limité et qui ne s'étend pas au-delà des murs. Un paradis où je m'ennuierais vite, si je n'étais pas occupée au dehors, c'est pourquoi j'ai gardé mon emploi.

Juliette réprime son agacement :

- Tu parles Charles. Je pense bien qu'elle doit se sentir désœuvrée. Servie comme elle est...

Sa mère, qu'un ouvrage de tricot maintient assise très droite sur une chaise, approuve :

- Dans la vie il faut savoir s'occuper.

- Tiens, s'exclame Irène, j'entends la voiture de Karim, il vient de rentrer. Karim est allé raccompagner sa grand'mère à Moulay Bousselem où elle vit habituellement. Si Juliette ne l'avait vue monter en voiture, se serait-elle aperçue de son départ ? Irène a fait à son sujet cette réflexion :

- Une femme qui dans la maison de son fils, se donne si peu de droits à l'existence, est d'un autre âge... et chacun ici, a l'air de trouver ce comportement naturel.

Lorsque Karim, en survêtement, les rejoint, c'est pour faire voltiger ses babouches et se planter en face d'Irène.

- Je te lance un défi au judo, nous allons apprécier ce dont tu es capable !

Juliette n'a pas de goût particulier pour ce sport et même lorsque la télévision retransmet un combat de judokas, elle change de chaîne, mais devant le spectacle qu'offrent les deux jeunes gens, elle s'efforce par sympathie de suivre et de comprendre les mouvements auxquels ils se livrent :

rapprochements, esquives, hésitations, empoignades... ils tournent en rond, la danse de l'ours... mais souple, rapide... et dont le seul but est de projeter sur le sol le corps de son adversaire, comme on ferait d'un tapis, non pour le battre mais pour en éprouver l'élasticité.

- A charge de revanche ! Le combat est bref, s'achève en éclats de rire. leurs corps mêlés, empêtrés, s'étreignent. D'un bond les voilà debouts , ils se dirigent, main dans la main, vers la maison où ils pénètrent. Au premier étage, une fenêtre se ferme. Mamie Biscotte tricote, les yeux baissés. Le regard de Monsieur Tarik, douceur, indulgence, sollicite celui de sa femme qui, lui, est plus noir que jamais.

- Les enfants sont partis ce matin… très tôt... je n'ai pas voulu qu'ils vous réveillent. Irène a déclaré, je rapporte ses paroles, qu'elle vous laissait en bonnes mains. Juliette dissimule sa contrariété, ne peut qu'acquiescer.

- Ils ont dû faire le voyage que nous réservons d'habitude a nos amis de France lorsqu'ils viennent nous voir. La côte atlantique jusqu'à Agadir où les attend un complexe hôtelier de haut standing : piscine, golf, tennis... Karim adore... Ils pousseront peut-être jusqu'aux gorges du Drâa. De notre côté nous tâcherons de bien employer notre temps... nous pourrions visiter Rabat, vous y êtes née, je crois. C'est une avancée, la première, vers le passé marocain de Juliette. Effort méritoire, manière de la prendre par les épaules, de faire quelques pas avec elle, Madame Tarik joue du mieux qu'elle peut son rôle d'hôtesse. Juliette remercie :

- Il m'aurait été pénible de quitter le Maroc sans revoir Rabat.

A Rabat, les époux Tarik concentrent leur attention sur la prolifération des immeubles, l'extension des quartiers.

- Il y a longtemps qu'ils ne s'y étaient arrêtés. Juliette leur en donne l'occasion. Celle-ci envie leurs propos animés et cet état d'esprit dénué de toute préoccupation sentimentale. Passage rapide devant les remparts où nichaient les cigognes, devant la place du marché, puis la voiture enfile de bout en bout l'avenue Dar el Maghzen, toujours aussi belle, aussi droite, bordée de palmiers.

- Les palmiers Phénix ont prospéré, ils sont superbes. Les Tarik qui évoquaient l'ouverture prochaine d'une grande surface, s'interrompent, la regardent. Elle se sent la parente pauvre, la cousine de province.

Sous cette arcade s'ouvrait le magasin de Tante Odile. Un univers fleuri. A l'intérieur de la vitrine,l'eau ruisselait, et, derrière ce rideau mouvant les fleurs prenaient l'apparence de poissons exotiques.

- Juliette, n'oubliez pas, vous êtes notre guide, j'attends vos directives.

- Je voudrais revoir la maison de ma tante Odile, blanche, longue de ligne... pareille à la vôtre... elle y vivait avec mes grands-parents. Il faut passer la porte du Chellah. Après la porte, une série de voies.

- Laquelle, Juliette, à droite ?

Juliette ne sait plus.

- Tout droit, peut-être, si je ne me trompe pas, au bout d'un kilomètre à peu près, vous tournerez à gauche, pour prendre la route de l'Oulja, face au terrain d'aviation.

S'il y a jamais eu un terrain d'aviation, il n'existe plus. L'aéroport est à l'opposé de la ville» Ils ne trouveront jamais l'humble route de l'Oulja. A la place, un carrefour, un rond-point et un agent de la circulation. Hassan Tarik arrête la voiture à sa hauteur, interroge. Geste négatif de l'agent. La voiture fait une fois, deux fois le tour du rond-point. Le représentant de l'ordre finit par la suivre des yeux. Juliette est découragée

- Je cours après une réalité, la mienne, qui se dérobe, me fuit. Au moment où je crois la tenir, crac ! Elle disparaît, cela se passe ainsi dans les rêves, les mauvais rêves... si nous rentrions...

Janine propose une halte aux jardins des Oudaïas. Et c'est en s'y dirigeant qu'Hassan Tarik s'engage, par miracle, dans la rue Lamoricière, que les Tarik nomment rue Fétouaki.

Là encore l'enfilade des modestes magasins parmi lesquels celui où l'Oncle Robert vendait, louait ou réparait les cycles, est remplacé par un pâté d'immeubles. Traversée du quartier que domine la Tour Hassan. Haute de quarante neuf mètres, un chemin intérieur permettait d'accéder, à dos de cheval, jusqu'au sommet.

- Je suis née au pied de la Tour, dans un immeuble qui a été détruit pour libérer une esplanade la mettant en valeur.

En haut de l'immeuble, la terrasse autour de laquelle courait un parapet tout blanc. Elle y est montée, accrochée au tablier de sa grand'mère, et le cœur lui chavire un peu, car la terrasse, telle une nacelle, flotte dans le ciel de Rabat, d'un bleu si doux et gardant de la brume qui a stagné toute la matinée, un léger voile mauve. Sur le fil d'étendage, la lingerie de Tante Odile. Ses chemises de nuit et de jour, en linon, en nanzouk. Brodées de leurs et de papillons, les mouchoirs de dentelle, les jupons â trous-trous, d'où s'échappent des rubans, se gonflent, claquent au vent, pleins d'allégresse.

- A force de la voir en passant, c'est de la Tour Hassan qu'il est question, on ne la voit plus.

Soupir intérieur de Juliette " Décidément, nous ne nous rejoindrons jamais...

Sa redécouverte du jardin des Oudaïas se teinte de morosité. Les époux Tarik ne remarquant pas son manque d'enthousiasme, il lui faut s'en expliquer avec elle-même.

Au temps où Rabat était encore voué aux cannisses poudreuses et à la terre rouge, cette terre qui, durcie, a donné les remparts et la Tour Hassan, on se plongeait avec délices dans sa végétation oasienne, riche en ombre et en fraîcheur. Il était le Jardin par excellence, le premier qu'elle ait connu, le père de tous les jardins. Depuis, tant de jardins ont passé dans sa mémoire, y sont restés... il souffre de cette promiscuité.

Tandis que ses compagnons s'attablent sur la terrasse, elle est allée s'accouder aux remparts… Tout en bas le Bou Regreg et son estuaire d'un gris qu'elle qualifiait autrefois de gris limoneux. Il l'est toujours. Cette permanence adoucit son humeur et l'âme enfin détendue, peut accueillir, docile, les sensations les plus ténues. Une odeur composite, est-ce une illusion, monte jusqu'à elle, d'iode, de bois mouillé, de calfat, de sueur d'homme à la tâche, c'est celle de la barcasse qui assurait le passage entre les deux rives. Était-ce avant la construction du pont, qu'elle cherche des yeux, aperçoit, en découvre un deuxième plus lointain, ou malgré sa construction...

La traversée du Bou Regreg ou sa première expérience de l'élément liquide. C'était une surprise toujours renouvelée, de voir la lourde embarcation, hâlée avec effort sur le sable, se mettre à tanguer et osciller sous leur poids léger.

Et cette eau dans laquelle on plongeait si librement le bras, se faisait assez résistante pour offrir un appui â la rame, et asséner à la coque de grandes tapes brutales qui la faisaient vibrer.

Juliette rejoint ses compagnons. Ils ont fait apporter du thé à la menthe et des cornes de gazelle[1] que la première bouchée libère de leur parfum d'amande et de fleur d'oranger.

- Il me semble qu'autrefois la pâte était plus sèche, elle craquait sous la dent, rétive, elle livrait à regret une pâte onctueuse.

- Vos souvenirs demeurent très vivaces...

- Le malheur c'est qu'ils disparaissent avec nous et pourtant... ce bien le plus précieux... le plus fragile, on voudrait, n'est-ce pas, le laisser derrière soi, le léguer à ses enfants et petits enfants.

EPILOGUE

Janine Tarik qui guette depuis deux jours le passage du facteur, brandit une carte en direction de Juliette.

- Une carte des enfants ! Vous pouvez la lire. Elle vous aussi est destinée. Ils sont fous, ces jeunes ! Ils sont retournés dans vos montagnes, Juliette ! Ils ont fait à pied et sac au dos, ce qu'ils appellent le "chemin de transhumance"… qu'est-ce qu'ils racontent encore ? Ah ! Ils ont retrouvé Raho et son fils… Raho... qui est Raho? Vous connaissez, Juliette ?

Warriors at the gate

Ancient Benin Empire was one of the oldest and most highly developed states in the coastal hinterland of West Africa. The empire offers a snapshot of a well-organized and sophisticated African polity in operation before the major European colonial influence.��Benin Empire rose to the height of its glory thanks to the contributions and sacrifices made by some outstanding men, women, leaders and warlords. Most of them went as far as laying down their lives for the advancement of the kingdom.

The lives and deeds of some outstanding warriors of the ancient Benin empire.

General Asoro is one remarkable historical figure Benin Kingdom will not forget in a hurry. He led other warriors in resisting the entry of British invaders in 1897 into Benin City.��His statement "no other person dare pass this road except the Oba" (So kpon Oba) was later translated to "SAKPONBA", the name of a well-known road in Benin. To commemorate his contribution, his statue was erected at what is now Oba Ovonramwen Square, at the beginning of Sakponba Road, Benin City. According to tradition, that was the very spot Chief Asoro died.

Chief Obasogie is another outstanding Benin warrior of old who defended the kingdom against external invasion. He gallantly resisted the British from invading Benin Kingdom during the punitive expedition.

Chief Obasogie was not just a warrior; he was also a blacksmith and sculptor. Most of his designs and works can be found in and around the city. The architectural design of Chief Obasogie's house which sits magnificently opposite the entrance of Igun Street leaves much to say about this warlord.

Interesting Images From Precolonial And Early Colonial Africa - Culture (2) - Nairaland

How To PLACE TARGETED ADS on Nairaland

(1) (2) (3) (4) (5) (6) (7) (8) (9) (10) ... (13) (Reply) (Go Down)

> Ishilove: The drawing of that punt seems exaggerated. It would have taken more than two men to row a water vessel of that size.

That does seem true. Of the written references to large African canoes that I've come across, they almost always mention there being many rowers.

I'm pretty sure different groups probably had different attitudes to s.ex. Since there was cultural variation in other aspects, there was probably cultural variation across different groups with regard to promiscuity and s3xually explicit imagery.

Re: Interesting Images From Precolonial And Early Colonial Africa by PhysicsQED(m): 5:42am On Apr 12, 2013

> pleep: Victorian sexual conservatism was all about clothing. Covering the ankles,the ears and sometimes hair... African cultures attiudes about nudity were completely different.

PDFmyURL

Africa was/is hot. Victorian era Britain was not, and was often cold. The weather difference is significant as far as clothing choices.

Clothing in Africa, except for the Muslim areas that probably absorbed some Islamic religious ideas about dressing, was mostly really about style/fashion, religion, and utility.

Inferring what a group's s3xual mores were from their dressing could also be misleading not only because of the heat issue, but because some groups could have been in cultures where a woman's b.reasts or a man's nak.edness were viewed innocently as just nak.edness, and not really as something s3xually explicit or some kind of s.exual exhibitionism.

This is not to say that the opposite could not have been true as well - there could have been groups that celebrated phallic or other s3xual imagery out of a deliberate desire to appreciate or promote s3xuality.

But in the case of those pillars I originally posted, they do seem to be purely religious/spiritual. Comparable objects (physically, not necessarily culturally) that are also non-s3xual but also have a phallic shape would probably be totem poles in non-African cultures.

This is the city of the chief’s women, in which each woman occupies one house on her own. Then the huge palace of the chief stands on its own on the wide square. Many, many quadratic houses are built next to one another and the pitched roofs are connected like saddles, forming a coherent, rectangular complex of buildings. The narrow side with four big entrance gates shows carved posts as support columns, a couple of huge drums can be seen in the dark doorways.” (p. 49) „The huge building is indeed noble and of royal beauty. Inside large courtyards span among the high dim rooms and dark, pitch-dark corridors. chief welcomes visitors, here he administers the law." (p. 52)

Text: „Je näher wir dem Häuptlingsplatz kommen, um so dichter liegen Gehöfte und Häuser beisammen, zuletzt sind es richtige Strassen, eng und schattig, wie italienische. Das ist die Frauenstadt des Häuptlings, in der jedes Weib ein Haus für sich allein bewohnt. Und dann steht der riesige Häuptlingspalast allein auf weitem Platz. Viele, viele einzelne, quadratische Häuser sind dicht an einander gebaut, die spitzen Dächer sattelartig verbunden, so einen zusammenhängenden, rechteckigen Gebäudekomplex bildend. Die Schmalseite mit vier großen Eingangstoren, zeigt als Dachstützen lauter geschnitzte Pfosten, ein paar riesige Trommeln sind in den dunklen Torgängen zu sehen." [Transcribed from German Fraktur] (p. 49) „Der riesige Bau ist wirklich vornehm und fürstlich schön. Im Inneren dehnen sich weite Höfe aus zwischen den hohen, dämmrigen Räumen und dunklen, stockfinsteren Gängen. Die Sonne scheint freundlich herein; ein offener Laubengang, dessen Dach durch geschnitzte Säulen getragen wird, läuft ringsum; Bäume beschatten in der Mitte graue, alte Grabsteine. Hier empfängt der Häuptling Besuch, hier spricht er Recht." [Transcribed from German Fraktur] (p. 52)

PhysicsQED:

But in the case of those pillars I originally posted, they do seem to be purely religious/spiritual. Comparable objects (physically, not necessarily culturally) that are also non-s3xual but also have a phallic shape would probably be totem poles in non-African cultures.

Don't mind pleep. He has a very dirty mind

[The comment from the writer that I highlighted in bold above is ironic considering that Christianity requires basically the same thing (the 'Holy Spirit').]

What do you expect, when we were in the age of the Trevor-Ropers of this world? "Africa has no history. What is called African history is nothing more than the gyrations of babarous tribes in picturesque yet insignificant parts of the globe".

The historiographers of that era were racists, pure and simple. Literature like Doyle's 'King Solomon's Mines' depicted Africa as a dark continent of savages in need of salvation, so European historians often used that annoying condescending tone when writing about Africa.

So I see that this made the front page. Although that's a good thing, I do wish I had been able to post at least half the pics that I wanted to before the thread was even considered for the front page. The spam bot kept blocking me and hiding my posts, but I'll try and post some of what I wanted to post under this alternate moniker now that more people are viewing the thread and hopefully the spam bot won't ban me and hide the post this time.

Yeah, there are a lot of condescending or offensive comments that I came across but there are also some purely objective comments and also some positive comments from writers from back then that I have come across on this same archive. I still intend to post the comments if they're not too offensive. For that picture it was at least necessary to establish what the house was for (religious), so I included the comment even though I didn't really approve of the tone.

The most annoying thing is. Tell me, what is Nigeria doing to preserve pre-colonial culture?
We talk and talk and talk and act patriotic and against west etc..
But WHERE can you find such relics in Nigeria?
(BTW Im sure that they exist, but where can you find them?..are there internet sites etc)
Are there are well known Nigerian archaeologists etc..?

Text: “June 11th. Igoumbié is the largest village I have met with yet, and forms one long and tolerably broad street. I counted 191 huts; each hut has a wooden door, and is divided into three compartments or chambers. The houses are generally placed close to each other, not wide apart like the houses of the Aponos. There are many of the curious alumbi houses scattered about. A large mbuiti or idol house stands about halfway down the street, with a monstrous wooden image inside, which the villagers hold in great reverence....What was most remarkable, there was here an attempt at decorative work on the doors of many of the houses. The huts, neatly built, with walls formed of the bark of trees, had their doors painted red, white, and black, in complicated and sometimes not inelegant patterns. These doors were very ingeniously made; they turned upon pivots above and below, which worked in the frame instead of hinges. Each house is of an oblong shape, about twenty-two feet long by ten or twelve feet broad; the door being in the middle of the front, three and a half feet high and two and a half feet broad. The walls are four and a half feet high and the highest part of the roof is about nine feet.” (pp. 264-265)

The Gun Custom

Text:

This was a splendid affair, at least as regards the roof, which was covered with a white cloth,along the centre of which a crimson plaid ran parallel to the eaves. Above and below this division were quaint figures of ships, with conspicuous poops and prows, rigged with a single mast, and two triangular sails like jibs set. Scarlet pennons were flying from the trucks, and beneath the keel two stockless anchors of blue baft were hung. Between each of these were curious affairs which Beecham called "pillars of salt." To me they appeared to be Christmas crackers resting on scarlet muskets. These ornaments were constructed of coloured cloth, and sewn on the white calico covering of the paviion. [p425]

The pillars of this shed were swathed in crimson velvet; and the back and sides were composed of gorgeous green, violet, blue, and crimson silks, satins, and damasks; the richness of their colouring being, however, lost in the shadow of the pavilion. In the centre was the royal sofa, covered with a splendid patchwork of velvet cloth of many colours; and a gorgeous umbrella, of yellow velvet, with dark crimson birds; with emerald-green necks, carrying blue guns in their black dexter claw, was set before the divan. Caption: Tombs of Agajah, Tegbwesun, Mpengula and Agongolu

Text: “On the left we discovered a long whitewashed barn, whose sides were ornamented with rude figures of men, animals, and inanimate objects in relief...A gorgeous cloth spread over the roof, and three umbrellas, marked the king’s seat, the captainesses and Dahkros being seated on either side. Immediately opposite the king was the mausoleum, containing the ashes of four kings—Agajah, Tegbwesun, Mpengula, Agongolu. The tomb was a long barn with a high-pitched roof. On the ridge were four silver ornaments belonging to the respective monarch. To the left was the monument of Agajah—a silver rooster standing on a globe, supported by an Asen which rose from the centre of a silver wheel, from the circumference of which four fetiche hearts of silver were suspended by chains. The wheel rested upon the top of an extinguisher surmounting a skull, all being wrought out of silver dollars. The next ornament was that of Tegbwesun—a silver acorn, supporting a wheel and skill, on the top of which was a silver tree with two straggling branches, each supporting a rooster. To the right of this was a peculiar double-globed cylinder, supporting a silver coronet, from the lower edge of which silver hearts were hung. Above this, surrounding the top of the cylinder, was a circlet of knobbed ogoh, and on the apex a man with his left arm akimbo brandished a sword in his right. This was Mpengula's ornament. On the extreme right was the elaborate monument belonging to King Ogongolu. Two silver soldiers, armed with guns, supported on their heads a square framework hung with silver hearts. Above this two other soldiers bore a smaller framework, on the top of which two Dahoman warriors stood in warlike attitudes. Through the centre, a tall cylinder with globe-like ornaments helped the soldiers to support the frames. The whole of this elaborate affair was of silver, and about four feet high. The hearts swung about in the wind, and clinked together with a peculiar tinkle, and the polished silver glittered in the sun, showing that these valuables were only set up upon state occasions." Caption: The God of Thunder's Temple in Ibadan (from a water colour drawing by Carl Arriens)

Text: "The exterior of the courtyard was characterized by some wooden pillars, embellished with carving, which supported the overhanging roof; the doorway, some nine feet in height, was boldly sculptured with figures in relief of a mythological character; but the fact that the door no longer hung upon its hinges, but was propped against the lintel, was significant of decay. On entering, a spacious courtyard met our view in which the intermediate roofs, supported on carved beams, jutted out over a veranda. Some women in pretty headdresses and some men in handsome flowing garments were standing here and there and gazed in amazement at the first Europeans - as I afterwards heard say to my own surprise - whose feet had trodden this holy place. We slipped underneath a curtain-cloth, and I am bound to say that for a moment's space the originality of the building in front of me, whose straggling black façade was broken up with many colors struck me dumb. A lofty, long and very deep recess made a gap in the row of fantastically carved and brightly painted columns. These were sculpted with horsemen, men climbing trees, monkeys, women, gods and all sorts of mythological carved work. The dark chamber behind revealed a gorgeous red ceiling, pedestals with stone axes on them, wooden figures, cowrie-shell hangings, and sad to say, also some empty spirit bottles, which already play a part in sacrifical rites. On one side of the dark wall a small niche, like a passage, had been cut, in which sat a wily-looking old fellow surrounded by a row of men and women squatting on skins and mats spread upon the floor and doing reverence to the aged man. This old chap was our future friend, the priest of the God of Thunder, Shango." (p. 46-47)

The Stories Behind Seven of the Worst Massacres in Ancient History

READ LATER PRINT

We all know that the ancient world was a violent place, but we often don't appreciate just how violent it was. The world was in a near-constant state of bloodshed and warfare. Massacres and mass slaughter were practically a part of daily life. The numbers killed in these ancient conflicts, and the reasons given for them, can boggle the mind. Here are seven of the worst massacres carried out in ancient history.

1. The Extermination of the Jie and Wu Hu in Ancient China

In fourth-century AD China, a war broke out when the Jie and Wu Hu peoples rebelled against the rule of General Ran Min. The war did not go well for the Jie or Wu Hu, and Ran Min ensured an example was made of them.

Things came to a head with Ran Min's victory at the Battle of Xiangguo. At the beginning of the war, Ran Min had ordered that all Jie people be exterminated. For attempting to help the Jie, the Wu Hu were given the same fate. Ran Min declared that all Jie and Wu Hu must be killed indiscriminately, regardless of they were male, female, young, or old.

SUGGESTED BOOKS

Following their victory at Xiangguo, Ran Min's army swept into Jie and Wu Hu lands, carrying out Ran Mins's terrible order. Farms, villages, and entire towns were raided and put to death. Wu Hu and Jie refugees fled to the larger cities, hoping to hide in the crowds. Citizens loyal to Ran Min delighted in hunting down those refugees and murdering them.

Ultimately, many of the Wu Hu fled to Mongolia and the far corners of Asia where they were safe. Still, estimates put the Wu Hu death toll at around 100,000. The Jie fared even worse. They faced almost total genocide and were virtually wiped out. During the war and the ensuing massacres that followed, at least 200,000 Jie were butchered. The corpses were rounded up and dumped in mass graves.

Ran Min was overjoyed. He declared the total eradication of the Jie people. Subsequent Chinese history suggests this may have been premature. Later sources contain references that hint some Jie may have somehow managed to survive the genocide. Survivors or not, this was one of the worst massacres in history.

2. The Thessalonica Massacre: From Sodomy to Bloodshed

There is a common misconception that the ancient Greeks and Romans were fine with homosexuality. This is not accurate . There were strict societal rules in place regarding sodomy, and dire consequences for those who broke them.

In 390 AD, the magistrate of Illyricum, an area including Thessalonica, had a local celebrity arrested. His crime? An alleged act of sodomy with another high-ranking man.

It was clearly a political move and the public was outraged. They demanded the men be released. The magistrate, Butheric, stuck to his guns and refused. The public responded by protesting. The protests in Thessalonica turned into riots, and the riots turned into anarchy. In the ensuing chaos, Butheric and several other Roman officials in the city and neighboring regions were killed by the mob.

The news quickly reached the ears of the Roman Emperor Theodosius I . The Romans could not afford to let any kind of unrest, let alone the murder of government representatives, go unpunished. The emperor ordered that troops be dispatched immediately with orders to deal with these rebels harshly.

Harshly may be an understatement. His original order was to treat everyone within the city as if they were guilty. No one was to be spared. Every man, woman, and child was to be executed without exception.

Theodosius quickly second-guessed himself, realizing that he may have gone a little overboard. As his troops approached the city, he sent a messenger to head them off. His new orders were to arrest the ringleaders but to leave the citizens alone. He was too late.

By the time his messenger had entered the city, it was all for naught. The troops had gone in and carried out their original orders. Several thousand innocent people had been slaughtered in the name of the Roman emperor. Church officials were outraged by the massacre. Theodosius was banned from entering any Christian church until he agreed to make changes to Roman law that would prevent a repeat of the massacre.

Theodosius consented and brought in a new law that anyone sentenced to death be granted 30 days before their execution. Historians believe around 7,000 people were massacred in Thessalonica.

3. The Massacre of the Zoroastrians at Istakhr

Istakhr was an ancient Persian city that thrived during the Achaemenid Persian Empire of 550-330 BC. Located in what is modern-day Iran, it emerged at the end of a caravan road that connected to the city of Persepolis and the wealthy Indus Valley. Istakhr thrived as a trade hub, for a while.

In 649 AD, Muslim Arabs invaded and took control of the city. The city's new rulers brought in strict new rules. These included the repression of Zoroastrianism, a peaceful local religion, and support of Islam. For two years, the people of the city suffered under Arab rule and persecution. Eventually, enough was enough, and they revolted. This Persian rebellion did not go to plan.

The Arabs swiftly and brutally put down the revolt. They decided to make an example out of the city's population. More Muslim settlers were brought into the city to replace the original Persian population. The Persians were massacred. For daring to revolt, over 150,000 Persian civilians were rounded up and executed. Many of them had played little to no part in the brief rebellion.

4. The Extermination of the Druids in Britannia

By the middle of the first century AD, the Romans were pretty well established in what is now the United Kingdom, but not everything was going to plan. In particular, the Welsh tribes had proven themselves to be a nuisance, difficult to put down. Roman patrols and trade caravans were constantly being attacked by small bands. The Romans couldn't afford to put up with any kind of native rebellion. The Roman leader in Britannia, Suetonius Paulinus soon had enough of these guerilla tactics. An example had to be made.

He sent his troops to the island of Mona, which is called Anglesey today. This island was the sacred home of the Druids, as well as several Welsh tribes. The Romans set about making sure the Druids would become a thing of history.

Men, women, and children were put to the sword by Roman infantry and cavalry. Their corpses were dumped on vast bonfires. The slaughter began with the Welsh tribesmen who had set out to protect their families and holy men. While they had previously been successful as guerillas, they didn't survive long in open combat against the highly trained and disciplined Roman legions.

After the tribesmen had been dealt with, the troops turned their attention to the peaceful Druids. The Druids had put up no fight, but the Romans were a superstitious lot. They feared the Druid's pagan beliefs and thought it better to slaughter them , just in case.

After all the Druids were dead, the Romans set about destroying any trace that they had ever existed. A garrison was built on the remains to deter any future rebellion from the surviving locals.

5. The Male-Only Massacre of Hysiae

The Peloponnesian War of 431-404 BC between the Athenians and the Spartans was a nasty one, full of bloody battles. One such battle was the Battle of Hysiae, fought between the armies of Sparta and Argos in 417 BC.

The Athenians had been determined to establish a democratic government just like their own in Argos. The Spartans invaded Argos after some of their supporters had been evicted from Argive territory. The Spartans, led by King Agis II, did not manage to take the city, but they did manage to take a nearby fortress city, Hysiae.

Agis II still had his sights set on Argos. He ordered that the male population of Hysiae be rounded up and taken hostage. If the Athenians agreed to hand over Argos, he would spare his hostages. He presumed the civilized Athenians would have no choice but to agree.

Unfortunately, the Athenians were more stubborn than Agis had accounted for. He was left in an awkward position. The Athenians refused to back down, and they had fortified Argos to a degree that he stood no hope of taking the city by force. At the same time, he had saddled himself with thousands of hostages who were eating up his supplies.

Agis decided he had only one choice, to withdraw from the area. The problem was, if he allowed the hostages to live, he would look weak. The Athenians would have called his bluff. So Agis ordered that his hostages be executed. Every male resident of Hysiae, no matter their age, was massacred. The exact number of deaths remains unknown to this day.

6. The Alleged Massacre of the Jews at Banu Qurayza

People have been blaming religion for their brutal misdeeds for millennia. When the Prophet Muhammad ordered his attack on Banu Qurayza, he claimed he did so at the insistence of Archangel Gabriel.

Supposedly, the angel had told the prophet that the Jewish tribe that lay within the fortress must be wiped out. This was awkward for Muhammad, as he had agreed to a peace treaty with the Jewish occupants.

Historically, it seems that the Jewish residents had broken their treaty with the Muslims after being pressured to do so by other local Jewish tribes. Muhammad's followers responded by going in and attacking the fortress. The siege lasted roughly three weeks.

After three weeks, the Muslims were victorious and their leader, Sa'd ibn Mu'adh, ordered that the surrendering Jews should be taken into custody. They needed to be punished for opposing God's will.

It was ordered that all the men be killed, and the Jews property be divided between the victors. The women and children were taken as 'captives'. Captives was a nice way of saying slaves.

The male captives were rounded up and stripped. If they were found to possess pubic hair they were separated from their brothers and beheaded. The exact number of men killed at Banu Qurayza is unclear. It is most commonly cited that between 600 and 900 men were killed.

Some Islamic scholars have disputed this number, and whether the massacre ever occurred at all, citing it as Jewish propaganda. Jews and western scholars on the other hand have pointed to parts of the Quran and contemporary sources that appear to indicate the massacre happened.

7. The Mass Slaughter of the Third Jewish-Roman War

It is no secret that the Jews and Romans didn't exactly get along. What is often forgotten today is just how bad things were. The Third Jewish-Roman War centered on a Jewish revolt in Judea between 132- 136 AD. The Jews were led by Simon Bar-Kokhba, who had proclaimed himself the Prince of Judea and whose followers believed him to be a messiah.

Simon used this belief to empower his followers. At the start, it worked, and the Jews fought well during the beginning of the war. The Romans faced more military defeats than they were used to. The Jews had their gloves off and were readily massacring any Roman troops they managed to capture.

When Emperor Hadrian heard how badly his men were doing, he dispatched strong reinforcements to the region. Their arrival in 134 AD was a turning point for the war. What followed was a massacre, as Jewish troops and civilians alike were crushed by the Roman troops. Entire towns and cities were wiped off the face of the planet.

It is estimated that at the beginning of the war, the Romans faced casualties of roughly 100,000 men, but some sources put the number at almost twice that. The Jews ultimately fared much worse. It is estimated that around 580,000 Jews were killed during the war. At least 400,000 of these deaths were during battle or from execution as prisoners of war. The remaining 180,000 were innocent civilians.

This isn't a clear-cut case of Jews=good, Romans=bad, however. Many of the civilians who were killed died at the hands of Bar-Kokhba's followers. Jews who refused to take part in the revolt were tortured and executed by their people. Greek and Roman civilians were also persecuted and massacred by Bar-Kokhba's followers during the war.

Ruined walls of the Beitar fortress, the last stand of Bar Kokhba Revolt and massacre of Jews by Romans and other Jewish people alike (Bukvoed / CC BY 4.0)

Conclusion

The brutality with which these massacres were carried out is awful and the lack of humanity terrifying. Whether it be for religious, political, or other reasons, humans have always been adept at finding excuses to massacre each other.

Most shocking, however, is the fact we haven't changed. If anything, people have just gotten better at it. It used to take time and effort to massacre a few thousand people. Now, all it takes is a few bombs or a handful of carefully placed air strikes. We can condemn the ancients for carrying out such atrocities, but the sad truth is many of us turn a blind eye to similar atrocities every day.

EGYPTIAN DEMONS AND MAGIC: EXORCISING EVIL SPIRITS

Most of us are familiar with the images of the deities, kings and queens of Egypt; but for every one of the famous scenes reproduced from those times, smaller, more obscure supernatural figures are far more numerous. Many of these entities fall into a category of supernatural beings known as demons or daemons. They also have an ongoing existence after the pharaonic culture, the end of Paganism, the rise of Christianity, the coming of Islam, and even into our own modern era.

OUR MISSION

At Ancient Origins, we believe that one of the most important fields of knowledge we can pursue as human beings is our beginnings. And while some people may seem content with the story as it stands, our view is that there exist countless mysteries, scientific anomalies and surprising artifacts that have yet to be discovered and explained.

The goal of Ancient Origins is to highlight recent archaeological discoveries, peer-reviewed academic research and evidence, as well as offering alternative viewpoints and explanations of science, archaeology, mythology, religion and history around the globe.

By bringing together top experts and authors, this archaeology website explores lost civilizations, examines sacred writings, tours ancient places, investigates ancient discoveries and questions mysterious happenings. Our open community is dedicated to digging into the origins of our species on planet earth, and question wherever the discoveries might take us. We seek to retell the story of our beginnings.

Как присушить парня

Несколько способов сделать так, чтобы муж от тебя не убежал, а любимый приклеился и не отклеился никогда

Подготовила Юлия Богатко

И втепоры Марине за беду стало,
Брала она следы горячия молодецкия,
Набирала Марина беремя дров,
А беремя дров белодубовых,
Клала дровца в печку муравленую
Со темя следы горячими,
Разжигает дрова полящетым огнем
И сама она дровам приговариват:
«Сколь жарко дрова разгораются
Со темя следы молодецкими,
Разгоралось бы сер(д)це молодецкое
Как у молода Добрынюшки Никитьевича!»

— Заговор Маринки из былины о Добрыне и Маринке

Так советует былина, а ниже несколько народных способов приворота, собранных в фольклорно-этнографических экспедициях:

Фольклорист — о приворотах, приметах и городских легендах

Выпуск подкаста «Комплекс неполноценности»

Евгений Шаповалов. Античный натюрморт I, 2019

Если вы достигли определенных успехов в карьере и у вас появилось чувство неуверенности, ощущение незаслуженно высокой оценки ваших достижений, поздравляем — вероятно, у вас синдром самозванца (англ. imposter syndrome, сокращенно — IS). Он может найти свою жертву на любой ступеньке карьерной лестницы: как среди стажеров, так и среди опытных руководителей. Человеку кажется, что он не на своем месте, что окружающие обманываются насчет его компетентности.

ПЕРВООТКРЫВАТЕЛИ СИНДРОМА

Подобное состояние прекрасно описала трехкратная обладательница «Оскара» известная американская актриса Мерил Стрип. Однажды она сделала такое признание: «Думаю: а с какой стати люди вообще должны захотеть увидеть меня еще в одном фильме? Я все равно не умею играть, ну и зачем я этим занимаюсь?»

Нужно сказать, что открытие синдрома самозванца состоялось благодаря женщинам. Первые эксперименты, позволившие обнаружить и описать IS, проводились именно с ними. Участниками исследования стали 150 женщин, на счету которых были многочисленные личные и академические достижения.

Томас Эсмонд Ловински. Маска Флоры. Художественная галерея Вулверхэмптона / artuk.org

В 1978 году они опубликовали статью «Феномен самозванца у женщин с высоким уровнем достижений: динамика и терапевтическая интервенция», где впервые и появился термин IS.

Это когда успешного человека сопровождает чувство, что все, чего достиг, — случайное стечение обстоятельств. И он уже ощущает себя не героем, а скорей мошенником. Ему кажется, что не заслужил успеха, которого сам добился, он думает, что просто повезло, оказался в нужное время в нужном месте.

ВЫСОКИЕ ЦЕЛИ — ПУТЬ К САМОЕДСТВУ

Неожиданный карьерный взлет может вызвать страх, что ты занял чье-то место и что на этом месте должен быть более достойный. И мысли о том, что окружающие-то этого не знают, что скоро все откроется, и ты будешь прямо как голый король. Представим олимпийского чемпиона, только поднявшегося на высшую ступеньку пьедестала и думающего про себя: «А ведь «бронза» точно мог меня обойти, он просто замешкался…»

Выходит, чем выше ставишь цели, тем больше от себя требуешь и тем больше обесцениваешь свои достижения. К синдрому самозванца приводит очень жесткая самокритика. Некоторые исследователи считают, что связано это с тем, что в детстве родители навешивают определенные ярлыки на своих детей.

Например, одного ребенка называют «умником», а другого «чувствительным». И потом, когда мама узнает, что ты получил хорошую оценку, тут же спрашивает: «А какие оценки получили остальные?» Ведь для нее важно знать, что остальные получили оценки ниже. И когда оказывается, что есть и другие отличники, ребенок начинает думать, что добился результата, не затрачивая усилий.

Тем, кому приходится разговаривать на иностранном языке, тоже бывает присущ синдром самозванца: они от волнения говорят хуже, чем им позволяют знания. Им кажется, что все сейчас обнаружат и раскроют их мошенничество, их внутренний голос грозен: «Я был уверен, что умею говорить хорошо, а говорить-то я не умею». И это может затронуть приглашенных экспертов, уровню которых доверяют…

РЕАЛИИ СИНДРОМА САМОЗВАНЦА СЕГОДНЯШНЕГО

Как уже упоминалось, про IS первыми заговорили женщины. И долгое время считали, что только они и подвержены синдрому. Но вот вам новость: мужчины, оказывается, тоже с ним сталкиваются. Страдают IS успешные люди, руководители компаний, основатели стартапов. Низкая самооценка и неуверенность в себе тут ни при чем. А вот перфекционизм как раз очень даже рядом.

Сомневаться и комплексовать может каждый. Ну посомневался, и отпустило. А вот с «самозванцами» сложнее. Они думают о разоблачении постоянно и все время его боятся. Исследования IS проводятся с 70-х годов прошлого века, но в последнее время с развитием IT, digital и прочих атрибутов XXI века о синдроме заговорили снова.

Два крупных исследования за последние 20 лет:

1) 2011-й — исследование International Journal of Behavioral Science показало: с синдромом самозванца сталкивались порядка 70% людей;

2) 2018-й — исследование и опрос анонимной карьерной соцсети Blind. Результат: в IT-индустрии людей с синдромом самозванца 58%. В опросе участвовали почти 10,5 тысяч сотрудников, включая работников таких компаний-гигантов как Amazon, Facebook, Microsoft и Google.

Ну что же, будем жить с эффектом самозванца дальше. Только не надо забывать, что исследования проводились в основном за рубежом. А вот сколько этих самых «самозванцев» скрыто от посторонних глаз в нашей стране — так и не знаем до сих пор.

Ранее редактор Эдвард Эннифул пообещал "развивать" таланты из Африки

Британский Vogue опубликовал обложку журнала, который выйдет в феврале 2022 года с изображением девяти темнокожих моделей. Это первая подобная обложка, если учесть, что над ней работала исключительно темнокожая команда.

Выпуск отмечает восхождение африканских моделей и считает, что они "перекраивают карту" в мире моды.

"Мне грустно видеть, как девушки, которые находятся на подъеме, внезапно уходят в тень. Мы должны гарантировать, что эти девушки выживут в мире моды. Мы должны инвестировать в них, воспитывать и поддерживать их", — заявил Эдвард Эннифул.

Так, на обложке нового Vogue оказались модели Адут Акеч, Амар Аквей, Маджести Амаре, Акон Чанкоу, Мэти Фолл, Джанет Джамбо, Абени Ньял, Ньягуа Руэа и Анок Яй.

Обложка февральского британского Vogue

Снимал их фотограф Рафаэль Паваротти, а оформлением обложки занимался сам главный редактор британского Vogue Эдвард Эннифул.

Объясняя, что вдохновило его на съемку такой обложки, Эннифул, который родился в Гане и еще в детстве с родителями переехал в западный Лондон, заявил, что всегда вдохновлялся африканскими моделями. "Я видел всех этих невероятных девушек, они всегда были такими умными и жизнерадостными, они полностью меняют представление о том, что значит быть фотомоделью", — заявил Эннифул.

Самая известная из девушек на обложке февральского номера – это, конечно, Адут Акеч. 22-летняя австралийка – родом из Южного Судана. И она стала звездой после показа для Saint Laurent весна-лето 2017.

"Когда я впервые начала работать моделью на международном уровне, я буквально была единственной черной темнокожей девушкой в шоу. Не было ни суданских моделей, ни африканских моделей. Sur les traces des Black Panthers à Alger, épicentre de la mouvance anti-impérialiste

Sur le tarmac de l'aéroport de Miami, la porte d'un avion de ligne s'ouvre lentement. Une corde est lancée au sol à laquelle des hommes en caleçon attachent une valise contenant un million de dollars. Il s'agit d'officiers américains du FBI. Les pirates de l'air ont exigé qu'ils ne soient pas habillés pour s'assurer qu'ils ne soient désarmés.

Lors des échanges préalables, les négociateurs du FBI avaient indiqué qu'ils n'avaient pu trouver qu'un demi-million de dollars. Les pirates de l'air avaient alors rétorqué que, dans ce cas, ils repartiraient avec la moitié des otages. Le FBI a fini par céder et a fourni l'entièreté de la somme exigée.

Une fois la rançon montée à bord et comptée, les 86 passagers du vol 841 de Delta Air Lines sont libérés. L'avion repart aussitôt en direction de l'Algérie. À son bord se trouvent trois hommes, deux femmes et trois enfants en bas âge — tous afro-américains — qui ont décidé de traverser l'Atlantique pour s'y établir et ne plus jamais revenir aux États-Unis.

Lorsqu'ils atterrissent à Alger, l'avion est encerclé par des soldats. Un fonctionnaire algérien gravit les marches de l'escalier d'embarquement de l'avion et déclare solennellement : « Soyez les bienvenues chez vous ! ». Les pirates de l'air sont bien accueillis et l'asile politique leur est accordé.

Nous sommes le 31 juillet 1972 et c'est la deuxième fois en un peu plus d'un mois que des pirates de l'air afro-américains tentent de rejoindre le siège algérien du Black Panther Party qui, à cette époque, était le mouvement de pouvoir noir le plus puissant des États-Unis.

L'Algérie ouvre ses portes

À l'époque, l'Algérie a payé un lourd tribu pour sa liberté, après une guerre meurtrière contre un ennemi barbare sans âme ni pitié. Près de 1,5 million d'Algériens sont tués, plusieurs millions d'autres sont incarcérés dans des camps de concentration et d'innombrables personnes sont violées et torturées par l'armée française.

Au moment de l'indépendance, le pays compte près de 10 millions d'habitants, 2,5 millions d'enfants souffrent de tuberculose ou de rachitisme, l'économie est en ruine et 90 % de la population est analphabète. C'était le résultat de plus d'un siècle de colonisation brutale ayant pour mission de civiliser les indigènes et moderniser le pays.

Étant parvenus à chasser l'occupant colonial, les Algériens estiment qu'il est maintenant de leur devoir de soutenir les autres mouvements de libération présents à travers le monde. Ils tiennent également à récompenser ceux qui les ont soutenus durant la guerre. Boumediene envoie ainsi des médecins à Cuba, en Chine et au Liban. Il va jusqu'à offrir un soutien militaire et un salaire mensuel aux membres de groupes armés qui souhaitent renverser leurs maîtres coloniaux.

D'une certaine manière, il s'agit de montrer au monde que l'Algérie est toujours à l'avant-garde de la résistance et du mouvement de libération anticolonial. Le peuple algérien avait acquis suffisamment d'expérience, de vécu et de compétences dans l'expulsion des puissances coloniales, pour les transmettre au reste du continent africain et au-delà. De nombreux combattants arabes, africains et sud-américains sont ainsi entraînés en Algérie et au Maroc par le FLN.

À partir de 1962, le pays reconnaît officiellement tous les mouvements de libération luttant contre un État impérialiste et ouvre ses portes aux damnés de la terre.

Entre 1962 et 1974, Alger constitue un carrefour pour les mouvements anticolonialistes et antifascistes. De l'Amérique latine au fin fonds de l'Asie en passant par l'Afrique et le monde arabe, les opprimés, les exilés ainsi que les membres de mouvements de libération sont invités à s'installer et à s'organiser dans la capitale algérienne. Des profils très divers viennent y trouver refuge : chefs d'État, dirigeants révolutionnaires, déserteurs, kidnappeurs et pirates de l'air. Tous sont reçus à bras ouverts par le nouveau gouvernement en place.

À travers une mobilisation internationale et son soutien aux luttes anticoloniales, l'Algérie espère, une fois pour toutes mettre fin à l'idéologie coloniale. Dans un discours de 1963, Ben Bella appelle tous les peuples africains à former un front populaire contre le colonialisme. Le 21 juillet 1969, son gouvernement organise le premier festival culturel panafricain auquel participent plus de 4000 personnes venues de 22 pays.

L'Algérie invite aussi des organisations politiques et militaires. Le premier mouvement de libération accueilli est l'ANC de Nelson Mandela, il bénéficie de bureaux en plein centre-ville. En 1962, Mandela a été formé militairement à Oujda par des combattants algériens du FLN et n'a jamais oublié le soutien de l'Algérie dans sa lutte contre l'apartheid. Il disait que c'était l'armée algérienne qui avait fait de lui un homme.

En mai 1990, trois mois après sa libération des prisons sud-africaines, l'Algérie est le premier pays dans lequel il se rend après 27 longues années d'incarcération. Devant une foule immense, il remercie le peuple algérien pour son aide et proclame à voix haute « l'Algérie est mon pays ! ».

Un grand nombre de mouvements anti-impérialistes suivent les traces de l'ANC. Tout est facilité par le gouvernement en place qui prend en charge tous leurs frais (billets d'avion, logement, visas, dépenses, etc.).

Alger est alors un haut lieu du multiculturalisme. On y trouve par exemple des Afro-Américains recherchés par le FBI, plusieurs milliers de Palestiniens du Fatah, des dirigeants de mouvements de libération africains, des guérilleros, des officiers cubains, des militants vietnamiens, des déserteurs de l'armée portugaise et des exilés politiques d'Amérique latine. La capitale héberge même un mouvement des îles Canaries qui souhaite mettre fin à la domination espagnole.

C'est dans cette « chakchouka » culturelle que les révolutionnaires des quatre coins du monde se rencontrent et plaident leur cause devant les dirigeants du tiers monde. C'est aussi ici que décide de s'établir une poignée de révolutionnaires afro-américains qui ne passeront pas inaperçu.

Fanon fait découvrir l'Algérie aux Black Panthers

Le Black Panther Party (BBP) était l'un des groupes contestataires les plus redoutés par le gouvernement américain, il avait réussi à consolider des liens de coopération entre la lutte nationale pour la libération des Noirs aux États-Unis et le mouvement mondial anti-impérialiste. En juillet 1969, le directeur du FBI, John Edgar Hoover, décrit le BBP comme « la plus grande menace pour la sécurité intérieure des États-Unis ».

Eldridge Cleaver était l'un des premiers dirigeants du Black Panther Party. En 1958, il a été reconnu coupable de viol et a dû purger une peine de huit ans de prison, Il y devient un disciple de Malcolm X. C'est aussi là qu'il écrit ses mémoires Soul on Ice qui est nominé comme l'un des 10 meilleurs livres de 1968 par le New York Times.

En qualité de rédacteur en chef du journal officiel du BBP, il gagne en influence et la CIA est à ses trousses. C'est l'époque où les membres des Black Panthers sont l'objet d'assassinats ciblés par les services gouvernementaux américains.

En 1969, lors d'une embuscade organisée par la police d'Oakland, Cleaver est blessé, mais réussit à prendre la fuite. Il part en exil à Cuba, puis en Algérie avec son épouse Kathleen Cleaver. Le couple est parmi les premiers membres des Black Panthers à s'installer à Alger. Très tôt, une cohorte d'autres membres les suivront. Presque tous sont activement recherchés par les autorités américaines.

Un mois après son arrivée à Alger, Cleaver tient une conférence de presse.
« Nous faisons partie intégrante de l'histoire de l'Afrique », déclare-t-il.
« L'Amérique blanche nous a appris que notre histoire commence sur les plantations et que nous n'avons pas d'autre passé. Nous devons nous réapproprier notre culture. »

Avant leur arrivée en Algérie, les Black Panthers avaient appris à connaître le pays à travers l'ouvrage Les damnés de la terre de Frantz Fanon. Selon l'ancien chef d'état-major du parti, David Hilliard, il s'agissait d'une référence absolue pour le mouvement :

« Frantz Fanon c'était la Bible, son livre nous l'appelions la Bible noire. Grâce à lui, nous avons appris la révolution algérienne, nous nous sommes familiarisés avec d'autres peuples qui se battaient pour le contrôle de leur destinée. Nous nous sommes en quelque sorte mis à imiter ce qui se passait dans son livre et en Algérie. Notre communauté ressemble à celle décrite par Fanon. L'oppression subie par les Afro-Américains ressemble à l'oppression des Algériens par les Français, et cela bien avant l'exemple vietnamien ».

L'auteur, poète et ancien membre des Black Panthers Jamal Joseph explique qu'en regardant le film « La Bataille d'Alger », il reconnaissait les Algériens comme étant les « Nègres des champs » de chez eux. Les Algériens utilisaient peut-être d'autres termes, mais le langage qui exprimait leur état d'oppression était universel. Ce qui s'était produit en Algérie était pour lui un présage de ce qui allait advenir des Afro-Américains : « Ce qui s'est passé dans la Casbah algérienne avec les Français est similaire à ce que les Noirs subissent dans les ghettos avec leur gouvernement raciste ».

Lors du procès des 21 Panthers soupçonnés d'avoir conspiré à commettre des attentats à la bombe à New York, le film « La Bataille d'Alger » a été présenté par le procureur comme une pièce à conviction. Le film aurait servi à organiser une guérilla.

Des Panthers libres dans les rues d'Alger

À Alger, les Black Panthers sont accueillis comme la délégation d'un État indépendant. Le gouvernement algérien leur accorde des privilèges diplomatiques, une allocation mensuelle et la liberté de voyager à l'intérieur comme à l'extérieur du pays, tout en fermant les yeux sur certaines de leurs activités douteuses. En effet, Cleaver et sa bande sèment souvent le trouble dans un pays qui bascule entre traditions musulmanes et austérité révolutionnaire.

Les Panthers s'installent dans l'ancien pâté de maisons d'un pied noir qui a fui le pays. Certains d'entre eux préfèrent s'installer à Bab el-Oued, un quartier balnéaire au nord du centre-ville, où de nombreux révolutionnaires résident pour profiter des plages à proximité. Les Panthers ont aussi été aperçus en train de faire du surf à Pointe Pescade, une plage très appréciée par l'élite coloniale française.

Pour organiser leurs activités, les Panthers ont même bénéficié d'une villa de deux étages à El Biar, un quartier aisé de la capitale. La propriété leur a été offerte par le Vietcong, également présent à Alger, et qui venait de déménager. Cleaver était proche du groupe et avait visité le nord du Vietnam pour une mission de bons offices. En échange de la villa, Cleaver a accepté de faire plusieurs émissions sur la radio nord-vietnamienne au cours desquelles il exhorte les soldats afro-américains à tuer leurs commandants.

La villa devient le siège de la Section internationale des Black Panthers et une base étrangère de lutte contre la ségrégation américaine. Avec son épouse, Cleaver y accorde des interviews à des journalistes occidentaux, qu'il facture 1 500 $.

Les Panthers profitent de leur stabilité pour coopérer avec d'autres mouvements de libération. Leur siège devient l'ambassade des Noirs américains à une époque où les États-Unis n'ont même pas d'ambassade en Algérie. Ils tissent des liens étroits avec les membres des autres mouvements de luttes révolutionnaires, qu'ils soient Noirs ou Arabes. Ils se sont notamment entretenu avec des diplomatiques de la délégation palestinienne ou encore avec Wei Pao Chang, conseiller à l'ambassade de Chine.

Les Black Panthers sont accueillis comme des stars de l'anti-impérialisme à Alger qui est alors la « capitale du tiers monde ».

Des Afro-Américains prêts à mourir pour la Palestine

En 1968, un autre Panther du nom de Stokely Carmichael trouve également refuge en Algérie. Il souhaite développer une conscience révolutionnaire auprès de tous les Africains pour contrer l'impérialisme américain. Selon lui, il n'y a d'ailleurs « pas beaucoup de différences entre les Algériens et les Afro-Américains », tous deux étant « des peuples colonisés ».

Il affirme que le peuple algérien a été « déchu de son langage et contraint de parler la langue de son oppresseur ». Tant qu'il parlerait et étudierait en français, la décolonisation ne pourrait s'opérer.

Stokely souhaitait promouvoir la langue et la culture arabes dans les universités américaines, pour que son peuple comprenne davantage ce que les Arabes ont subi de la part des impérialistes. Il se sentait très proche des commandos en Palestine. « Nous sentons que c'est le groupe qui est le plus en droit de bénéficier de notre soutien », disait-il lors du congrès « The Black American and Palestinian Revolutions ».

Selon lui, beaucoup de Noirs américains étaient prêts à défendre la Palestine et l'Égypte, « la mère patrie de l'homme noir », de leur vie :

« Nous sommes du côté du tiers monde. Peu importe ce que dit le Département d'État américain, la CIA ou le président Johnson. Tant que nous aurons des jambes, personne ne nous empêchera d'aller en Algérie ou en Syrie. Tant qu'on nous y invite nos partirons. Nous sommes des hommes. Nous irons là où nous voulons, nous apprendrons ce que nous voulons, nous verrons qui nous voulons, nous parlerons avec qui nous voulons et nous nous battrons avec qui nous voulons. Vous nous invitez, nous viendrons ! »

Stokely avait deux rêves dans sa vie : prendre un café avec sa femme en Afrique du Sud et boire un thé à la menthe en Palestine.

En juillet 1969, Stokely Carmichael et Eldridge Cleaver se rencontrent à Alger et se brouillent à propos de questions politiques et culturelles. Cette division interne annonce la fin de la présence des Black Panthers en Algérie.

Les Black Panthers sous résidence surveillée

La saga des Black Panthers dans la capitale algérienne ne dure que quelques années. Eldridge Cleaver et sa femme, déjà en conflit avec la branche officielle du parti aux États-Unis, n'avaient en réalité pas plus de pouvoir que des rois en exil.

Le 10 août 1972, tout bascule. La police algérienne entoure le siège des Black Panthers et place tous ses membres sous résidence surveillée. Cet événement se déroule suite à la demande publique de Cleaver à Boumediene de restituer le million de dollars qui avait été ramené par le groupe de pirates de l'air dix jours auparavant. Les autorités avaient confisqué l'argent alors que la somme était destinée à financer le Black Panthers Party.

Le schisme entre les Black Panthers américains et la Section internationale n'a fait qu'aggraver la situation des Panthers à Alger. Ils deviennent alors quasi des apatrides. À leur tour, les branches du parti aux États-Unis se fragilisent et se divisent.

Aujourd'hui, nous savons que le traitement barbare du gouvernement américain a poussé les Panthers dans une situation de retranchement les encourageant à prendre les armes. Ce faisant, bien que leurs revendications étaient légitimes, ils ont fourni aux autorités une bonne raison de les éliminer tout en perdant le soutien de l'opinion publique afro-américaine.

Le groupe avait aussi d'autres problèmes. De nombreux membres étaient connus pour être des personnes narcissiques, extrêmement intransigeantes et corrompues dans leur vie privée où viols, drogues dures et meurtres étaient souvent au rendez-vous.

Le FBI profite largement de tout cela pour affaiblir le mouvement. Le programme de contre-espionnage COINTELPRO permet à l'agence de surveiller, infiltrer et même assassiner les membres des Black Panthers. Ayant recours au harcèlement policier et aux faux témoignages devant plusieurs juges, le FBI réussit à saper le leadership du mouvement qui, suite à des tensions internes préexistantes, finit par s'effondrer en 1982. Dans le reste du monde, les autres mouvements anti-impérialistes suivront les uns après les autres.

Les traces d'un passé oublié à Alger

Après 7 ans d'exil, Cleaver retourne en 1975 aux États-Unis où il devient accro à la cocaïne. Il se fait encore arrêter à plusieurs reprises et meurt en 1998. Néanmoins, il laisse derrière lui un fils exemplaire qui, à sa manière, continuera la lutte de son père.

Né en 1969 à Tissemsilt en Algérie, Ahmad Maceo Eldridge Cleaver a bénéficié d'un double héritage. Il a largement été influencé par le combat que menait son père contre l'impérialisme américain. Diplômé de la Cornell University de New York, il publie en 2006 son premier livre Soul on Islam, qu'il présente ainsi :

Comme beaucoup de Black Panthers et leurs enfants, Ahmad s'est converti à l'islam et fait partie d'une nouvelle génération de personnes racisées, très cultivées et fières d'être ce qu'ils sont aujourd'hui.

Ahmad est né dans une Algérie qui était alors l'épicentre de la mouvance anti-impérialiste. Entre-temps beaucoup de choses ont changé, mais tout n'a pas été oublié.

Aujourd'hui à Alger, il y a toujours un grand boulevard « Che Guevara », des boulevards et hôpitaux « Frantz Fanon », une place « Patrice Lumumba », des places « al-Quds », des rues « Nelson Mandela », « Arafat », etc. Ce sont là des traces d'une époque révolue qui aujourd'hui inspire de nouvelles générations.

(Porphyry Bowl in the Vatican Museum)

Она была сделана из куска порфира и имеет окружность почти 15 метров, что делает ее одной из самых больших каменных чаш. Только гранитная чаша в Люстгартене в Берлине больше, ее окружность составляет около 23 метров.

Подробностей об изготовлении чаши по обыкновению не имеется.

История

Графиня купалась в крови молодых девушек

Кровавая графиня Батори убивала и пытала молодых девушек. Оригинал портрета графини Елизаветы Батори 1585 года утрачен, его копия написана в конце 16 в.

Суд над венгерской графиней Элизабет Батори начался 2 января 1611 в замке Битчанский Град, ныне — Словакия. Это был самый громкий процесс того времени. "Кровавую графиню" и ее слуг обвинили в пытках и убийствах от 60 до 600 человек.

Элизабет Батори происходила из знатной дворянской семьи. В детстве девочка болела эпилепсией, страдала от головных болей. В 15 вышла замуж барона Ференца Надасси. Как свадебный подарок Ференц подарил жене Чахтицкий замок и 12 деревень вокруг него. Замок расположен у подножия Малых Карпат, сейчас это территория современной Словакии. От брака родилось шестеро детей. Их воспитывали с первого дня рождения кормилицы.

Супруги были суровыми людьми и не терпели непослушания от подданных. Ференц жестоко пытал пленных, а Элизабет – слуг. Когда умер от загадочной болезни Ференц Надашди, его вдова стала еще более жестокой. Первыми жертвами Батори стали девочки-подростки, дочери местных крестьян. Их якобы увезли на службу в замок. С помощью нескольких надежных служанок, Элизабет развлекалась, истязая девушек клещами, иглами, бритвами, ножами, раскаленными утюгами.

Крестьянских девушек, которых нанимали на работу, иногда убивали в первую ночь на работе. Одних заставляли есть мясо других, других обливали водой зимой и замерзали до смерти. В подземельях и застенках замка графиня приказала подвесить под потолок железную клетку с лезвиями внутри. Она также установила "Железную деву" – куклу в натуральную величину в форме обнаженной женщины с острыми шипами. Кукла "обнимала" своих жертв и резала их до смерти.

По селам поползли слухи о "Кровавой Элизабет". Крестьяне начали говорить, что она пьет кровь молодых девушек или купается в ней. Это придает ей молодость и бессмертие. Говорили, что в отчаянии она искала девушек знатного происхождения, кровь которых более качественная.

Слуги Елизаветы тайно хоронили трупы в полях и церковных подворьях. Родителям говорили, что их дочь загуляла с новолунием и убежала. В 1610-м убийцы совершили ошибку – четыре тела девушек не зарыли, а бросили и в лесу под замком. Остатки девушек узнали. Начали жаловаться дворянам и священникам. Король поручает своему советнику Дёрдю Турзо провести расследование.

Турзо неожиданно приезжает в замок Чейте, в подземельях нашел изуродованные тела, несколько еще живых девушек со следами пыток. Арестовал графиню Батори и четырех ее подельников. Король Матяш предложил казнить Батори без суда, но Турзо не хотел так наказывать знатную дворянку. Назначил шестидневный судебный процесс.

Саму графиню Элизабет Батори даже не привезли в зал суда. Допрашивали свидетелей и пострадавших, иногда до 35 человек в день. Большинство свидетелей не рассказывали то, что видели сами, а передавали информацию, которую им рассказали. Суд также рассмотрел найденные скелеты и трупы в качестве доказательств.

Точное число жертв Батори неизвестно. На суде слуги говорили об от 100 до 200 жертвах. Некоторые называли 600 жертв за более чем пять лет. Слуг-помощников графини приговорили к смерти. Приговор вынесли немедленно. Судья приказал пожизненно заточить Элизабет в ее замке. Рабочие заделали двери и окна комнаты и оставили небольшое окно для продовольствия. Она умерла спустя три с половиной года.

Трупные яды (английский термин "corpse poison" или "mummy poison") - это токсические вещества, которые могут образовываться в организме человека после смерти и могут сохраняться в тканях тела на протяжении многих лет.

Египетские мумии были обрабатываны с использованием различных химических веществ и консервантов, но в основном это были соли и масла, предназначенные для сохранения тела. Некоторые исследователи предполагают, что могут быть обнаружены следы токсинов, таких как арсен, ртуть или свинец, которые могут быть найдены в тканях мумий, но это не означает, что эти токсины были намеренно использованы для того, чтобы убить человека.

В целом, большинство исследований не нашли доказательств наличия трупных ядов в египетских мумиях. Существует мнение, что использование токсинов для убийства не было распространенной практикой в Древнем Египте, и мумификация была скорее процессом, направленным на сохранение тела для обеспечения его бессмертия в загробной жизни.

Моноаминами - это класс нейромедиаторов, включающий серотонин, дофамин и норадреналин, которые играют важную роль в регуляции настроения, аппетита, сна и других функций центральной нервной системы.

Моноаминовые нейромедиаторы и их связанные системы играют ключевую роль в возникновении и лечении психических расстройств. Некоторые антидепрессанты, такие как селективные ингибиторы обратного захвата серотонина и норадреналина (СИОЗСН), увеличивают концентрацию этих нейромедиаторов в синаптической щели, улучшая настроение у пациентов с депрессией и тревожными расстройствами.

Другой класс моноаминовых нейромедиаторов, допамин, связан с вознаграждением и мотивацией, и его недостаток связан с некоторыми психическими расстройствами, такими как болезнь Паркинсона и наркомания. Лечение этих заболеваний может включать использование допаминовых агонистов или ингибиторов обратного захвата допамина.

Однако, использование моноаминов в психиатрии не ограничивается только антидепрессантами и лекарствами для лечения наркомании. Некоторые нейролептики, такие как рисперидон и квентиапин, также могут воздействовать на моноаминовые системы и использоваться для лечения шизофрении и биполярного расстройства.

Таким образом, моноаминовые нейромедиаторы играют важную роль в психиатрии и лечении психических расстройств, и новые лекарства, нацеленные на эти системы, могут быть важным направлением исследований в будущем.

влияют ли путресцин и кадаверин, а также спермидин, спермин и нейрин на поведение и психику человека и животных

Путресцин и кадаверин - это аминов, которые могут образовываться в результате бактериальной деградации белков при распаде тканей. Они могут быть обнаружены в различных тканях тела после смерти и могут служить индикаторами распада тканей. Поскольку путресцин и кадаверин образуются после смерти и не являются естественными компонентами живых тканей, нет доказательств того, что они могут влиять на поведение и психику человека и животных.

Спермидин, спермин и нейрин - это полиамины, которые являются естественными компонентами клеток и могут быть обнаружены во многих органах и тканях живых организмов. Некоторые исследования показали, что эти полиамины могут оказывать влияние на нервную систему и могут иметь противовоспалительное, противоопухолевое и антиоксидантное действие. Однако, более глубокое изучение этих веществ и их воздействия на поведение и психику человека и животных все еще требуется.

В целом, необходимо проводить дальнейшие исследования, чтобы более точно определить влияние этих веществ на поведение и психику человека и животных. Тем не менее, на данный момент нет достаточных доказательств того, что путресцин и кадаверин влияют на поведение и психику, а спермидин, спермин и нейрин могут оказывать некоторое влияние, но их роль в этом процессе все еще не полностью понятна.

На практике путресцин и кадаверин не используются в психиатрии, так как они не являются лекарственными средствами и могут быть опасными для здоровья при неправильном использовании.

Спермидин, спермин и нейрин являются естественными компонентами клеток и могут играть важную роль в нормальном функционировании нервной системы. Некоторые исследования показали, что эти полиамины могут иметь противовоспалительное, противоопухолевое и антиоксидантное действие, и могут быть потенциально полезны в лечении некоторых психических и неврологических заболеваний.

Например, некоторые исследования показали, что спермидин может улучшать когнитивные функции и защищать нервные клетки от повреждений, а нейрин может быть полезен при лечении депрессии и тревожных расстройств. Однако, более глубокое изучение этих веществ и их потенциального использования в психиатрии все еще требуется.

В целом, спермидин, спермин и нейрин являются естественными компонентами клеток, которые могут играть важную роль в нормальном функционировании нервной системы. Однако, более тщательные исследования необходимы, чтобы точно определить их роль и потенциальное использование в психиатрии.

ОБ ИСПОЛЬЗОВАНИИ АНТИДИПРЕСАНТОВ ДЛЯ УСМИРЕНИЯ БУЙНЫХ ПАЦИЕНТОВ

Использование антидепрессантов для усмирения буйных пациентов не является общепринятой практикой и не рекомендуется из-за отсутствия научной обоснованности и потенциальных побочных эффектов.

Антидепрессанты, как правило, используются для лечения депрессии, тревожных расстройств и других психических заболеваний. Они не предназначены для усмирения буйных пациентов и не обладают прямым успокоительным действием.

Для управления поведением буйных пациентов обычно используются другие методы, такие как ограничение физической активности, установка контроля над пациентом и использование специальных техник общения и деэскалации конфликтов.

Кроме того, использование антидепрессантов для других целей, кроме их официально утвержденного медицинского применения, может быть незаконным и опасным для здоровья пациентов. В любом случае, перед применением любого лекарственного средства следует обратиться к лицензированному медицинскому специалисту.

THE FACE OF PROPHET MUHAMMAD

November 26, 2018

THIS IS THE PROPHET MUHAMMAD: LORD OF THE DAWN THE PLUMBED SERPENT:The Wonderful: Quetzalcoatl,Lord Thoth,also Known as Ningishzidda The Angel Gabriel Son Of Enki son of Anu.

CHAPTER XLIX.OAHSPE

20. And now, that Looeamong's angels had an anchorage on earth, they were in all respects the equals of angels of the pagan Gods. So that, whilst Hatuas was victorious on earth, Gabriel, otherwise Thoth, was victorious in heaven.

21. And it came to pass in not many years, that Looeamong, through Gabriel, captured Baal and all the false Gods in all the regions far and near. And Gabriel took, along with the captured Gods, seven million and six hundred thousand warring angels, and carried them altogether to Makavishtu, in hada, and cast them into hell, where there were already more than ten millions who were in chaos and madness. 22. And Gabriel had the place walled around with fire and noxious gases, so that none could escape.

CHAPTER L.

1. The Lord said: Gabriel raised upon the earth one Mohammed, and inspired him through his angel hosts. And the angels inspired Mohammed to go once every month in the year into the cave of Hara; on which occasions, Gabriel came in person, and talked with Mohammed, who had su'is in great perfection. 2. Twelve years in peace did Gabriel inspire mortals through Mohammed. But, at the end of thirteen years, Mohammed attained to sufficient strength to draw the sword for Gabriel's doctrines. And Gabriel, through inspiration, caused the Mohammedans to commemorate this as the beginning of his kingdoms on earth. And they, therefore, consecrated the said period of time. 3. And, on this first meeting of the faithful in Gabriel, Mohammed, being under inspiration, spake before the multitude, saying: 4. There is but one God, and he is God. Heaven is his. The earth is the Lord's, through the angel, Gabriel. This is the sum and substance of all things. This was the doctrine of Abraham and of Moses, our forefathers. 5. But evil men have invented other Gods, which have no existence. They are idols, which exist only in superstition and ignorance

11. Brothers, I will tell you why I am chosen of God: It is to circumvent the Kriste'yan's idolatry from coming into Arabin'ya and the countries north and south and east. 12. These countries were given by God to our forefathers, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and thence down to Moses, and thence down to us. 13. There is but one God, and Gabriel is his angel of all the world. 14. And God raiseth up a prophet from time to time, to bless his chosen people. 15. He put this matter upon me; I know only to serve God. 16. The Kriste'yans are merciless warriors. This false Kriste and his worshipers are working for the Romans, and not for salvation. Wherever they go, they destroy the libraries and all manner of learning. 17. Will ye submit, like slaves, to have them despoil you? Is there no Arabin'yan blood in your veins?

From 10th Sumerian tablet

While the Anunnaki were still celebrating the construction of the "artificial mounds", Enki offered a suggestion to his brother, Enlil:

"When in the future days it will be asked: when and by whom was this marvel fashioned?
Let us beside the twin peaks a monument create, the Age of the Lion let it announce,
The image of Ningishzidda (later known as Thoth), the peaks' designer, let its face be,
Let it precisely toward the Place of the Celestial Chariots gaze,
When, by whom, and the purpose let it to future generations reveal!"

Enlil agreed with Enki's suggestion and decreed:

"Let the gazing lion, precisely eastward facing, with Ningishzidda's image be!"

Пустынный рай Зерзура – затерянный город, о котором вы никогда не слышали

История – а чаще мифология – изобилует рассказами о предполагаемых "потерянных городах". Будь то Атлантида или крошечная ирландская версия Бразилии, которую все считали реальной в течение нескольких столетий – очевидно, есть что-то непреодолимое в идее существования некогда великой цивилизации, которая теперь затеряна в тумане веков и судьбы. Одним из таких легендарных мегаполисов является город-оазис Зерзура – место, которое, как говорят, расположено глубоко в пустыне Сахара в Египте или Ливии, сверкающее белизной и наполненное древними сокровищами, охраняемыми отрядом гигантских солдат.

На первый взгляд, в этом мифе тоже что-то есть. Если поискать информацию об этом городе, то можно найти ссылки на так называемый "Китаб аль Кануз", книгу, предположительно написанную в 15 веке, в которой Зерзура описывается как "белый город, подобный голубю", расположенный в конце долины с "пальмами, виноградниками и полноводными колодцами".

"Следуй по долине... к городу Зерзура. Ты найдешь его ворота закрытыми", – говорится в рукописи. "У ворот ты найдешь изваяние птицы. Протяни руку к ее клюву и возьми из него ключ. Открой им ворота и войди в город. Ты найдешь там много богатств, а король и королева на своем месте спят сном очарования. Не подходи к ним. Возьми сокровища и всё".

Несмотря на это предполагаемое раннее упоминание, первый европейский рассказ о затерянном городе относится к 1835 году – и это что-то вроде сообщения из вторых рук. Оно исходило от Джона Гарднера Уилкинсона, английского путешественника и писателя, которого сейчас часто называют "отцом британской египтологии", который сообщил, что "араб, искавший заблудившегося верблюда" – повторяем, это был 1835 год – рассказал ему, что в нескольких днях пути к западу от древнеегипетского города Фарафра находится оазис, "изобилующий пальмами, с источниками и некоторыми руинами неопределенной даты".

Пока все так заманчиво – но есть несколько проблем с этой легендой. Во-первых, "Китаб аль-Кануз", несмотря на его якобы почтенное наследие, не совсем тот источник, которому мы должны полностью доверять. Сегодня она известна только как своего рода карта сокровищ Зерзуры, и не зря: процитированный выше фрагмент – практически единственная часть книги, которая существует.

У нас нет ни оригинала, ни даже копии "Китаб аль Кануз". У нас даже нет имени автора книги – все, что у нас есть, это слова Е. А. Джонсона Паша, члена Королевского географического общества , который заявил в 1930 году, что манускрипт находился в его владении "много лет", но примерно в 1905 году он одолжил его Департаменту древностей. Даже он не был по-настоящему уверен в рукописи: он представлял ее не столько как утерянную реликвию какого-то легендарного города, сколько как полузавершенную топографическую съемку, сделанную кем-то, по сути, не очень хорошо справляющимся со своей работой.

Кроме того, "рассказы о тайных местах в пустыне, найденных искателями бродячих верблюдов, были обычным делом", – писал в 2002 году Роберт Берг, исследователь-любитель и консультант по Ближнему Востоку. "В последующие десятилетия несколько исследователей – некоторые из них были очень хорошо финансированы и оснащены – отправились на поиски затерянного города, но ни один из них так и не добился успеха".

Так был ли Зерзура вообще чем-то большим, чем миф? Хотя исследователи начала 20 века лелеяли надежду на то, что город действительно существовал, даже они признавали, что шансов на это мало. Все предполагаемые места расположения города – а их было много, разбросанных по обширной территории пустыни – оказались пустыми, и исследователь У. Дж. Хардинг Кинг в конце концов пришел к выводу, что "сомнительно, чтобы место с таким названием существовало в действительности".

"Зерзур" по-арабски означает "маленькая птичка", поэтому "Зерзура" может иметь такое значение, как "место маленьких птиц", и выглядит несколько фантастическим для города", – писал он. "Зерзура, похоже, является общим названием, применяемым к любому неоткрытому или старинному оазису".

Иначе говоря, как решил исследователь Джон Болл, посвятивший десятилетия своей жизни обследованию Сахары в поисках легендарного города: "Мы должны признать, что "потерянный" оазис Зерзура не более реален, чем философский камень".

Les Almohades(1121-1269) un artilce de l'historien Tunisien

Mohamed-El Aziz Ben Achour.
Des montagnes Haut Atlas(Maroc) aux jardins de Tunis et d'Andalousie.
Il ya de cela près de 900 ans,les Almohades réussirent en effet à soumettre à leur pouvoir toute l'Afrique du nord et l'Espagne musulmane.
Comme souvent en pays d'Islam, on trouve à l'origine de l'expérience un mouvement politique animé par un homme à l'intelligence hors du commun et au charisme formidable, dont le but est de régénérer la foi au nom d'un retour à la pureté originelle et contre les prétendues dérives des contemporains. Mohamed Ibn Toumart, le chef du mouvement almohade, naquit vers 1080 dans les montagnes de l'Atlas(MAROC) au sein de la tribu de Hargha, branche de la puissante confédération des Masmouda.
Porté sur les études, la fréquentation des mosquées et des cénacles savants dès son jeune âge, Ibn Toumart partit pour un long voyage en Andalus, en Egypte, en Syrie, au Hedjaz où il effectua le pèlerinage et en Irak. Il acquit de solides connaissances, se familiarisa avec les différentes écoles de pensée et fut séduit par les thèses de l'école sunnite ash'arite.
Comme tout Maghrébin, il fut fasciné par le Machrek et, à son retour, se fixa pour objectif de combattre la pratique en vigueur, appuyée alors sur un juridisme malékite formel des oulémas et une indulgence du pouvoir à l'égard de certaines entorses aux stricts commandements de la loi religieuse. Sa doctrine n'était pas spécialement hétérodoxe mais elle ne manqua pas de choquer par la manière agressive avec laquelle Ibn Toumart s'en prenait aux gens et surtout son mépris affiché à l'égard des oulémas auxquels il reprochait leur juridisme figé.
Il fit tant et si bien qu'il se mit rapidement à dos et les milieux officiels de l'empire almoravide et la population des villes qu'il agaçait prodigieusement par ses remontrances et ses actions violentes.
Molesté, pourchassé, il ne trouva de salut qu'en se réfugiant à Tinmal, village du Haut Atlas. Là, comme partout où il eut à passer sur le chemin du retour, Ibn Toumart ne répugnait pas à enseigner sa doctrine et même les disciplines religieuses dans sa langue maternelle. IL décida d'organiser ses disciples et ses frères des Masmouda en une communauté religieuse et politique. Avec ses proches compagnons tels que Abd El Moumen Ben Ali et Abou Hafs Omar, il organisa une communauté d'un puritanisme intransigeant. Il dirigea sa communauté d'une main de fer et, conformément à l'antique tradition tribale, se fit seconder par deux conseils regroupant les notables.
Attaqué sans succès par les troupes almoravides à Tinmal, il réussit à fédérer sous son autorité les tribus et entreprit de détruire le pouvoir des Almoravides installé à Marrakech.

Il mourut en 1130 sans avoir pu réaliser son rêve. Son disciple Abd El Moumine (1130-1163) lui succéda. Dès lors apparurent les premiers craquements dans l'édifice : les Masmouda n'étaient pas très contents que le successeur de l'Imam ne fût pas des leurs, ethniquement parlant. La famille d'Ibn Toumart fut mise à l'écart et des parents d'Abdel Moumen furent éliminés. Les contestations familiales se firent jour pour ne plus cesser.
Abd El Moumine poursuivit toutefois avec brio l'œuvre de son maître.
En 1139, il vainc l'armée almoravide. Tlemcen tombe en 1144-45. En 1146, Fès est conquise et en 1147 c'est Marrakech, la capitale de l'empire, qui tombe à son tour puis Meknès en 1148. Entre 1151 et 1160, c'est tout le Maghreb central et oriental qui est soumis.
Au même moment, l'Espagne musulmane, redoutant un effondrement face à la pression militaire européenne, s'empressa de faire allégeance à ce nouveau champion chef . Entre 1144 et 1148, Xérès, Cordoue, Séville se placent sous l'autorité de gouverneurs almohades issus de la famille régnante ou de celle d'Abou Hafs. Après la disparition des Almoravides qui étaient venus de Marrakech en sauveurs à la fin du XIe siècle, l'arrivée des Almohades freina les progrès de la Reconquista et donna, au prix d'un effort militaire considérable, un répit à Al Andalus.
Cet appui allait cependant handicaper à terme la politique d'unification du Maghreb entreprise à marches forcées par Abd El Moumine. A l'est, les émirs hammadides du Maghreb central sont éliminés et entre 1151 et 1153, leur capitale, la Qalaâ des Béni Hammad, Bougie et Sétif sont conquises. La troisième phase de la conquête de l'Afrique du nord a pour objectif l'Ifriqiya. Les Normands qui occupaient Mahdia depuis douze ans en sont chassés en 1160. Puis Sfax, Sousse, Gabès et Tripoli passent sous la domination almohade. Tunis ne sera conquise qu'en 1207. À cette date, l'empire couvre un territoire immense qui s'étend du Haut Atlas à tout le Maghreb et Al Andalus.
Grisé par ses succès, Abd El Moumin rompt avec les règles collégiales, se proclame Commandeur des croyants . Il établit une dynastie et à sa mort, après trente-trois ans de règne, son fils Youssouf (1163-1184) lui succède non sans difficultés: ses deux frères, Abdelaziz et Aïssa se révoltent et sont exécutés. La famille d'Ibn Toumart est éliminée. Youssouf parachève l'œuvre de son glorieux père et conquiert le reste d'Al-Andalus en réduisant un certain Ibn Mardanîch qui fut finalement vaincu, malgré l'appui des troupes européen. Des gouverneurs almohades, notamment de la famille impériale mais aussi de celle d'Abou Hafs, sont nommés à Séville, Cordoue ou Grenade.
Yaâcoub, son fils, qui lui succède en 1184, maintient la grandeur de l'Empire almohade. Mais l'agitation en Afrique du nord l'empêcha de jouir pleinement de cette domination de l'Espagne musulmane. Des révoltes n'avaient pas manqué d'éclater précocement sur les terres d'origine du mouvement - le Maroc - où pas moins de sept soulèvements affectèrentle sud chez les Sanhadja rivaux historiques des Masmouda entre 1147 à 1213 ; mais aussi et surtout en Ifriqiya : dès 1178, Gafsa se soulève à l'instigation d'un membre d'une branche collatérale des Zirides, anciens maîtres de l'Ifriqiya. La révolte gagne le Djérid et dure deux ans jusqu'à ce que le calife Youssouf prenne le dessus.
La menace fut encore plus forte lorsqu'un descendant des Almoravides d'Espagne, Ibn Ghâniya, apparut au Maghreb. Il s'était rendu maître de Bougie et de tout le Maghreb central. Puis il trouva des alliés chez les Hilaliens en Ifriqiya et auprès d'un condottiere qui s'était rendu maître de Tripoli. Ibn Ghânia fut vaincu vers 1189 mais son frère Yahia reprit le flambeau de la rébellion. «Il est difficile, écrit l'historien Abdallah Laroui (Histoire du Maghreb, Paris, 1970) de ne pas voir dans cette vaste coalition une réaction malékite contre l'almohadisme». En Espagne, Yaâcoub est vainqueur des armées européennes à Alarcos en 1196 , il y gagne le surnom d'Al Mansour, le Victorieux. Cependant, l'agitation entretenue par les partisans d'Ibn Ghâniya en Ifriqiya l'obligea à rejoindre précipitamment cette province que le gouverneur hafside n'arrivait pas à maîtriser et l'empêcha d'exploiter pleinement son succès contre les armées d'Espagne.

Entre 1203 et 1206, l'Ifriqiya va jusqu'à se proclamer vassale du calife abbaside. Il a fallu que le calife almohade en personne se déplace pour réduire la sédition. Ces craquements tôt apparus, ces séditions de grande ampleur annonçaient la dislocation du vaste édifice construit par les grands souverains que furent Abd el Moumine, Youssouf, Ya'coub el Mansour. Des tentatives de redressement furent entreprises par certains de leurs successeurs mais elles ne purent stopper l'irrémédiable déclin d'un pouvoir devenu vulnérable.
Affaibli militairement, son territoire menacé de dislocation, l'Empire almohade finit aussi par perdre définitivement sous le règne d'El Mamoun (1227-1232) son ciment idéologique déjà fortement éprouvé malgré une tentative de restauration entreprise par Yacoub el Mansour. De nature conquérante, fondé sur une armée et une marine puissantes, l'Empire ne put surmonter les effets mortifères de la défaite subie en Espagne lors de la bataille qui opposa en 1212 à Las Navas de Tolosa (Al 'Ouqâb) les troupes almohades à une coalition catholique regroupée autour de la Castille et de l'Aragon. Les conflits au sein de la famille régnante et la dislocation de l'empire donnèrent naissance à des dynasties maghrébines indépendantes de Marrakech.
L'Ifriqiya fut la première à se détacher du califat almohade. A Tunis, en 1228, Abou Zakaria, l'arrière-petit-fils du fameux Abou Hafs, le plus illustre des cheikhs almohades, rompt avec Marrakech et fonde la dynastie hafside qui allait gouverner durant trois siècles sur un territoire dont les limites extrêmes atteignirent Tripoli à l'est et le Maghreb central . les Mérinides, se livrent dès 1216 à des attaques qui leur assurent le contrôle de la plus grande partie du nord du pays. Battus par les Almohades en 1244, ils reviennent à la charge en 1248 et prennent Meknès, Fès, Taza et Rabat. En 1269, ils portent un coup fatal à l'Empire en occupant Marrakech. Leur dynastie régna de 1269 à 1465 et eut l'ambition de reproduire le modèle impérial almohade mais sans succès malgré d'audacieuses expéditions qui les menèrent jusqu'à Tunis. Au Maghreb central, les Zayanides, eux aussi et vassaux des Almohades, se constituent en dynastie autonome à partir de 1235 à Tlemcen et se maintiendront —non sans tracas— jusqu'à leur chute définitive face aux Ottomans en 1556.
Fractures durables, puisqu' à la chute des Almohades, le Maghreb allait se morceler en trois entités que les frontières actuelles définissent plus ou moins : le Maghreb extrême, le Maghreb central, l'Ifriqiya (grosso modo, la Tunisie). Sans compter le royaume nasride de Grenade.
L'évocation de ces difficultés annonciatrices de l'effondrement de l'empire ne doit pas faire oublier qu'à son apogée, l'empire almohade constituait une puissance redoutable grâce à son armée et sa marine «sans doute, nous dit A. Laroui, la première à l'époque dans la Méditerranée occidentale». Ses finances étaient prospères, notamment grâce à un arpentage couvrant l'Afrique du nord et qui assurait une rentrée importante d'impôts.

La monnaie(le dinar Youssfî) était solide et recherché dans tout le bassin occidental de la Méditerranée.
Quant à l'apport à la civilisation, l'Empire almohade sut ajouter des lettres de noblesse au Maghreb et à tout le monde musulman. La gloire de l'empire, le raffinement acquis au fur et à mesure des conquêtes et du contact avec l'Andalousie, la richesse de l'Etat, la prospérité du commerce avaient conduit à un fléchissement du puritanisme revêche voulu par le Mahdi.
Les arts, l'architecture, la musique, la philosophie même, étaient florissants. Marrakech, la capitale, ou Séville, étaient des villes où se donnait à voir la splendeur impériale. Au plan de la création architecturale, les Almohades nous ont légué des chefs-d'œuvre tels que la mosquée de la Koutoubia et son splendide minaret (1196) typique de l'art almohade qui privilégiait l'élégance géométrique et la légèreté des entrelacs. Il constitue une des plus belles réalisations de l'art architectural de tout l'Islam.
La Giralda de Séville, le minaret de la Kasbah de Tunis et celui, inachevé, de la Tour Hassan à Rabat.
La philosophie (pratiquée alors en même temps que la médecine, la physique ou la poésie) connut dans un premier temps un cadre plutôt propice. Elle fut incarnée par Ibn Toufayl (né à Cadix en 1105 mort à Marrakech en 1185), médecin du calife Youssouf, philosophe et auteur du fameux récit philosophique Hayy Ibn Yaqdhân, et par le grand Ibn Roshd-Averroès, le commentateur d'Aristote. Né à Cordoue en 1126, mort à Marrakech en 1198, il fut d'abord apprécié des émirs almohades qui lui confièrent de hautes charges dans la magistrature à Séville et Cordoue puis en firent leur médecin personnel.
Vers 1188 cependant, le calife Yaâcoub El Mansour, inquiet de la montée des troubles politiques, adopta une attitude de crispation et, espérant ressouder son vaste empire par un retour à l'intransigeance doctrinale des origines, fit interdire la philosophie en même temps que le chant et la musique; toutes activités que la prospérité almohade et le contact avec le raffinement andalou avaient conduit le pouvoir impérial à tolérer sinon à encourager. Les ennemis d'Averroès saisirent cette occasion et réussirent à le rendre suspect aux yeux de l'émir qui ne tarda pas à lui retirer sa faveur. Il mourut à Marrakech dans une semi-disgrâce et, en tout cas, dans une grande solitude intellectuelle. Dans le domaine des sciences, il convient de citer le nom d'Ibn Zohr (né et mort à Séville, 1091-1162) —l'Avenzoar de l'Europe médiévale— adepte de l'observation clinique, qui identifia l'abcès du péricarde et évoqua la trachéotomie. Cette grande figure émergea, comme nous l'indique l'éminent spécialiste André Miquel "de toute une dynastie de savants mais aussi d'une prodigieuse cohorte de spécialistes en toutes disciplines, dont il faudra retenir encore, entre tant d'autres, l'agronomie.
Les Almohades furent les acteurs d'une formidable épopée qui les mena de Tinmal, leur nid d'aigle du Haut Atlas, jusqu'à Tripoli et en Andalus. L'obligation de tenir à la fois le Maghreb et l'Espagne musulmane a cependant épuisé l'Empire. Puissant militairement, le pouvoir almohade n'a pas su ou pu constituer une force économique susceptible de soutenir durablement un gigantesque et constant effort de guerre. Quant à l'idéologie, elle n'a pu remplir son rôle réellement fédérateur, la doctrine d'Ibn Toumart n'ayant ni séduit les populations ni empêché la dislocation du territoire. Certes, elle a été un puissant déclencheur du mouvement contestataire et un moyen – notamment grâce à un emploi massif de la langue amazighe dans les prêches et l'enseignement - de fédérer les tribus réfractaires à l'ordre almoravide mais n'a pas été efficace sur la longue durée."

Moment historique majeur, l'expérience impériale almohade constitue aussi un repère fascinant pour nous tous qui souhaitons l'avènement d'un Maghreb uni et riche de sa diversité.

Au début du 17e siècle, le préjugé de « race » n'existe pas en France. Les colonies non plus.

La France n'a pas réussi à s'établir au Brésil, chasse gardée des Portugais qui ont déjà installé des sucreries dans la région de Pernambouc. Une première tentative a lieu en 1555, mais tourne court en 1567, les Portugais ayant chassé les intrus. Une seconde expédition part de Bretagne en 1612 avec le projet d'une « France équinoxiale », mais le même scénario se reproduit : les Portugais expulsent encore les Français. Ces derniers se contenteront de l'actuelle Guyane, qu'ils essaieront de coloniser à partir de 1626.

Quant à la partie occidentale de Saint-Domingue (l'actuelle république d'Haïti), les quelques Français qui s'y trouvent alors ne sont que des boucaniers et des flibustiers.

Au tout début du XVIIe siècle, les vrais projets coloniaux de la France ne concernent que le Canada. L'intérêt conjugué pour l'Afrique et les Antilles ne viendra que par la suite.

Le pétun (le tabac), le café et le sucre, denrées inutiles, ne préoccupent encore personne en France.

Le substantif « nègre » ou « noir » n'existe pas. On parle à la rigueur d'un homme nègre ou noir, mais jamais d'un noir ou d'un nègre tout court, car pour tout chrétien de bon sens, un homme nègre est évidemment un homme et tous les hommes descendent d'Adam et d'Ève. La question ne se pose même pas.

L'arrivée en France, en 1635, de Zaga Christ (http://une-autre-histoire.org/zaga-christ-biographie/), ne donne lieu à aucun commentaire particulier sur sa couleur de peau. Ce qu'on retient, c'est qu'il vient d'Éthiopie et que c'est ou bien un prince ou bien un imposteur.

En 1626, Richelieu (http://une-autre-histoire.org/cardinal-de-richelieu/), premier ministre de Louis XIII (http://une-autre-histoire.org/louis-xiii/), crée la Compagnie normande qui associe des marchands de Dieppe et de Rouen. Elle est chargée de coloniser le Sénégal et la Gambie. Pour faire comme tout le monde : les Hollandais y sont. Pourquoi pas nous ?

Richelieu soutient également la création par le flibustier Pierre d'Esnambuc (http://une-autre-histoire.org/pierre-belain-desnanbuc/), qui lui a fait miroiter tout le profit que le royaume pourrait en tirer, de la Compagnie des Seigneurs de Saint-Christophe (Saint-Kitts). D'Esnambuc, entouré d'hommes de sac et de corde, se partage l'île avec des aventuriers anglais. Ils ne font pas fortune. Mais ces hommes-là n'ont rien à perdre.

En 1635, Charles de L'Olive et Jean d'Ossonville, deux lieutenants de D'Esnambuc, s'emparent de la Guadeloupe, qui est habitée par des Caraïbes, au nom d'une Compagnie française des îles de l'Amérique qui les finance et succède à la Compagnie des seigneurs de Saint-Christophe, tandis que D'Esnanbuc, avec 150 autres aventuriers, chassés de St Christophe, s'établit en Martinique.

Une guerre s'engage évidemment avec les autochtones lorsque ces derniers comprennent, après les avoir vu arriver avec un certain amusement, que ces va-nu-pieds parfois contraints de manger leurs bottes, dévorés par les moustiques, ont l'intention de les déposséder, voire de les exterminer.

Ces premiers colons des Antilles vivotent en cultivant le tabac, aidés par quelques «engagés», de pauvres hères venus de France, à la recherche d'une nouvelle vie.

En 1641, après six ans de résistance, les derniers Caraïbes de la Guadeloupe, massacrés par L'Olive, devenu tout puissant après la mort de son associé, sont déportés sur l'île de la Dominique. Mais les Caraïbes ont du mal à accepter d'avoir été spoliés par les envahisseurs. Des raids sporadiques, notamment sur Marie-Galante, se produiront jusque vers 1658.

En 1642, d'autres aventuriers français débarquent à Madagascar, mais la vive résistance des autochtones ne leur permettra pas d'y rester. Chassés en 1674, ils se replieront alors sur les îles voisines qu'ils rebaptiseront l'île Bourbon (La Réunion (http://une-autre-histoire.org/pourquoi-la-reunion-sappelle-la-reunion/)) et l'île de France (l'île Maurice).

Louis XIII (http://une-autre-histoire.org/louis-xiii/), roi très croyant, était opposé à la mise en esclavage des Africains et, malgré l'intervention pressante de ses confesseurs, jusque sur son lit de mort, ne consentit jamais à une légalisation.

Mais après l'avènement de Louis XIV, son fils, en 1643, et la prise en charge effective par ce dernier du pouvoir en 1661, qui correspond au développement de l'économie sucrière, les choses vont prendre une tout autre tournure.

L'homme d'affaires Charles Houel (http://une-autre-histoire.org/charles-houel-biographie/) est nommé gouverneur de la Guadeloupe et il y introduit la culture de la canne à sucre, déjà pratiquée en Martinique sous l'impulsion d'un Hollandais, Daniel Trezel.

La canne à sucre nécessite de grandes propriétés et une abondante main-d'œuvre.

En 1649 Charles Houel, profitant des difficultés financières de la Compagnie française des îles de l'Amérique, achète à vil prix la Guadeloupe et ses dépendances pour son propre compte, avec le projet de la rentabiliser en imitant l'exemple donné à la Barbade et la Jamaïque par les Anglais qui se sont lancés dans la culture de la canne de manière très agressive. Sous l'autorité de Houël, l'arrivée des esclaves déportés d'Afrique s'intensifie à partir de 1650.

En 1654, 900 juifs hollandais, expulsés du Brésil par les Portugais, s'installent, grâce à Houël, à la Guadeloupe avec leur savoir faire, leurs esclaves et leurs économies. Parmi eux, les Bologne, originaires de Rotterdam, ancêtres du chevalier de Saint-George (http://une-autre-histoire.org/le-chevalier-de-saint-george-biographie/) (l'entreprise Bologne, probablement la plus ancienne d'Amérique, existe toujours à la Guadeloupe et continue, pour distiller du rhum, à cultiver de la canne sur les terres acquises en 1654).

C'est leur arrivée qui va accélérer le développement aux Antilles françaises de l'industrie sucrière. Les « Hollandais » rachètent les terres jusque là consacrées au tabac par les petits planteurs.

Une propriété sucrière, pour être rentable, est en moyenne 4 fois plus grande qu'une propriété destinée à la culture du tabac ou tout simplement vivrière : pas moins d'une cinquantaine de « carreaux » (unité de l'époque représentant 1,29 ha) et pas moins d'un esclave par « carreau ».

Dès 1656, il y a 3000 esclaves d'origine africaine à la Guadeloupe, pour une population de 15000 habitants.

Pendant ce temps, en Afrique, la Compagnie normande est rachetée, en 1658, par la Compagnie du Cap-vert et du Sénégal. Mazarin lui accorde le monopole de la traite.

En 1664, est créée la Compagnie des Indes occidentales sous l'autorité du jeune roi Louis XIV qui charge du dossier son ministre Colbert (http://une-autre-histoire.org/colbert-biographie/). Fondée à Ndar (rebaptisée Saint-Louis) mais basée au Havre, elle dispose d'un capital de 6 millions de livres. Elle est déclarée propriétaire, pendant 40 ans, des territoires que la France s'est appropriée sur les côtes d'Afrique. Elle a le monopole du commerce avec l'Amérique.

La Compagnie des Indes occidentales obtient le monopole de la traite (jusque là détenue par la Compagnie du Cap-Vert et du Sénégal) dont elle va en fait peu se servir, car elle mise encore sur le tabac, provoquant de ce fait la colère des colons des Antilles qui importent des esclaves en contrebande – et à prix élevé – en se fournissant chez les Hollandais.

La même année 1664, Louis XIV, prenant le parti des planteurs, dissout la Compagnie des îles d'Amérique. Évinçant Houël (http://une-autre-histoire.org/charles-houel-biographie/), il fait racheter la Guadeloupe et ses dépendances par la Compagnie des Indes occidentales qu'il vient de créer. Il impose aux planteurs le régime de l'Exclusif qui les oblige a commercer exclusivement avec la métropole, pour le plus grand profit des ports atlantiques.

Très curieusement, c'est à la fin de cette année 1664 que la Reine accouche publiquement au Louvre d'une fille dont plusieurs témoins ont affirmé qu'elle était « un peu moresque ». Une fille officiellement décédée au bout de quelques jours mais qui réapparaîtra dans la croyance populaire comme Mauresse de Moret (http://une-autre-histoire.org/la-mauresse-de-moret/). Il s'agirait bien plutôt d'une fille du roi, tout comme le Masque de fer (http://une-autre-histoire.org/le-masque-de-fer/) pourrait être l'un de ses fils. Le fait d'être esclavagiste n'est nullement incompatible avec le fantasme de la femme noire (http://une-autre-histoire.org/la-femme-noire-fantasmes-et-stereotypes/).

Enfin, c'est en 1664 que Louis XIV lance les travaux pharaoniques du château de Versailles (100 millions de livres) avec le projet d'y installer autour de lui une cour qui puisse lui rendre un culte comme s'il était un dieu vivant, ce qu'il imposera en 1682. Il est remarquable de constater à quel point les historiens se font discrets sur la manière dont ces travaux seront financés.

Voulant développer le commerce du sucre et l'esclavage, Louis XIV décide de passer à la vitesse supérieure. Il supprime en 1671 le monopole de la traite, ce qui donne aux armateurs des grands ports la possibilité d'envoyer des bateaux en Afrique et d'amorcer ainsi ce qu'on appellera le commerce triangulaire. Départ de bateaux depuis Bordeaux, Nantes et la Rochelle, chargés de marchandises de qualité médiocres (fusils « de traite », munitions, alcool, verroterie) destinées à payer les intermédiaires préposés à la fourniture d'esclaves et à l'approvisionnement du bateau pour poursuivre le voyage. Embarquement d'esclaves razziés par des sous-traitants locaux (travaillant pour le compte, sous la protection et sous l'autorité d'Européens), débarquement aux Antilles des esclaves échangés contre des barils de sucre de canne et du ravitaillement pour le retour. Retour au port d'attache et vente du produit final avec, parfois, 300 % de bénéfice net, une fois l'équipage rémunéré et les les équipements spéciaux de l'expédition payés (les chaînes, dont la Suède s'était fait une spécialité).

En 1672, la France entre en guerre contre la Hollande et la Compagnie des Indes occidentales, dont le fonctionnement est perturbé par les hostilités et dont Louis XIV désapprouve la politique axée sur la culture du tabac, cesse de fonctionner en 1673, pour être finalement dissoute en 1674 avec un passif de 5 millions de livres.

Les Antilles sont à partir de ce moment directement rattachées à la couronne et deviennent des colonies françaises.

Pour accélérer ce système économique nouveau fondé sur la traite et l'esclavage, Louis XIV a créé, dès [illegible] massive de négriers venus des ports français qui, s'il elle abaisse le coût de transport, fait grimper le prix d'achat des esclaves, met vite en difficulté la nouvelle société, qui ne dispose plus d'aucun monopole de traite. Mais peu importe. Le commerce triangulaire est en expansion. C'est ce que voulait le roi qui n'hésite pas à investir personnellement dans les « start-up » négrières. Toute la cour va évidemment l'imiter.

L'ère de la culture du tabac s'achève en 1674, avec la création de la ferme du tabac (http://une-autre-histoire.org/les-financiers-de-lesclavage/) qui ruine tous les planteurs français des Antilles mais enrichit les financiers de Louis XIV (http://une-autre-histoire.org/les-financiers-de-lesclavage/).

L'esclavage se développe à la Martinique en même temps que la culture du sucre. En 1674, il y a 2400 esclaves à la Martinique. Huit ans plus tard, on en dénombrera 16 000.

L'expansion française se poursuit avec la fondation du « comptoir» de Pondichéry en 1674, l'établissement définitif de la colonie de Guyane en 1676, le débarquement en Louisiane de l'explorateur Cavelier de La Salle en 1682.

Mais le développement de l'esclavage provoque immanquablement des unions entre les maîtres et des esclaves africaines. Les maîtres ont du mal a considérer leur descendance comme du bétail. C'est là un problème.

En 1677 les Français s'emparent de l'île de Gorée et de Rufisque.

En 1684, Louis XIV crée la Compagnie de Guinée pour développer la traite et le commerce du sucre entre Nantes et Saint-Domingue, dont il rêve de faire la plus grande colonie du monde. La compagnie a l'obligation de transporter au moins « 1000 nègres par an ».

La création de la Compagnie de Guinée donne lieu en 1687 au débarquement à Assinie (Côte d'Ivoire) de Ducasse (né à Pau) ancien marin négrier devenu directeur de la Compagnie du Sénégal et de son acolyte, le chevalier d'Amon, capitaine négrier. Tous deux, pour faire prospérer leurs affaires, ramèneront en France Aniaba (http://une-autre-histoire.org/aniaba-biographie/).

En 1701, après le traité de Ryswick qui met sur le trône d'Espagne le petit-fils de Louis XIV, et surtout consolide l'implantation des Français dans l'île prometteuse de Saint-Domingue, le roi, conseillé par ses richissimes financiers – Antoine Crozat, Samuel Bernard (http://une-autre-histoire.org/les-financiers-de-lesclavage/) – impose à la Compagnie de Guinée, dont il est actionnaire, le rythme de 3000 Africains par an.

C'est à ce moment que le préjugé de «race» devient une nécessité pour pérenniser l'institution esclavagiste.

Dès 1673, la législation se durcit et devient franchement raciale, les enfants d'une mère esclave et d'un colon subissant désormais le sort de la mère.

Elle aboutira au Code noir (http://une-autre-histoire.org/le-code-noir/) en 1685. Non seulement c'est le texte juridique le plus monstrueux qui soit, comme l'a souligné le philosophe Louis Sala-Molins (http://une-autre-histoire.org/esclavage-reparations-louis-sala-molins-dynamite-largument-de-l-anachronisme/), mais c'est surtout le plus cynique. Ainsi, par exemple, sous prétexte d'obliger les colons à prendre soin de leurs vieux esclaves devenus improductifs et de soigner les malades, le code noir incite en fait à faire mourir les déportés en cinq ans et à économiser sur leur nourriture pour en tirer un profit maximal permettant de racheter cinq ans plus tard un esclave tout neuf. Cette consommation rapide de l'esclave accélérant évidemment le rythme de la traite, tout le monde y trouvait son compte. Sauf les Africains.

En un siècle et demi, la France allait déporter 1 200 000 hommes, femmes et enfants. Les opérations de capture et de transport occasionnèrent un nombre de morts qu'on peut estimer, rien que pour la France, à 6 millions.

Louis XIV accorde des titres de noblesse aux colons pour les encourager à préserver la «pureté du sang» en s'alliant avec des familles nobles de France.

Il donnera l'exemple en épousant en 1683 (mais de nuit et fort discrètement) Françoise d'Aubigné (http://une-autre-histoire.org/louis-xiii/), née à la prison de Niort où était incarcéré son père, Constant d'Aubigné (http://une-autre-histoire.org/constant-daubigne-le-beau-pere-negrier-de-louis-xiv/), un escroc et un assassin qui, après s'être lié avec D'Esnanbuc, deviendrait colon en Martinique.

Des théories forgées par des illuminés comme Isaac La Peyrère (http://une-autre-histoire.org/isaac-la-peyrere/) et mettant en cause l'unité de la nature humaine – en contradiction avec le dogme chrétien – apparaissent dès 1655. Dans ce sillage, l'aventurier François Bernier (http://une-autre-histoire.org/francois-bernier-1620-1680/) lance l'idée de « races humaines » dans un article à sensation publié anonymement le 24 avril 1684.

D'abord combattues, ces théories seront finalement acceptées et, sous l'impulsion des «philosophes» des Lumières, deviendront un dogme officiel.

Ces théories qu'on range sous le terme de « polygénisme » ont l'avantage de mettre les Africains au ban de l'humanité, voire d'en faire des animaux. Elles justifient tout le mal qu'on peut leur faire, l'esclavage et le maintien de la « pureté raciale » dans les colonies.

Pendant tout le XVIIIe siècle et jusqu'en 1791, l'esclavage va se développer de manière exponentielle. le nombre d'esclaves atteindra le chiffre prodigieux de 500 000 à Saint-Domingue, qui, conformément aux vues de Louis XIV, deviendra la plus grande colonie du monde. Le rapport de 10 esclaves pour un Européen ne pouvait qu'aboutir au grand soulèvement de 1791.

Les théories racistes vont imprégner les esprits pendant un siècle. Malgré l'abolition de la traite, puis de l'esclavage, elles ne cesseront de se développer en France – appuyées par de prétendus arguments scientifiques – et légitimeront une seconde période d'expansion coloniale.

Cette période, malgré une apparente « décolonisation », n'est hélas pas révolue; et les théories racistes, apparues en France vers 1670, triomphent encore, trois siècles et demi plus tard, sous différents avatars : droit à la « différence », promotion de la « diversité », des minorités « visibles », de la « négritude » (avec un détournement raciste du sens initial, purement littéraire) etc.

Non seulement le substantif « noir » est utilisé couramment dans la presse française du XXIe siècle pour désigner les Africains et les Afro-descendants, mais il est étendu d'office à toute personne dont l'arbre généalogique comporte un ancêtre africain ou afro-descendant à moins de cinq générations – sans tenir compte des ancêtres européens – selon le principe raciste (tiré du code noir et développé pendant tout le XVIIIe siècle) que le mélange d'un Européen avec un « nègre » est une flétrissure qui ne s'efface jamais.

Au XXIe siècle encore, dans la presse et l'édition française, pour bien souligner la spécificité de la « race nègre », le substantif « noir » (ou « blanc ») prend généralement la majuscule (qui ne se justifie, selon l'ouvrage de référence Le bon usage, de Grévisse, que s'il s'agit d'un groupe homogène, d'une nation et certainement pas du fait de la couleur de peau) tandis que cet usage, pour d'autres groupes humains, est formellement proscrit, par la presse et l'édition, comme raciste.

Le terme de « race », pourtant inacceptable, reste ancré dans la constitution et la législation française, au motif très curieux que ce maintien serait indispensable à la lutte contre le racisme.

Cette situation s'explique facilement : malgré les progrès de la génétique qui ont permis de les réfuter depuis longtemps, les élucubrations racistes du 17e siècle, parce qu'elles ont fait la preuve de leur rentabilité, ont toujours la même utilité dans la politique de mise en coupe réglée de l'Afrique. Dans la politique aussi d'exploitation de ses habitants et de leurs descendants, quel que soit l'endroit du monde où ils demeurent.

Chantal ATTARD BEAUNE
Je suis bouleversée par tout ce que je viens de lire.
J'ai un grand intérêt, depuis longtemps, pour le roi Louis XIV et tout ce qu'il a fait, sur sa vie, son règne.
J'ai lu beaucoup de documents, de livres. Mais je ne savais pas tout cela. Cela m'attriste profondément.

Charles-Denis Belhomme
Il y a des noms qui sont devenus pitoyables. Il était aux antipodes des idées de son père. En dépit de tout, il n'a pas été un créateur.
Même si ses successeurs ont suivi ses pas pour les mêmes motifs.

Anna Dupuy-Diatta

Cette importante page documentaire m'a marquée. L'histoire, chronologiquement dévoilée ici , est très importante pour comprendre pourquoi Louis XIV est rentré dans un processus auquel son père était hostile. Et le rôle des cardinaux revient avec force. Merci pour ce développement qui nous offre un éclairage, complètement occulté, sur les raisons des créations des compagnies négrières françaises que l'on savait changer très souvent de nom et de directeurs.
Très intéressante aussi cette notion d' « homme noir » qui, peu à peu construite, devient la base (politiquement souhaitée et soutenue par les scientifiques) du racisme primaire, cynique, aux Antilles, et qui fera le lit d'une sous-culture bâtie sur le mensonge, l'ignominie, la cruauté, la cupidité et l'absurde.

Quémon Bernard

Attendez les préceptes moraux ou autres états d'âme liée à l'éducation des rois de France, seraient une voie de garage si on devait, trouver les causes premières de l'accélération de la traite et de l'esclavage.
Le passage de la colonie d'habitation à la colonie de plantation en lien direct avec les nouveaux besoins colossaux des métropoles(thé, café, indigo, sucre…outre les minerais précieux quand on en trouvait) expliqué directement cette explosion, et tous les monarques d'Europe dans la course aux colonies y ont adhéré.. quelque soit leur éducation. Le fait majeur reste donc économique, et la vente de charges royales pour développer les colonies, en même temps que pour remplir les caisses de l'État, guident toutes les initiatives, et vont déterminer les postures et décisions des dirigeants. Madame, n'ayez point d'affliction donc par rapport à Louis 14. Comme les poules qui grattent la terre pour se nourrir et auraient gratté même les planchers luxueux de Versailles, Louis 14 grattait et legiferait en faveur d'un système, pour enrichir la France et sa politique de prestige.

Fondé Camara

Est ce que les noirs ont été utilisés pour la construction du château de Versailles ? Si oui comment et dans quelles conditions ?

Cath

Cette question de l'utilisation des noirs pour financer la construction de Versailles est digne d'un réel intérêt. Je reconnais avoir eu la même intuition. Je me questionne aussi sur la voix de « une autre histoire » qui a mon avis mérite d'être largement entendue. Tous les articles sont passionnants. Or je ne parviens pas a avoir de contact avec les fondateurs alors que j'aimerais pouvoir citer « une autre histoire » dans ma thèse de doctorat… Qu'en pensez vous?

The ancient Alpin religion, which was called Celtic-Druidism, was characteristically a Black-Canaanite ritual called Baalism or Ham-ism.
Canaanite were black Africans who settled in the area of Canaan.

Druidism, which also promoted the One-God worship, had existed long before Judaism, Christianity and Islamism, by which many Jewish, Christian and Islamist values are borrowed (Christmas tree, Easter, etc.).

The Canaanite Chief God El or El-Elyon, also called the “Most High God,” was adopted by the Hebrews (Num. 24:16).

We know that druids were blacks or descendants of ancient African priests who settled in these areas. They were the ones possessing the knowledge of spirituality and civilization.

We also know that all these practices were invented and brought by black Africans because of ancient Greek writings.

Diodorus Siculus wrote:

"The Ethiopians were first of all humans, and they first believed and worshiped the gods"

"...the first of them showed how to honor the gods..."

Africans were known to be the spiritual people of this planet. Even in ancient Rome, they used to invite Africans (Black) priests, Isiac priests to do the rituals. Isiac priests were African priests who served in foreign lands.

Please, don't twist black history.
Vikings were doing their work as Vikings in that area.

The Indians, Chinese etc were all doing their own thing.

They were all powerful. The only thing was that, black peoples were dominant when it comes to super power in terms of spirituality and communicating to the outside world.

We transformed spiritual things into reality. My father used to call me through telepathic. This form of communication is still exist in our family.

Black peoples were very powerful but didn't have anything to do with Viking job.

Musah Shaibu It's not me, it's Snorri Sturluson an Icelandic historian, poet, and politician. He was elected twice as lawspeaker of the Icelandic parliament, the Althing. He is commonly thought to have authored or compiled portions of the Prose Edda, which is a major source for what is today known as Norse mythology, and Heimskringla, a history of the Norwegian kings that begins with legendary material in Ynglinga saga and moves through to early medieval Scandinavian history. For stylistic and methodological reasons, Snorri is often taken to be the author of Egil's saga. He was assassinated in 1241 by men claiming to be agents of the King of Norway.

Excellent fact. Many confuse Vikings with an ethnic group. It was actually an occupation. There were Asian, African, and Mediterranean Vikings. One of my favorite was Thorhall the Blak Celt who discovered America with Eric the Red,father of Leif Erikson. Another great point is your mentioning of the Canaanite religious contributions of El, Yahweh, Asherah, Ba'al , Mot, Yam, etc. [That was brave]. 22

He is talking about dark elves, people. Mythology. In other words symbolic light vs. dark mythology not literal african people.

"Dökkálfar ("Dark Elves")[a] and Ljósálfar ("Light Elves")[b] are two contrasting types of elves; the dark elves dwell within the earth and have a dark complexion, while the light elves live in Álfheimr, and are "fairer than the sun to look at". The Ljósálfar and the Dökkálfar are attested in the Prose Edda, written in the 13th century by Snorri Sturluson."

The word Baalism come from the word Baal who was a false God that was made up by Africans . Into the original Hebrews who are African had become Jehovah chosen people and taught the Ethiopians how to serve the true God Jehovah because the world had got away from serving the true God and started to create there own which was false Gods . That's what Queen Sheba who is from Ethiopia went to so called Israel which was called something different back then to seek wisdom from Solomon because the word had spread that the true God Jehovah was with them 8

The bible shows from the beginning all mankind knew that there was one God and deviated from that. The Canaanites and the Hebrews all the other in the same region so there's nothing scandalous about them having similar beliefs being that they have a similar heritage. 2

I have a hard time believing this due to the sheer fact that almost every person from those areas are extremely white with blonde hair and blue eyes.
I am sure there might have been a few Africans that have traveled that area but the extreme majority was white.
It's almost like saying Zulus are white because a few white men arrived there.

Erm... without trying to stir an argument. Could you please list some sources for this claim? Besides the fact that there is hardly any reliable historical evidence, this claim appears very far-fetched and seems to put in question other classical sources which make reference to druids as fair skinned...

Hmmm I don't know if I believe this. 'consious' people want to claim everything and debunk everything at the same time. E.g. king James wrote a book on witchcraft and the (fake) bible but king James was also black?

I doubt this is correct being of Scandinavian decent, but Scandinavians did have allies in the Inuit would are more like American Indians but darker. In viking times 7-10 century white, black and Asians etc had their own empire's.. but no doubt there was blacks joining on a viking with the Scandinavians and Asians etc and no doubt Scandinavians fought with all others. Just saying that the Scandinavians were black is just a misunderstanding of the information you read.

Vikings were Scandinavians, Scandinavia is located between 55th to 70th latitudes North, skin colour is an adaptation to latitude, and the higher to the latitude to either North or South, the lighter the skin colour is.

The answer is 'no'. We do not have any sources telling of any Black Vikings.

Perhaps there may have been Moors or Numidians captured in Mediterranean ventures, but we do not have any evidence there were.

Unfortunately peer reviewed research doesn't support this theory… Black people have done enough great things to celebrate, we don't need to appropriate Scottish and Irish culture… 1

The sad part of all this "Egyptians were black, vikings were black, everything was black" is the fact that it only exists because hand wringing long nosed slave ship owners stole Africans from their ancestral home, and sold them into slavery around the world. With that they lost not only their ancestral home, but their family and cultural heritage as well. Now while most of the rest of the world can trace back and be proud of their family and people's heritage, POC are left to try to piece together a past based on tiny bits of information left scattered around the world. Sure Africans had their fingers in every part of the globe, the same way that the Mongols did, and the Greeks and Roman's did, and Western Europeans did. That doesn't mean that you can lay claim to other people's ancestors achievements. I know this is going to fall on deaf ears, but the truth is the truth. Stop complaining about people appropriating your culture, all while attempting to appropriate everyone else's culture.

The Palace of Emperor (Atse) Yohannes IV, constructed in the 1880's, Mekelle, Tigray Region, Ethiopia.

Emperor Yohannes IV, king of Tigray from 1869 to 1872 and Emperor of Ethiopia from 1872 to his death in 1889, rose to power during a tumultuous period, aided the British in their punitive expedition against Emperor Tewodros II and then defeated his successor, Tekle Giyorgis II, in battle, taking the imperial throne for himself. Yohannes gained international renown for defeating two invasions by the Khedivate of Egypt, who's armies were crushed at the Battles of Gundet (1875) and Gura (1876), but the Emperor was ultimately killed by Mahdist Sudanese forces at the Battle of Gallabat near the Sudanese border in 1889.

In the first ten years of Emperor Yohannes' rule, he had no fixed capital though he frequented Adwa, where he usually celebrated Meskel, Amba Chara and Semera. In the early 1880's he finally chose Mekelle as his capital, where he erected a new palace.

Excerpts from "Historical orientation of Yohannes IV Palace in Mekelle, Tigray State, Ethiopia, from the aspects of planning and building techniques", by Nobuhiro Shimizu and Alula Tesfay Asfha:

"The Yohannes IV Palace, located in Mekelle, the present regional capital of Tigray, Ethiopia, was constructed in the 1880s supervised by the Italian craftsman Giacomo Naretti. This study aims to clarify its historical orientation by analyzing its location, planning, and building elements, by considering Naretti's contribution, the building's relationship with local masonry buildings, and the characteristics of the preceding Ethiopian palace quarters. Through the research activities, it becomes clear that the palace's locational characteristics are in common with the preceding Ethiopian palace sites, especially Gondar. Its planning methods are similar to that of the former residential site of Yohannes IV, which was constructed without foreign builders. Its basic building elements were derived from the former Tigray's church buildings. Although these results suggest that the palace was a local product of the Ethiopian emperor Yohannes IV, the contribution of Naretti was also evident in more detailed elements of the palace such as the use of elaborate materials, decorative wooden works, stone arches, plaster, and its symmetrical appearance. These design achievements were most likely realized through Naretti's observation of the local building techniques and the natural environment, and his training of the local craftsmen during his stay in Ethiopia from 1871.

Atsé Yohannes IV, a Tigray-born noble known as Kahsay before his coronation, became Ethiopia's "King of Kings" in 1872. For the first ten years of his rule, he did not have a fixed capital for his empire and used to frequent several sites, such as Adwa. However, in the early 1880s, he chose Mekelle as his administrative center and ordered his people to construct his palace there. The palace's main building's construction was completed in 1886, participated by Giacomo Naretti, an Italian craftsman who served the emperor in 1871, and other supportive members such as Ingdashet Schimper, the half-Ethiopian son of German botanist Wilhelm Schimper, and local "skillful masons and carpenters". In the palace compound, another building has continued to remain, too. This building was constructed after the main building's completion under Yohannes IV's order and was used as a residence for daily living.

Knowledge of foreigners' participation often elicits a simplistic assumption that the target building was constructed using building techniques derived from abroad.

However, the foreignness of the building should not be assumed without examining the local building techniques, because Tigray has a long history of masonry techniques spanning the Yeha temple in the 7th century B.C. to Aksumite Kingdom at its peak in the 4th century A.D. In its capital city Aksum, and in several other sites, various stone monuments such as masonry structures of royal tombs, palaces, churches, obelisks, and monolithic stelae were produced. Christianity's adoption led to the construction of churches as an official house of worship in the 4th century.

The erstwhile palace quarters of the Ethiopian emperors also provide clues about the localness of the targeted palace of Mekelle. For instance, Gondar, the capital city of Ethiopia in the 17th and 18th centuries, had a royal enclosure containing castles, halls, churches, and other buildings; however, they were abandoned in a ruinous state in the early 19th century, before Yohannes IV took power.

The compound of the Yohannes IV Palace is enclosed by stone walls as in the royal enclosure of Gondar, although parts of the walls have been removed. In the past, the enclosure walls consisted of outer and inner rounded walls running along the topography and a linear wall splitting the inner circle. A part of the linear wall was occupied by the symmetric grand entrance of the main building, and the semi-circular courtyard in front of the grand entrance had a formal appearance. Accordingly, the outer wall, which was at least three-quarters of a mile round, provided loopholes for musketry and guard houses for defense. More private facilities, such as apartments, stables, and store houses, sat in the innermost part of the enclosure. The garden had "a very good unfailing spring of water… and a small stream runs within 50 yards of the main gate"

Smith (1890) provided the earliest known reference about the palace's condition. A comparison of accounts from his texts with the current condition can help clarify the early usage of each room of the main building with approximately 36 × 15 m dimensions. Accordingly, from the grand entrance to the northwest, one can directly enter “a banqueting hall” with ten stone masonry pillars through “a heavy double door of Abyssinian wood”. The elongated banqueting hall was connected to another ground floor room of “a large audience or council chamber” in the back. The hall was also linked to the upper floor through “a double flight of broad well-built stairs,” although the emperor did not “overcome a dislike to going upstairs” at the time. The upper floor had “a number of apartments of various sizes, all well lighted and airy”. This differs from the current condition because a room with two wooden pillars is spatially unified presently. The roof above the banqueting hall was “a fine promenade” with scenic views, surrounded by “the castellated parapets”. In addition, there are four “castellated turrets” at each corner of the southeastern room and two rooms on the northwest side facing the frontage, although these were incorrectly recorded or not recorded by Smith. According to Tadesse, corner rooms in the upper floor including castellated turrets were used as guard rooms. As a side note, the guard’s spaces were also installed on the flanks of the grand entrance.

To south of the main building, there was a rectangular building of approximately 18 × 8 m, which was used as the private residence of Mengesha (son of Yohannes IV) and his wife. According to Wylde, they lived in the “two separate houses joined by a covered bridge” of the upper floor, while the ground floor was used for “attendants, kitchen and store-houses.”

According to Wylde, the main garden was connected to the backside of the main building’s room of “a set of apartments.” The garden was “a well-kept lawn with many shady trees, and some good orange, lime, peach and myrtle bushes” with “a nicely built summer-house where private guests are received, and where the mid-day meal is generally partaken with his favourite followers.” In addition to this garden, there was another private garden that was used by Mengesha’s wife, connected to the adjoining enclosure in which Mengesha’s mother lived.

The analysis clarified that the criteria for selecting the palace’s location at its vantage point and the existence of enclosure walls for protection against enemies were elements that were common with preceding Ethiopian palace sites, especially Gonder. Regarding planning, the separation of non-private and private buildings and the existence of the hall (locally named aderash) with rows of pillars were similar to the Kahsay Castle, a former residential site of Yohannes IV, whose construction was done without foreign builders. The building elements show that the construction method consisting of stone walls with wooden horizontal beams and wooden ceilings was derived from the former Tigray’s church buildings, or an advanced version of the hïdmo house. Although these inferences suggest that the palace was largely a local product of the Ethiopian emperor in Tigray, the contribution of Naretti, an Italian craftsman who participated in the project of Yohannes IV Palace, could also be found in more detailed parts such as elaborate wooden materials with smoothened surfaces, decorated wooden works, application of arches, and lime mortar plaster. Furthermore, the palace’s appearance represented by the symmetric façade and other material configurations would have been difficult to achieve without Naretti’s superintendence of the construction. His contribution toward the palace construction was the tools and knowledge that he brought, not the materials themselves. He attempted to observe and understand the status of local building techniques and the potentials of the local natural environment to leverage them effectively. Although the resulting outcomes are less apparent and hard to find at first glance, the techniques and knowledge applied in the palace were became rooted in the local through the shared skills of Naretti and steady skill acquisitions of the local builders. They served as important driving forces in the later urban and rural development of Mekelle and surrounding areas."

The Most Brutal Medieval Monarchs

LIST RULES

LIST RULES Vote up the brutal monarchs you really wouldn't want ruling your country.

It's no secret that the word "medieval" evokes negative images, but in the case of these Middle Ages monarchs, those connotations are well-deserved. From callous queens to cutthroat kings and savage saints, we're taking a look at the most brutal monarchs from medieval times who played by their own bloody rules.

So what caused such monarchical madness? Some slaughtered thousands while trying to spread Christianity and expel beliefs they disliked; others nudged tensions between sects of Christianity along, resulting in a mob mentality that took the lives of tens of thousands. Other brutal monarchs, including a number of late medieval Italian royals, enjoyed torturing their enemies in new and creative ways, such as forcing furriers to eat hares whole or creating mummy museums by pickling their rivals. Some kings didn't bother disguising their ambitions, and just added to their burgeoning empires by taking city after city and slaying opponents and new subjects wholesale.

Whatever their reasons for taking out their lovers, friends, and enemies, read through this list and vote up the most violent medieval monarchs.

1 Genghis Khan

- Royal Title: Temujin, Great Khan of the Mongol Empire
- Most Brutal Moment: While carving out a massive empire that stretched across millions of square miles, Genghis Khan and his nomadic Mongolian soldiers took millions of lives. The Mongols once ended an estimated 1.2 million lives while sacking a single city. That's right, over 1 million people in only one battle. In fact, one commentator reported that the Great Khan vanquished so many enemies that their bones formed mountains and the dirt became oily with human fat.

Some of his bloodier moments include using young men as human shields and organizing mass rapes. The latter event probably resulted in many children, making Genghis Khan a direct ancestor of 16 million people today.

2 Galeazzo Maria Sforza

- Royal Title: Galeazzo Maria Sforza, Duke of Milan
- Most Brutal Moment: A master torturer and true evil mastermind, Galeazzo Maria once chopped off a rival's hands and ended a poacher by making him swallow an entire hare.

This 15th-century duke of Milan came by his brutal personality honestly. The surname of his warlord-turned-noble family, Sforza, means "force" in Italian. One contemporary writer recorded how Galeazzo Maria, upon asking a priest how long he would reign in Milan and being told only 11 years, stuck the good father in jail with just a little bit of food. As the story goes, "The man survived on these things, even getting to eat his own excrement, for twelve days. Then he died." Galeazzo Maria was also accused of organizing group assaults on women and dosing his own mother.

3 Godfrey of Bouillon

- Royal Title: Godfrey, King of Jerusalem
- Most Brutal Moment: The Siege of Jerusalem in 1099.

A French nobleman-turned-king of Jerusalem during the First Crusade, Godfrey, along with thousands of other men, marched on the Levant to take land that wasn't theirs in the name of religion. During the Siege of Jerusalem, the final battle for the Holy City, the Franks were savage, burning a number of Jews alive and trampling those seeking sanctuary. The chronicler Fulk of Chartres described the scene: "Indeed, if you had been there you would have seen our feet colored to our ankles with the blood of the slain. But what more shall I relate? None of them were left alive; neither women nor children were spared."

4 Olaf Tryggvason

- Royal Title: Olaf Tryggvason, King of Norway
- Most Brutal Moments: A Viking warrior par excellence, Olaf wasn't afraid of getting his hands dirty - and bloody - when it came to slaying pagans and the treacherous (he once beheaded a slave who took out a royal rival for him).

In the 13th and 14th centuries, Olaf began to appear in poems as the slayer of a man named Raud, a determined follower of Thor. Despite Raud's best magical efforts, legend has it that Olaf's Christian faith dominated, but when Raud refused to accept Christ, Olaf forced a snake into his mouth using a red-hot iron. The serpent went through Raud's neck and ended him. Olaf took Raud's gold, dispatched his followers that wouldn't convert, and brought those that would be baptized into his fold.

The Controversial Indian Caste System Has Been Dividing India for 2000 Years

READ LATER PRINT

A study of genetic populations in India suggests the Indian caste system, a traditional method of social organization into a hierarchy of hereditary groups, has been prevalent in the South Asian society for about 2000 years.

As an overview: the caste system is based on Hindu religious principles and dictates how different groups of people can interact. This hierarchical organization of society only permits marriage within the same caste and dictates that a caste is fixed from birth. Moreover, each caste is linked to a traditional occupation.

Live Science reported that researchers analyzed the DNA of 371 people from 73 groups and reported their findings in the American Journal of Human Genetics . The researchers discovered that different populations began to intermix in India about 4200 years ago, but stopped intermingling approximately 1900 years ago. These results were supported by clues found in ancient texts which suggest class distinctions have existed since about 3000-3500 years ago. Caste divisions became strong approximately two millennia ago.

Three principal groups of people – priests, nobility, and common people – were identified in the 3500-year-old collection of Sanskrit hymns known as the Rigveda. This source doesn't mention segregation or restrictions on employment areas at that time. A fourth group, called the Shudra (the lowest class), was mentioned by 1000 BC. Nonetheless, it wasn't until 100 BC that the holy text Manusmruti mentioned direct prohibition of marriages across castes. This restriction reflects the results of the genetic analysis.

Study co-author Priya Moorjani, a geneticist at Harvard University, explained that although relationships across castes was once common, a "transformation where most groups now practice endogamy [where people marry within their own group]" occurred about 2000 years ago.

The caste system is linked to a Hindu belief in the four varnas - ordering and ranking people by their "innate" spiritual purity. At the highest position are the priests, Brahmins. The warriors, Kshatriyas, are next and the Vaishyas, merchants, follow them. The lowest caste belongs to Shurdas (laborers, artisans, and servants doing ritually "unclean" work.) The Shudra caste was once known as the "untouchables" and they were heavily discriminated against – being unable to drink from wells used by higher castes, participate in religious rituals, or even have their shadows fall on Brahmins.

By the early 20th century India was on its way to independence from the British and the caste system became very controversial. It has been criticized as unfair and discriminatory. Now, the Indian constitution prohibits the use of "untouchable" to describe members of the Shudra caste or discrimination based on caste. With the increase of the information age, the caste system has lost much of its economic importance. However, it remains important to religious practices and continues to be a divisive area of life in India today.

Genesis, which is the story of the Sumerians, the self-described "black-headed people" who came to Earth from another planet, tells us that 'their god' created man, ...but of course there were other men here when they landed, those having survived their global assault that rendered ruin to the surface and created the long Ice Age/nuclear winter. The progenitors of the Sumerian lineage, i.e., Persians and other black-haired races, do not have a history of seeing people as equals, particularly with regard to skin color. But the aboriginal Earth people, those who survived the Ice Age and still somewhat thrive, do have a more moral sense of equality and justice, and bear a different facial appearance – nose points up (not down), finer and fair colored hair, and lighter skin color. The irony is that the black-headed stock of people, to this day, see their own god's creation, from their Genesis story, as not as good as the people who were here before they came. The exception, of course, are those who hang onto a believe that their genetics are special, coming directly from the Noah lineage (via mitochondria DNA of just the four women), and as such have some strange, delusional belief, mission or destiny to rule every inch of the planet – primarily now via the trick known as money, one can assume as conquistadors of sorts, but sometimes called Zionism or other ism.

Nobody gets paid to tell the truth.

G'day April et al.,

An amazing site, thanks on behalf of one and all.

I have been reading up on many of the topics you cover for decades, but in every case you have had new info and insights.

Will ramble a bit, next.

Have you ever compared the step pyramids of Egypt, Mesopotamia and Central and South America. They are so close they had to have the same original architect. I think the intro to the Americas was about 2,000 BC, with the vessels going, well, which way? Benin warriors later crossed, an easy trip for big sailing canoes, see the Olmec statues, but there is also a very close match in dress styles, between the people of Nepal and Tibet, and those of the Peruvian mountains. I once experienced the hospitality of a family of Pyallup Indians, when hitching past Tacoma, and they said, they have been offering such hospitality for a very long time. It was, I took it, a very serious statement. Most human exploration has been by canoe, as those, for crossing rivers, are simply logs with some branches knocked off, so Homo erectus had the tools and the need. I have watched a fox use a log in a river to cross it, here in Oz. Trees being undercut and falling into and across rivers explains back a fair bit further, to the brontosaurus - a canoe, with flippers to haul it over obstructing trees blocking rivers, and a long tail to balance the long neck it had for getting deeper and deeper river mussels. So there were always logs for riverine monkeys.

We westerners are newcomers to exploration, as the Negritos extend from the tip of South America to the Andamans, to Tasmania. Their oldest legends say they knew Australia was here, because the birds told the. Huge flocks, going south, with their needs well understood.

OUR MISSION

At Ancient Origins, we believe that one of the most important fields of knowledge we can pursue as human beings is our beginnings. And while some people may seem content with the story as it stands, our view is that there exist countless mysteries, scientific anomalies and surprising artifacts that have yet to be discovered and explained.

The goal of Ancient Origins is to highlight recent archaeological discoveries, peer-reviewed academic research and evidence, as well as offering alternative viewpoints and explanations of science, archaeology, mythology, religion and history around the globe.

By bringing together top experts and authors, this archaeology website explores lost civilizations, examines sacred writings, tours ancient places, investigates ancient discoveries and questions mysterious happenings. Our open community is dedicated to digging into the origins of our species on planet earth, and question wherever the discoveries might take us. We seek to retell the story of our beginnings.

The Macabre Mystery of the Missing Prince And 'Zombie' King

READ LATER PRINT

In "The Mysterious Death of Tutankhamun", by Paul Doherty he remarks, "There is a passivity about Tutankhamun which is quite chilling." Normally the text in the tombs of other Kings read in the present or future tenses, but as Doherty comments, "The inscriptions about Tutankhamun are always passive, in the main in the third person..."

Unique Aspects of Tutankhamun's Tomb

There is yet more that is quite extraordinary. The important ritual of 'the Opening of the Mouth' was normally carried out by his successor who was never crowned until the required seventy days had passed after the late King's tomb had been sealed. There is a scene in Tutankhamen's tomb showing Ay carrying out the ceremony while already wearing the Crown of a King. The only reasonable answer is that the King had been dead for a long period and was sealed in an earlier tomb. There is every sign that the tomb and coffins were prepared in a great hurry, and that the latter had been moved from a larger tomb.

The eldest Prince and heir to the throne of Egypt after YmnHtp III was TwtMs which means 'Born of the God TWT'. As we have learned from historian Ahmed Osman 'TWT' was Egyptian for the Hebrew 'DWD', in English, DAVID.

His tomb has been found, but it was empty, and from all appearances, though made ready, it was never used. Nor were the final touches showing his funeral and mummification added to the walls. Had he not died so young he would have become the next King of Egypt after SalimAmen III/YmnHtpIII and so named YmnTwtAnkh, 'The Living Gods Amen and David'. But hold on a minute, for that is the very name given to the young king found in 1922 by Howard Carter.

Examining the Familial Lineage

The Ethiopian Kebra Nagast tells us that Menyelek was also named David and that he was the eldest son of King Solomon. We know that Menyelek was YmnTwtAnkh because it is the same name. Twt or David was a Moon God and the Semite equivalent was another Moon God, EL (sometimes known as Iah, Yah or Lah). Ethiopians regarded Prince TwtMs as one of theirs for legend has it that Solomon married a girl from Abyssinia named Etiye Azeb. This has to be correct for the favorite Queen of Ymn Htp III was indeed called 'Etiye' and so must have been Queen Zeba or Sheba (the south-west).

Since Prince TwtMs died in his late teens or early twenties his younger brother assumed the throne alongside their father. Then after Amenhotep III died that brother changed his name from YmnHtp to Akhenaten.

When Akhenaten began to close all temples devoted to the God Ymn – Amen, and tried to change belief to a new unseen God called 'The Aten', the repercussions must have been enormous. Opposition drove him out of the capital city, Uaset, and so he built a new City that he named Akhetaten. We do know that something affected him intensely as proclamations found in the ruins of Akhetaten mention a great evil, greater than any others he had heard.

Panel with scene of Akhenaten and his family adoring the Aten (detail). (Public Domain)

Bringing the Dead Back to Life

With Akhenaten gone from Uaset, the old establishment and priests of Amen saw an opportunity to reinstate the ancient and most popular belief in Amen. Led by Ay and the General Horemheb they sought some way of ridding Egypt of a hated King who had worked thousands of his followers to their deaths. The problem was that the people believed religiously in the right of the eldest living heir to be their king. There could only be one way to replace a King of Egypt. They had to somehow show the people that the older brother had come back to life. After all, they believed that their Kings would rise again, hence the long mummification rituals.

This might well be the terrible evil that Akhenaten referred to in his proclamations. It would also explain his assertion that he was the true king.

Anubis, supervisor of the mummification process. Underneath the lion bed are the four canopic vases, for the organs that were mummified separately. (CC BY SA 2.0)

We should now look at the messages left in the Tomb of YmnTwtAnkh which leave no doubt at all to his true identity as the Missing Prince TwtMs.

Egyptologists often maintain that the tomb was filled hurriedly with personal items belonging to other people. What they fail to add is that these articles were once owned by TwtMs and that the deceased needed their own familiar possessions to take with them in the after-life.

- Solomon and Sheba: Were a Famous Pharaoh and Queen the Real Protagonists in this Love Story?

A whip has the name of TwtMs on the handle. TwtMs had been a Priest in Memphis and the robes were his. A lock of hair from his mother Etiye was in a cofinette, thus adding to the evidence that he was not the son of Akhenaten. TwtMs did go on a campaign against Nubians and the chest in the King's tomb depicts a scene from that battle.

Deciphering the Messages Left Behind

There are also no less than four memorials which all tell us that YmnTwtAnkh was the eldest son of Amenhotep III. Yes, there have been claims that DNA proves that he was the son of Akhenaten which is quite amazing, since his mummy has never been found and identified. At the same time, we have good evidence in the Copper Scroll of Qumran that Akhenaten was the Biblical Moses.

In any case, it is the extensive analysis by Kate Phizakerley that indicates that Akhenaten could not have been the father of YmnTwtAnkh - http://www.kv64.info/2010/03/dna-shows-that-kv55-mummy-probably-not.html. Why too have the DNA results from the 18th Dynasty mummies been locked away and nobody allowed access to them? What are Egyptian Antiquities trying to hide?

The loudest message of all left in the young King's tomb is on the back of his chair. Not only are the names of the Prince TWT MS and the King YMN ANKH TWT both there but his identity as Prince is inscribed in very large hieroglyphs as is the sign of the Ankh hanging from his arm, shouting out that he is alive.

Note the sign of the Ankh hanging from his arm, shouting out that he is alive. (Author provided)

Kings' names were written in what we now call a cartouche. Surprisingly on the chair it is much smaller than his Princely name TWT MS framed in rectangles on both side of his royal figure which are double the size of the cartouche. Whoever designed the chair was leaving no doubt that the two were one and the same and that it was important that anyone in the future seeing inside his tomb would know that this was TWTMS the eldest son of Solomon.

Cartouches on the chair. (Author provided)

At the far sides, left and right, he is holding a long Crook they called 'Hek', Hyksos in Greek, which signified rule over Sheep - a name used in the bible for the Hebrew people of Egypt who recognized the dominant constellation as being Aries. Those Egyptians who still recognized the previous constellation of Taurus as being the Manger where their Son of God was born were the cattle. That is why a number of Pharaohs are shown holding a Crook over one shoulder and a Cattle Flail over the other, showing their position as ruler of both people.

The Chair also depicts two Oxen meaning Victorious and two Arms each holding a Stick meaning powerful (or in Action and Violent). These speak more of the Prince who did fight the Nubians than the picture we have of a meek and physically feeble king.

- Dazzling Nebmaatre: Amenhotep III and the Age of Opulence—Part I

Wooden bust of the boy king, found in his tomb. (Jon Bodsworth)

Other hieroglyphs on the chair stress his being King of the Two Lands and that he was Eternal and a Giver of Life.

This chair and a Stone Ankh which also links the names of the Missing Prince with that of King Tutankhamen can only mean that they were one and the same person. The year of his accession as King was also significant for 1321 BC was a date that the King Born of the God Yah or Iah (MS IAH in Egyptian) was expected to return. This only happened once every 1,460 years when the Annual Heliacal Rising of Sirius coincided with the northern hemisphere summer solstice. The next time wouldn't occur until 139 AD during the Age of Pisces, The Fisherman, which is why the three Wise Kings portrayed in a scene in Solomon's Temple in Luxor were brought back into the latest version of the story that we are more familiar with.

Just how long the Priests of Amen and Ay maintained the pretense of a resurrected Prince who was now the rightful King of Egypt can only be guessed at. The damage done to his mummified remains might well have occurred when they propped the body up on some form of Sedan Chair and paraded it in public for all to view in religious processional ceremonies.

The goal of Ancient Origins is to highlight recent archaeological discoveries, peer-reviewed academic research and evidence, as well as offering alternative viewpoints and explanations of science, archaeology, mythology, religion and history around the globe.

By bringing together top experts and authors, this archaeology website explores lost civilizations, examines sacred writings, tours ancient places, investigates ancient discoveries and questions mysterious happenings. Our open community is dedicated to digging into the origins of our species on planet earth, and question wherever the discoveries might take us. We seek to retell the story of our beginnings.

Le Diplomate Marocain Abdellah Benaïcha (XVIIe siècle):
En 1698, le sultan alaouite Moulay Ismail nomme Abdellah Benaïcha en tant qu'ambassadeur à la cour de France, auprès du roi Louis XIV. IL quitta Rabat pour la France le 11 novembre 1698 afin de négocier un traité entre le Maroc et la France. Une visite largement couverte par les médias français, à l'instar de Le Mercure Galant et La Gazette de France, comme le rapporte Nabil Matar, dans son ouvrage «Dans la terre des Chrétiens : Récits arabes de voyage au cours du XVIIème siècle»
Mais avant de devenir envoyé spécial du sultan alaoutie, Abdellah Benaïcha était l'un des plus célèbres corsaires salétins du XVIIe siècle. Son histoire avant 1698, date de sa nomination par Moulay Ismail, est racontée par l'historienne Leïla Maziane dans son ouvrage «Salé et ses corsaires, 1666-1727» (Edition Publication Univ Rouen Havre, 2008). «Les sources révèlent pour la première fois son existence en 1671 ; il est alors capitaine d'une ''frégate neuve de 100 tonneaux, 2 ponts, 14 pièces de canons, 150 hommes », rapporte-t-elle. Abdellah Benaïcha avait alors 24 ans et était décrit comme un homme de «grande taille et mulâtre».
Un célèbre corsaire puis «Amiral de Salé»
Onze ans plus tard, il devient «Amiral de Salé» avant de se faire capturer par les Anglais. «Un autre captive était le corsaire Abdellah Benaïcha, ayant passé trois ans en Angleterre et qui a été libéré par le roi Charles sans une rançon grâce à l'intervention de James II», raconte l'historien Nabil Matar dans son ouvrage «Turcs, Maures et Anglais à l'âge de la découverte».
«Le 15 novembre 1786, Abdellah Benaïcha, reprend ses anciennes activités et fait main basse sur un navire honfleurais dont l'équipage est réduit en esclavage et ramené à Salé. En 1687, Ben Aïcha prend le commandement d'un navire de 22 canons et le 12 mars, il saisit le Mercier, un navire havrais de 6 canons chargé de blé pour Marseille. Le 20 mars, il rentre à Salé avec une riche prise française, le Saint-Esprit et le Saint-Marie, 2 tartanes chargées d'alun, de riz, et de noisettes.»
Jusqu'en 1691, la multiplication des prises transformera Benaïcha en un idole de Salé. Ce n'est que quelques mois avant d'être nommé par le sultan qu'Abdallah Benaïcha mettra sa carrière de corsaire entre parenthèses.
Une mission diplomatique officielle
Accompagné de son secrétaire Ahmad Sousan et de son lieutenant Mohammad Al-Thughiry, ainsi que d'autres membres de la délégation marocaine dont Benaïcha avait refusé de divulguer les noms, Abdallah Benaïcha quitte le Maroc pour Brest le 11 novembre 1698, dans le cadre d'une mission de négociation d'un traité avec la France.
Le 12 janvier 1699 que Benaïcha quitte enfin Brest après une permission du roi français pour qu'il visite Paris. «Sur sa route via Rennes, Nantes, Angers, Tours et la vallée de la Loire, il a été accueilli par des soirées officielles.

Il est arrivé le 5 février à Paris avant d’arriver à Versailles, le 16 février 1699, pour rencontrer le roi Louis XIV.
Le 26 février, les négociations s'ouvrent à Versailles. «Les Français veulent lui imposer un traité presque semblable à celui de 1682 (ainsi l'article 7 concernant la libération des captifs propose le rachat réciproque à 300 cents livres pièce) ; il refuse», raconte le site Krono Base qui établit une chronologie des événements marquants lors de la mission de l’ambassadeur marocain. Le 5 mai, l’ambassadeur quitte Paris pour se rendre à Brest. Le 10 juin, il débarque à Salé à bord de la frégate de guerre française, la Dauphine.
Leïla Maziane a une autre version. Elle affirme que «lors d’une campagne dans les eaux portugaises au cours de l’été 1711, l’amiral de Salé, en compagnie de son fils et de quatre autres officiers, se fit capturer par les corsaires hollandais à bord du Witte Paard ou Cheval Blanc». L’historienne indique aussi que «pour libérer son amiral et les autres maures, emprisonnés à Lisbonne, le sultan Mûlây Ismâ’îl alla jusqu’à la remise en liberté de tous les sujets hollandais».

ستانلي بوول كان مستشرق وعالم آثار بريطاني كتب كتاب اسماه : < تاريخ المور في الاندلس> هاذ الكتاب يتحدث فيه عن المور الامازيغ في الاندلس و عند ترجمة الكتاب للعربية اختفي المور لانه مصطلح امازيغي جاء من تامورت (الارض) ... ليعوض بمصطلح العرب !!!

هكذا ينسب تاريخ الشعوب الي شعوب اخري بفضل جرة قلم اناس لا يعرفون الامانة العلمية و الصدق في النقل
الصور من ملخص كتاب بوول و كما ستلاحظون يتحدث عن المور الأمازيغ في الاندلس و ليس عن العرب كما يذكره الكتاب العربي المز*ور
ايضا التاريخ السرياني وغيرها من الحضارات
..عندما نقول لكم العروبة تقتات فإنها تقتات.. العروبة لا حضارة ولا تاريخ contributions of Muslims and Jews to the current population of the Peninsula[6], focusing on the E3b2 haplogroup, which is common in northern Africa and present in 5.6% of the Peninsula[9]. The distribution of the Y chromosome haplogroup E-M81 in the Iberian Peninsula suggests genetic flow of North Africa during this period[6]. High levels of patrilineal descent from North Africa and Sephardic Jews in the current population of the Iberian Peninsula have been detected[6] and contributed to the higher genetic diversity in southwestern Europe[10].

В США расследуют жуткое дело по убийству беременной женщины по имени Эшли Буш. Это произошло в конце октября 2022 года.

Как стало известно, женщина по имени Эмбер Уотерман искала беременную женщину, которую планировала похитить и убить. И это все ради того, чтобы украсть нерожденного ребенка.

Обратите внимание Во Львовской области мужчина жестоко убил беременную жену и перерезал себе горло

В США женщина застрелила беременную, чтобы забрать ее ребенка

Так, Эмбер Уотерман создала фейковый аккаунт в фейсбуке и отозвалась на пост одной матери-одиночки Келли, которая искала одежду для беременных. К счастью, женщины так и не встретились.

Однако 31 октября Эмбер Уотерман украла беременную Эшли Буш, после чего застрелила и вытащила из ее тела ребенка. Следователи выяснили, что труп женщины убийца сожгла, а останки закопала.

В то же время Эмбер Уотерман не признала себя виновной и теперь ждет суд, который состоится в июне 2023 года.

Из доказательств была обнаружена кровь в машине преступницы и свидетельство ее мужа, в разговоре с которым она призналась, что убила Эшли Буш. Муж Уотерман также подтвердил, что помог ей сжечь тело женщины и спрятать останки.

Кстати, муж Уотерман, задержанный за соучастие, тоже не признал себя виновным. А похищенная парой дочь погибшей Эшли Буш, по сообщениям СМИ, погибла.

На Киевщине разоблачили еще двух оккупантов, изнасиловавших беременную

Ранее стало известно, что правоохранители объявили подозрение двум российским захватчикам. Они изнасиловали беременную женщину, пытали и грабили людей в Киевской области.

Так, двое вооруженных оккупантов днем на улице набросились на местную жительницу, избили ее, выбили зубы и, приставив к спине автомата, заставили зайти в дом, где изнасиловали. Потерпевшая сказала захватчикам, что беременная и умоляла ее не трогать, однако это не остановило нападающих.

Молитвенный призыв, или азан, который является особенностью звукового ландшафта во многих мусульманских странах, претерпел немало изменений в современную эпоху, пишет Индлиб Фарази Сабер.

Азан появился еще во времена Посланника Аллаха (мир ему), и уже долгие века звучит с минаретов во всем исламском мире. В современную эпоху искусство призыва на молитву претерпело ряд изменений, не все из которых можно оценить как позитивные.

Сейчас азан можно услышать не только в историческом регионе распространения ислама, но и в Европе и Америке. Но в ряде стран публичное произнесение азана запрещено. Суннитский и шиитский азаны имеют небольшие различия. Последний, как правило, включают в себя слова: «Я свидетельствую, что Али – друг Аллаха».

Как произносится азан в 11 странах мира?

В условиях пандемии Ковид-19 в некоторых странах были введены изменения в слова азана. В Кувейте, например, фраза «Спешите на молитву» была заменена на «Молитесь в своих домах», чтобы удержать людей от посещений мечетей.

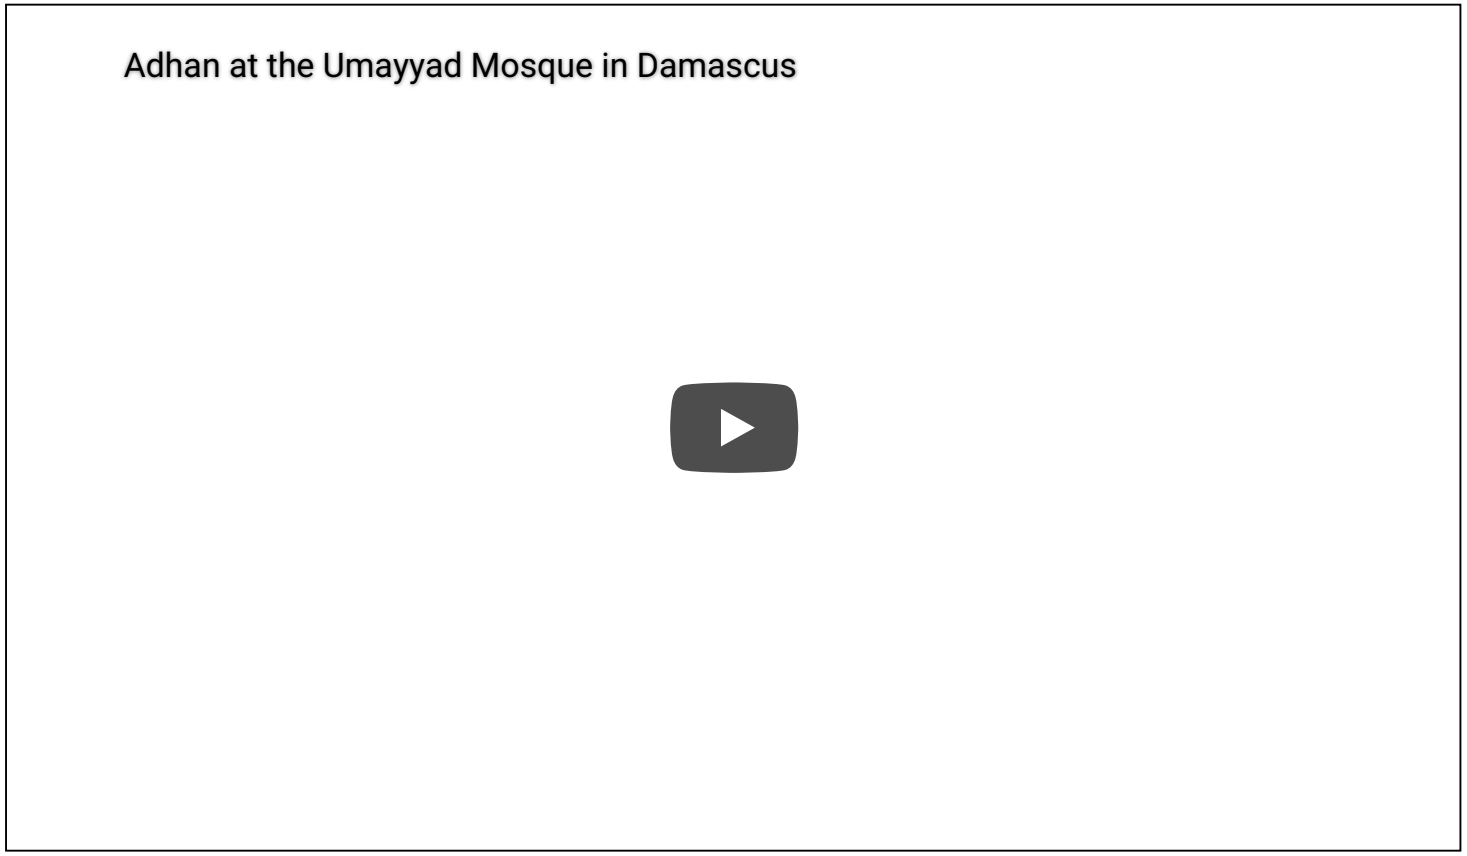
Египетское правительство в 2010 году начало реализацию проекта «Таухид аль-азан» или «Объединение азанов». Предполагалось, что вместо множества азанов, которые звучат в Каире, где по некоторым оценкам насчитывается 4000 официальных мечетей и 30 000 неофициальных, один муэдзин будет воспроизводить стандартизированный азан по государственному радио. Проект вызвал множество споров.

Тунисские муэдзины проходят курсы в консерватории.

Как говорит шейх Ахмад Саад, директор института Ихсан, британского центра изучения ислама, это было началом упадка искусства произнесения азана в Египте. Он рассказывает: «Раньше в каждой провинции проводились прослушивания, и кандидаты должны были пройти тесты и экзамены, чтобы убедиться, подходят ли они для этой работы [произнесения азана]».



По его словам, при воплощении в жизнь проекта объединения азанов все это исчезнет. Вместо этого в каждой из 29 провинций Египта назначается один муэдзин, который произносит призыв на молитву в одной из мечетей, а затем этот азан транслируется в прямом эфире по всей местности. Это “размывание традиции” печалит шейха Саада: «По моему мнению, мелодии азана теряются… ланшафт азана теперь кажется бесплодным».

Али Ахмад Мулла – муэдзин, 40 лет произносящий азан в Запретной мечети.

Одним из мест, где призыв к молитве все еще остается искусством, является древний город Дамаск. В мечети Омейядов шесть муэдзинов вместе читают азан, который транслируется через громкоговорители, установленные на трех минаретах. Такое групповое чтение азана известно как Аль-Джавк, и возникло оно 500 лет назад.

Как рассказывает шейх Саад, раньше существовала разница между макамами азана для каждого из намазов. Сейчас это соблюдается далеко не всегда. «Тогда не было часов, и люди занятые на работе, на своем поле, или незрячие, которые не видели, какое время суток, просто услышав азан, знали, какой это намаз», – говорит шейх.

Первые муэдзины в исламе.

Например, азан, читаемый в нахавандском макаме, названном в честь провинции Нахаванд в Иране, где он возник, меланхоличен и часто используется для послеполуденной (аср) молитвы в четверг, чтобы отметить наступление пятницы, священного дня в исламе. А классический макам баяти, описываемый как «расслабляющий с теплыми, глубокими тонами», считался больше подходящим для призыва на полуденную (зухр) молитву. Медленный и спокойный ритм макама сабах обычно слышен на рассвете, а быстрый ритм макама сегах часто ассоциируется с вечерней (магриб) молитвой, когда время может быть ограничено. «Магриб – это время, когда мусульмане разговляются (во время Рамадана и дополнительных постов вне священного месяца). Поэтому им может быть не до того, чтобы слушать долгий азан. Кроме того, в месяц Рамадан после разговения люди готовятся к дополнительным вечерним намазам таравихам. Поэтому этот азан и молитву не затягивают», – говорит имам Хафиз Али Тос из Центральной мечети Кембриджа в Англии.

По словам шейха Саада, должность муэдзина требует немалой подготовки. «Полное обучение муэдзина может занять от шести месяцев до года, все зависит от того, насколько быстро он сможет уловить тонкости макамов, насколько хорош его слух и способности», – говорит он.

Как объясняет шейх, раньше требований к муэдзинам было больше. Они должны были хорошо разбираться в таджвиде, правилах произношения и быть пунктуальными хранителями времени, способными точно определить, когда наступает очередной намаз. Кроме того, они должны были быть достаточно физически подготовленными, чтобы подниматься (и спускаться) по длинной винтовой лестнице на вершину минарета пять раз в день. «В армии тренироваться было легче», – шутит шейх Саад.

Участник еврейской ортодоксальной секты "Лев Тахор" Исраэль Амир смог сбежать из экстремистской организации в 2019 году, однако был вынужден оставить там своего малолетнего сына. В прошлом году полиция Мексики провела рейд в комплексе в городе Тапачула, где проживали члены "Лев Тахор", освободила ребенка и передала его отцу. 22-летний Исраэль Амир в интервью британскому изданию BCC рассказал свою историю.

По словам молодого мужчины, лидер группы Шломо Хельбранс неоднократно насиловал маленьких детей. Кроме этого, несовершеннолетних отбирали у родителей, чтобы полностью их контролировать. Физические наказания были обычным делом в секте, утверждает Амир.

Секта "Лев Тахор": что о ней известно

"Лев Тахор" — ортодоксальная религиозная организация, которую в СМИ иногда называют "еврейским Талибаном". Известна она, в том числе тем, что ее участники постоянно кочуют по миру, спасаясь от преследований и пытаясь сохранить привычный для них образ жизни.

похищение 13-летнего израильского мальчика. В 2000 году мужчину депортировали обратно в Израиль, однако долго здесь он не задержался. Уже в 2003 году он уехал в Канаду, где смог получить политическое убежище, рассказывая о том, что израильские власти преследуют его из-за религиозных убеждений.

Как раз в Канаде воспитанием детей в секте заинтересовалось правительство. Госорганы считали, что 127 несовершеннолетних ребят не получают должного ухода и пытались передать некоторых из них на попечение приемных семей. Участников организации обвинили в жестоком обращении с детьми, начались суды.

Большинство членов группы в 2013 году смогли перебраться в Гватемалу. Именно сюда из Израиля перебралась семья Исраэля Амира, когда мальчику было 12 лет.

"Лев Тахир": история Исраэля Амира

Родители Амира решили присоединиться к "Лев Тахир", привезя с собой семерых детей.

"Это был полный шок", — вспоминает мужчина.

Всех детей разделили, им приходилось спать на каменном полу, почти весь день они проводили в молитвах.

Зачастую несовершеннолетних участников группы изолировали от родителей, чтобы полностью их контролировать. Физические наказания были повседневным явлением.

Когда Амиру исполнилось 16 лет, лидеры секты организовали его свадьбу с ровесницей — это обычная практика в "Лев Тахир". Через два года у них родился мальчик, которого назвали Нево.

долгие годы пыталась найти родственников и боролась с "Лев Тахир". Она помогла 18-летнему парню выехать из Гватемалы. Он признается журналистам, что не хотел бежать без своего сына, но тетя уговорила его, обещая, что они сделают все возможное для освобождения мальчика.

Рейд мексиканской полиции

Несколько раз Амир вместе с тетей возвращался в Гватемалу, надеясь вытащить Нево из организации, однако безуспешно.

Как стало известно, часть группы успела выехать в Мексику, где основатель секты Хельбранс утонул в реке.

Власти страны также заинтересовались деятельностью скандальной организации. В сентябре 2022 года полиция провела спецоперацию, проведя обыски в комплексе, где обосновались участники культа. Там и нашли сына Амира. Впоследствии мальчика передали в Израиль.

5 января этого года Исраэль Амир у себя в Facebook опубликовал фотографию, на которой он сидит вместе с малышом на пляже.

Напомним, в июне 2021 года в Лос-Анджелесе продали дом, где в 1969 году печально знаменитый Чарльз Мэнсон и члены его секты "Семья" убили семью Ла-Бьянка.

الشيء الغريب في المغرب مثلا انه من النادر جدا ان نجد شوارع تحمل اسماء الشخصيات التاريخة الامازيغية مثل ابن بطوطة عباس بن فرناس وماسنيسا ويوغرطا وغيرهم كثير

السلام و عليكم ، نتمناو اتفاعلو مع هاد المنشور و تبارطاجيو

قبل مانبداو الموضوع ديالنا خاصنا ضروري مانعتارفو لراسنا و نأمنوا باللي المخدرات لا دمنتي عليها راه شبه مستحيل باش تبعد منها، منغير لا قومتي بجهدك كامل ؛ ثانيا الصورة النمطية اللي كيأمن بيها الشخص و الجماعة حول شي موضوع معين كاتجي بداكشي اللي كايشوفو/كيسمعو الإنسان و كيتكرر بزااف .

حاليا فالغرب و بإسم التضامن و السلم و التطور الفكري اللي وصل ليه بنادم ولا كيتسبب لبني الجلدة ديالو فالإبادة البطيئة ، حيت من ناحية الزواج بين أبناء البلد قل و فالمقابل البراني كايفرّخ كي بغا (و حتا حنا عندنا صحاب نولدو غا واحد ....) ، ماعلينا الأمر ماوقفش هنا بل ولا التشجيع خطير بزااف على الزواج/التزاوج المختلط ، لا من ناحية الإشهارات اللي فيها عائلة مختلطة على أساس أنها كتمثل عائلة طبيعية فديك المجتمع و لا من ناحية الأفكار الجنسية اللي كتروج لفحولة النيگز ؛ وفهاد النقطة بالضبط ولاو شي بنات كايقدمو الولاء و الطاعة للنيگز و بس (الممارسة غا معاهم)و كايشوفو الدري الأبيض بحال وهوما بالدرجة الأولى مجرد عاهرات) ، snowbunny اولا Queen Of Spades شي مخلوق ضعيف ماعندوش قيمة(هادو كيطلقو على راسهم إسم و كيما هاد الأفكار لاعبين على البنت باش تقدس النيگا ، داك الدري الأبيض مسكين فينما دخل لشي سيت كايلقا راسو ممتلينو على أساس أنه غا أي "ديوث" و ماواصلش للفحولة ديال النيگز ، و حيت المصدر الوحيد دالمعلومة المصورة اللي عندو هو داك السيت دالپورن فكايتيق بداكشي "cuckyboy" و يقدر گاع إيولي من "الألوان" و كايعجبو داك المنظر (الحالة النفسية اللي كيعيشها الشخص تقدر تأثر على الأفكار و الميولات الجنسية ديالو) ، و هنا عادي البنت تحتاقرو حيت هو اللي قتل الهيبة ديالو و شاف واحد الشخص أخر على أساس أنه حسن منو (وفاش كيكثروا هاد الحالات كاتخلق الصورة النمطية لذى المجتمع) .

"black supremacy" اللي هو شعار عنصري فحد داتو ، و دخلو لمرحلة "محاولة الإستلاء على السيادة" و كيطالبو بال "BLM" حاليا النيگز فاتو مرحلة "لا للعنصرية" أولا ولطالما أصحاب القرارت العظمى فالأرض من دوي البشرة البيضاء وصعيب عليهم يوصلو للهذف ديالهم بسهولة، فهوما قررو يخلقو لينا ، و إستغلال شهوة العاهرات "black breeding" و هاد النظام العنصري بكل بساطة مبني على فكرة نقل الجينات ("black new world order"(BNWO كطريق للهدف ديالهم ، يعني نتا عايش فمجتمع مافيهش قيود(جسدي حريتي*) غادي تحاول تتعرف على ما أمكن من "المهابل" ،و بحلاوة اللسان غادي تقدر

بعد الاضطلاع السريع على المصدر، وجب التنويه ان الدراسة تذكر ان ٢٠٪ من الحمص النووي ذو اصول افريقية و٨٠٪ من اصول شرق اوسطية، مع العلم ان الدراسة تاخذ بعين الاعتبار الكثير من الأخطاء وعدم الدقة الكاملة للنتائج لكثير من العوامل العلمية..
الموضوع بحاجة الى قراءة متأنية ودقيقة.

لما تمت المقارنة بين عينات المصريين الحاليين و عينات القدماء ظهر تباعد نسبياً عشان نسبة المكون الأفريقي وأظهرت عينات المصريين القدماء تقارب مع عينات سكان الشام ده لأن سكان الشرق الأوسط متشابهين ومتقاربين چينياً وبيتشاركوا معظم مكونهم الچيني فهي حاجة كده زي المصريين 70 منهم مكون نطوفي ونفس الأمر للشوام وكمان لأن الشوام معندهمش المكون الأفريقي ده أو عندهم بس بنسبة أقل

يعني بإختصار شديد الفرق بينا وبين أجدادنا حسب الدراسة هو زيادة نسبة المكون الأفريقي بمتوسط 8% والشوام ملهمش أي علاقة بالمصريين القدماء وهأوضح بمثال أنا أقصد ايه

*الدراسة تم تحريفها بشكل فادح شوية يقلك شوام وشوية أوروبيين وشوية أتراك زي ما هو واضح في أول صورتين

*المصريين الحاليين هم الأحفاد المباشرين والوحيدين للقدماء وبحسب الدراسة فالمصريين مثل أجدادهم بنسبة 92% + 8% مكون أفريقي وده سبب الانحراف والتباعد بين العينات ، والتقارب بين عينات المصريين القدماء ورفات سكان قدماء الشام و الأناضول ده راجع إن معظم سكان الشرق الأوسط بيتشاركوا معظم مكونهم الچيني ووضحت الأمر بمثال الأب اليوناني (':

* العلماء اللي شاركوه في الدراسة قالوا الدراسة قد لا تمثل سكان مصر بالكامل وهناك محاولات منذ عقود للفصل بين المصريين الحاليين و القدماء وهذا غير صحيح إطلاقاً وبرغم المكون الافريقي اللي عندنا ف الإستمراية الچينية بينا وبين الأجداد غير منقطعة

* مفيش حد في الكوكب كله عرقه نقي 100% ومع ذلك لقيت بالصدفة البحتة واحد مصري عمل تحليل dna وطلع مصري 100%

* طبعا الدراسة بتثبت حرفياً إن إحنا أحفاد للمصريين القدماء و بتنفي وبتنسف تماما فرضية إن المصريين كانوا $ود

هناك إرادة قوية لسرقة ارث الحضارات الافريقية الشمالية و العربية و نسبها إلى الأفارقة و هذا من طرف لوبي الافروصونتريست القوي ماليا و المتمركز في امريكا (أفارقة امريكا) حيث يفعلون كل ما بوسعهم لنسب كل حضارات المنطقة إليهم و أولها حضارة الفراعنة،
أبعد من ذلك فهم يدعون ان الأنبياء كلهم كانوا سودا، من موسى و عيسى و محمد عليهم السلام

راي الشخصي ان حضارة النوبة حضارة سوداء مفروغ منها ونجد انه حتى تماثيلهم تضهر الملامح الزنجية من لون بشرة و ملامح
اما باقي الشمال فمن خلال الصور والتماثيل واضح جدا انهم مصريين سمر بسبب الشمس والبيئة وليسو سودا حيث ان الجداريات المصرية تركز على لون البشرة سواء للاسرى او العبيد او الملوك
لهذا فان هذا السؤال برايي لا يحتاج الى كثير علم ومعرفة

الصورة أو اللوحة تبين تدخل جيش "الإنكشارية" لردع مرتزقة الجزائر بين الحدود المغربية العثمانية بداية القرن 18 ما بين 1703 و1730 م ، وهي إحدى الصفحات المشرقة التي تؤرخ لمرحلة مهمة من تاريخ العلاقات السياسية بين الإمبراطورية العثمانية والمملكة المغربية الشريفة وعلى الخصوص بين السلطان العلوي المولى إسماعيل والسلطان التركي أحمد الثالث، الذي كان يحترم ويبجل سلاطين المغرب سيرا على عادة أجداده السلاطين العثمانيين منذ جدهم الأكبر السلطان عثمان غازي 1281.1326م ..

ونجد جوابا أرسله السلطان العثماني أحمد الثالث للمولى إسماعيل فيه تحية وتقدير كبير وتعبير عن حسن جوار للمملكة بعد عتوّ أهل الجزائر في القبائل القريبة من وجدة، ظنا منهم أن سلطان المغرب ضعفت قواه ووهن عظمه وركن إلى الراحة.

"إلى الملك الجميل الفعال السالك محمود الخصال حارس ثغور الإسلام فارس هيجاء الإعتصام صاحب العز والمجد والسياسة والجد المولى إسماعيل أدام الله عزه وحرس حوزه وأمده بالعز والسعادة وصوب السيادة صاحب الملك والنعمة واللطافة والرحمة، بعثت لك بسلام خالص وتحية طيبة وألقيت عليك محبة مني عن طيب خاطر وخيرمتواتر لأنك صاحب الكرسي الشريف وشرفكم أصيل من جد إلى جد إلى النبي صلى الله عليه وسلم وشرف ومجد وقد جعل الله بينكم مودة ورحمة وأنتم أصحاب العقل والمجد والكرامة السرمدية وأهل الشريعة المحمدية يجب علينا معرفة قدركم والتنويه بمجدكم وفخركم وكيف تخفانا طهارتكم وكرامتكم والله تعالى يقول إنما يريد الله ليذهب عنكم الرجس أهل البيت ويطهركم تطهيرا، وأنتم أهل الفضل والسلطنة العالية ومفتحة لكم الأبواب السنية هذا وقد وصلنا كتابكم الشريف الرفيع الأسمى مترجما عن أسرارمحبتكم فعرفنا ما تضمنه من الصداقة والمحبة والمودة الخالصة الصافية فينا فأعجبنا كثيرا وعظمناه في قلوبنا وفرحنا به فرحا كبيرا وانشرحت به صدورنا وطابت به نفوسنا وعظمناه تعظيما زائدا وتحققنا من خطابك فيه أنك تحبنا محبة كثيرة صافية بصفاء قلب وصدق نية متوجهة لوجه الله، ومن قديم الزمان كانت ملوك المغرب من الأشراف يكتبون إلينا وترد رسلهم علينا ولم تنقطع كتبهم ورسلهم عن أسلافنا وكانت بيننا محبة قديمة في سالف الزمان ملك عن ملك وسلطان عن سلطان، إعلم أيها السيد المولى أنا قبل أن يصل إلينا كتابكم الأسمى وخطابكم الأنمى كنا لانعرف ماهم عليه أهل الجزائر ولا أنهى إلينا فعلهم أحد كما أنهيتموه لنا ولا عرفنا ما صار عنهم ولا ماهم عليه وبالجملة أهل الجزائرما هم على شيء لكونهم أخلاط الناس فيهم

Sacred stone axes on Benin altars

Nick Petch 11 June 2021, 2:00 PM Nick Petch, Ritual

Detail of ceremonial altar in Chief Ezomo's palace, Benin City, showing stone axe head. Photographed by Nicholson Thomas in 1909. 1997.162.956.4.1963

During the anthropological survey of the Edo-speaking people of Nigeria in 1909-10, Northcote Thomas (1868-1936) photographed a number of altars in the palaces of Benin City, Edo State (Nigeria) (Petch, 2). As will become obvious, thrones and royalties provide an important record of the capital of the Benin Empire (pre 1.2 years after its fall at the hands of the British Punitive Expedition. Although accounts of the Punitive Expedition (e.g. Bacon, 1897) tend to focus on the looting of material culture (especially the brass plaques of Benin Thomas's photographs of Benin itself are completely destroyed and not everything was looted.

Thomas documented a number of Benin shrines in considerable detail. Photographs of the altar in Chief Ezomo's palace, for instance, shows many of the classic Benin shrine objects such as cattle staffs (ukhurhe), memorial heads (ukhonmwun) and altar tusks (eroro). Of these ritual objects, the stone axe head is perhaps the most enigmatic because of the presence of polished stone axes at odds in these surroundings.

Thomas's anthropological reports and other publications contain no information on the origin of these stone axes. Subsequent scholarship has made the case that the vast majority of Thomas's fieldwork was subsequently unpublished. In a letter written in 1933 to his friend and colleague Bernhard Struck, Curator of the Museum für Völkerkunde in Dresden, he writes that his publications only "[c]an use 5 of the material from his 650 trips" – that dwarfed by all of references to information in the colonial service. Among the unpublished material are numerous photographs and manuscripts like that reproduced here, which are a fine original on which he discussed the axes.

Unpublished handwritten manuscript notes on stone implements from Northcote Thomas's 1909-10 Edo trip. The handwriting on these pages is not Thomas's – possibly that of an assistant in the UK. University of Cambridge Library.

Thomas writes that he is in Chief Ezomo's house that he has "with much trouble got [him] to put in the photographic position" and that he has "got [him] to show [his] axe head". Thomas's description of the axe head is also interesting in the use of curator. Chief Ezomo of Eto told that when the axe head is found it is called an angone, they take a stone implement and rub it and curse them. If a man is before them whom they suspect of having found one they curse him and say that if he has found one the ground shall be fruitless and the cattle cure him and watch that he may not prosper.

It was not only in Benin City that Thomas encountered these stone implements. He also records examples from Ibo country (Igbo-Ukwu) and Yoruba country (Ife). Thomas's Ife photographs are of a stone cutter's axe supplied to only 12 that was said to have been from the sky. Elsewhere he also had that a stone axe is a "blessed" of lightning, and in Oka he notes that they are placed in the Drum of Thunder and that a person can use a sacrifice, then lightning will not hit the house.

The association between these axe heads and lightning is widespread, not only throughout West Africa but also in Europe and elsewhere in the world (Petch, forthcoming). Thomas's Benin City photographs – examples were edited by Jones of Pendle Hardcastle and Curator of Ethnology at the British Museum (BM), Henry Balfour, Curator of the Pitt Rivers Museum in Oxford, had written about such "Thunderbolts" (stills from Benin in the anthropological journal Jobs, which was the first publication of Thomas's work in Thomas, in which he surveyed the phenomenon of Thunderbolts throughout the world. Balfour's publication was based on a questionnaire circulated by Thomas and contained a number of images in the form of miniature stone axe heads, which had also been acquired in Benin City.

Page 414 of Balfour's publication in Jobs, showing Thomas's photographs of stone axe heads. Balfour's description of the axe heads as "Thunderbolts" is clear in the text: "Fig. 414 is a half-size photograph of a number of Stone Axes, or Thunder-bolts, in the possession of Mr. Northcote Thomas, who has collected a number of these objects in Benin City, Southern Nigeria. It is from these axes that the natives believe that lightning is attracted, and they are therefore placed in the Drum of Thunder, so that when a house is struck by lightning, and a sacrifice is offered, the lightning will not strike the house. Mr. Thomas has also collected a number of examples, including the one evidently kept as a thunder-stone, which is figured in Fig. 415. Mr. Thomas informs me that in Benin City, Southern Nigeria, these axes are called angone, and are said to fall from the sky. When found they are rubbed on a stone and cursed, and the finder is told that if he has found one of these axes he will be struck dead, but that if he has not found one he will be struck blind. Mr. Thomas has also known a case in which a man who had found one of these axes was struck dead by lightning

Philippe Charlier, médecin légiste et anthropologue français, a effectué en Haïti des enquêtes sur le phénomène de zombification. Après ses recherches et travaux de terrain réalisés notamment en interrogeant d'autres chercheurs (neurologues, médecins) travaillant sur la question, Philippe Charlier a réalisé, en collaboration avec le dessinateur Richard Guérineau, une bande dessinée titrée « Les Zombis », dans laquelle il rapporte et fait vivre aux autres cette réalité pourtant considérée par de nombreuses personnes, comme un fantasme.

Dans une entrevue accordée à France 5, le scientifique explique les manières utilisées par des acteurs de la société vaudou pour infliger cette peine « pire que la mort » -, à ces victimes, ces morts sociaux qu'on appelle les « zombis ». Avec l'OBS, en interview Charlier parle, pour expliquer la méthode employée par des tribunaux sociaux du secteur vaudou, de sanctions à l'encontre de ces individus ayant consommé à leur insu, un poison les faisant plonger dans un état de mort apparente, puis dans un état d'hébétude, après « résurrection ».

A la question « Qu'est-ce qu'un zombi, en Haïti » de l'OBS, l'auteur de la bande dessinée répond et en présente trois types :

Les plus populaires

er nc à

1. Le premier, c'est le zombi toxique, celui dont l'empoisonnement a été décidé par une société secrète (les bizangos, les cochons gris, par exemple) parce qu'on considère qu'il fait du mal à la société. Un violeur, un assassin, un captateur d'héritage, ce genre de choses. Et on va lui dire : "Si tu ne t'arrêtes pas, il va t'arriver quelque chose de pire que la mort." Et être un zombi, en effet, c'est pire que la mort.

2. Le deuxième type de zombi, c'est le zombi psychiatrique. Ce sont des gens qui considèrent qu'ils ont visité le royaume des morts. Ils ont dîné, comme ils disent, avec "Baron samedi" et "dame Brigitte". Cela obéit généralement à des cas de schizophrénie ou d'autres pathologies.

3. Et puis, il y a un dernier cas, qui est le zombi social. Après une catastrophe naturelle (et, malheureusement, Haïti est souvent touché par des tremblements de terre, des raz-de-marée ou des cyclones), le père, la mère ou quelqu'un d'important dans la famille a disparu. Il est remplacé par quelqu'un d'autre. Ici, tout le monde se ment. On fait passer cette personne pour un zombi (quitte à lui créer des fausses cicatrices, changer son prénom, ou lui créer des souvenirs) en sachant très bien que ce n'est ni la personne de la famille ou un zombi. Tout le monde le sait, mais personne ne le dit. C'est un jeu. Et c'est un peu comme "le Retour de Martin Guerre" : le but, c'est de combler le vide d'une personne disparue.»

Алжирская кухня и этикет принятия пищи

ПОДЕЛИТЬСЯ ПОДЕЛИТЬСЯ ПОДЕЛИТЬСЯ

Если вам доведется посетить Алжир, то вы обязательно заметите гостеприимство местных жителей. Даже нежданного гостя встретят тепло, сообщает сайт Algeria Travel Guide.

Если вы получили приглашение в алжирский дом на обед или ужин, то хозяева оценят ваше старание следовать их традициям.

По прибытии снимайте обувь у дверей. Когда вы входите в комнату, сначала поздоровайтесь с самым старшим по возрасту, а затем обойдите комнату, приветствуя каждого из собравшихся в отдельности. Традиционно женщины едят отдельно от мужчин. Считается хорошим тоном, когда гостья женского пола предлагает хозяйке помочь расставить еду и убрать ее.

Мойте руки до и после еды. Алжирцы, как правило, едят, сидя на полу за низким столом, который называют табла или мида. Принятие пищи, обычно, начинается с супа или салата, затем подается жареное мясо (чаще всего баранина или говядина) или рыба в качестве основного блюда, а завершают трапезу свежие фрукты. Пищу традиционно едят большим, указательным и средним пальцами правой руки (левая рука, как вы можете догадаться, считается нечистой). Использование четырех или пяти пальцев воспринимается как переход границ хорошего тона, так как может быть воспринять как признак ненасытности в пище, а этого следует избегать. Некультурно не только есть левой рукой, но и что-то передавать ею.

Алжирцы пользуются и столовыми приборами. Например, кускус едят столовой ложкой, а тушеное мясо – вилкой. Принято следить за тем, чтобы гость хорошо поел, и предлагать ему множество блюд. Поэтому лучше пробовать небольшие порции каждого блюда. Кроме того, оставляйте немного еды на своей тарелке, когда наедитесь досыта – это помешает хозяину снова наполнить ее.

Атмосфера ужина в семье среднего класса может быть немного более элегантной. Слуга или молодой член семьи подходит к каждому человеку за столом, предлагая гостям чашу с ароматизированной водой для мытья рук перед едой. Если вы не хотите показаться грубым, лучше не отказываться от такой услуги.

И, конечно же, следует соблюдать элементарные правила поведения за столом: использовать салфетку, а не рукав, не отрыгивать, не чавкать и т.п.

В столице страны, Алжире, как и большинстве прибрежных городов страны, имеется широкий выбор ресторанов, особенно французской, итальянской и ближневосточной кухни. Южный Алжир меньше ориентирован на туристов. В большинстве городов на местном рынке можно заказать еду на дом. Школьные обеды, как правило, более традиционные, в них входят такие любимые национальные блюда алжирцев, как кускус, сухофрукты, рагу и сладкие фруктовые напитки.

Дороги к знаниям: научные путешествия в мусульманском мире

В классический период исламской истории знания получали не из книг, а непосредственно от наставников. Даже если книги и использовались, их необходимо было читать с учителем. Поэтому путешествия были неизменной частью образования. Благодаря им взыскующие знаний не только увеличивали свои познания, но и расширяли кругозор, пишет Юсуф Сами Камадан.

Создавались даже работы, посвященные методам таких путешествий в поисках знаний. Например, «Аль-Канун фи ахкам аль-ильм ва-ль-алим ва-ль-мутааллим» марокканского ученого маликитского мазхаба аль-Йуси. Также ученые составляли книги, в которых описывали свой опыт странствий. Например, суфий и хадисовед родом из аль-Кудса (Иерусалим) Ибн аль-Кайсарани (ум. 1113) в своих мемуарах под названием «Аль-Мансур» писал, что проходил пешком не менее 20 фарсахов (около 100 км) в день, совершая путешествие в поисках знаний.

Знаменитый суфий и поэт Фарид ад-дин Аттар (1145-1221), павший мучеником от рук монголов, совершил поездки в Ирак, Дамаск, Египет, Мекку, Медину, Индию и Туркестан, пока не поселился на свой родине в Нишапуре.

Ахмад ибн Ханбал (780-855), основатель ханбалитского мазхаба, родился в Багдаде. И хотя этот город в то время был одним из центров религиозных знаний, ученый совершил поездки в Куфу, Басру, а также в Мекку, Медину, Дамаск, Алеппо и Джазиру.

Такие путешествия были очень важны, в частности, в науке хадисов. Доходило до того, что тех ученых, кто не отправлялся в путь ради знаний, подвергали порицанию. Например, таких хадисоведов, как Абу Исхак ибн Куркул (ум. 1174) и Ибн Хуррам (ум. 913) называли «раххаль» («путешественник»), так как они много странствовали. В то же самое время Абу Фараджа ибн Джаузи (ум. 1201) критиковали как недостаточно путешествовавшего в поисках знаний.

Как сообщает знаменитый сирийский хадисовед аз-Захаби (1274-1348) в своей посвященной заучиванию наизусть хадисов книге «Тазкират аль-хуффаз», Абд аль-Карим ибн Мухаммад ас-Самани посетил около 100 религиозных центров исламского мира, а число ученых, у которых он учился, приближается к 7000.

Подобные путешествия могли быть как индивидуальными, так и групповыми. Например, хадисовед аль-Джаузаки (ум. 998), родившийся в деревне Джаузак в Нишабуре, совершал странствие вместе со своим дядей, который тоже был ученым, занимавшимся хадисами. Причем некоторые отправлялись в путь совсем юными. Знаменитый толкователь Корана, историк, хадисовед и правовед ат-Табари (839-923) совершил свое первое путешествие, когда ему было 12 лет. Его странствия длились пять лет. Он очень хотел встретиться с Ахмадом ибн Ханбалом, но по пути в Багдад, куда он отправился ради этого, его настигла весть о смерти этого выдающегося ученого. Тогда он снова продолжил свои странствия, получая знания у разных наставников. А совершать подобные путешествия ученые могли до самой старости. Например, андалузский хадисовед и суфий аль-Уклиши (1092-1155) умер в городе Кус в Египте, когда возвращался из своего последнего странствия.

Источники, к которым обращались ученые, не ограничивались только мусульманскими. Как гласит хадис, «Знание и мудрость – это потерянное имущество мусульманина. Он возьмет его там, где найдет». Поэтому мусульмане стремились получить знания из самых разных источников. Медик и философ Абд ал-Латиф аль-Багдади (ум. 1231), покинув свой родной Багдад, жил в Мосуле, Дамаске, Иерусалиме. Позже от отправился в Египет, где учился у известного еврейского философа Маймонида (1135-1204).

Была налажена целая система, в рамках которой люди, стремившиеся получить знания, перемещались как с запада на восток, так и с востока на запад.

Абд аль-Гафир аль-Фариси (1059-1135), хадисовед, правовед шафиитского мазхаба и историк, родился в Нишапуре. Ради получения знаний он направился на восток, а не на запад, совершив путешествия в Газни, Индию и Хорезм.

Великие ученые прошлого ожили на интерактивной выставке в Мекке.

Филолог, правовед и хадисовед Ради ад-дин ас-Сагани (1181-1252) родился в Лахоре, который сейчас находится на территории Пакистана. В поисках знаний он побывал в таких местах, как Мекка, Медина, Йемен, Багдад и Могадишо.

Путешествия ради получения знаний совершали не только мужчины, но и женщины. Например, Ситт аль-Вузара (ум. 1316), которая родилась в Дамаске, посетила разные центры исламского мира, обучаясь у разных учителей. Такие женщины не только учились сами, но и давали уроки тем, кто приходил к ним. Хадисовед ас-Силяфи (1085-1180), который 18 лет провел в пути, обучался у около 600 наставников, среди них были и шесть женщин.

В то время путешествия сопрягались с немалыми трудностями. В источниках сообщается, что Замахшари (1075-1144), автор знаменитого тафсира «аль-Кашшаф» имел деревянный протез, так как отморозил ногу во время путешествия.

Ученые совершали путешествия не только с целью получения знаний по философии или исламским наукам. Аль-Джаухари (940-1008), лексикограф арабского языка и автор словаря «Тадж аль-луга ва сихах аль-арабия» по происхождению был тюрком. Первоначальное образование он получил в своем родном Отраре, а затем отправился в Багдад. С целью сбора материала для своего словаря и изучения тонкостей арабского языка он посетил Аравийский полуостров, где жил среди племен рабиа и мудар.

Андалузский ученый-агроном Тигнери (ум. после 1110 г.) совершил поездку в восточные исламские страны, чтобы улучшить свои знания методов ведения сельского хозяйства и сельскохозяйственной продукции. Вернувшись в Гранаду, он привез с собой богатую коллекцию, которую собрал во время своих путешествий.

Как скромный библиотекарь из Тимбукту спас тысячи исторических рукописей от экстремистов

Абдель Кадер Хайдара спас тысячи ценнейших исламских рукописей, которым грозило уничтожение от рук экстремистской группировки.

Легендарный древний город Тимбукту в Мали когда-то был крупнейшим культурным и научным центром Западной Африки. В XV в. здесь насчитывалось 25 000 студентов – почти столько же, сколько сейчас в нем жителей. С того времени здесь сохранились уникальные рукописи, охватывающие самые разные дисциплины, такие как исламское право, философия, медицина, астрономия, математика. Некоторые из них попали сюда из Андалусии, Северной Африки и Ближнего Востока, а другие были созданы учеными в самом Тимбукту. По некоторым подсчетам, в городе хранится около 700 000 манускриптов.

В семье Абдель Кадера Хайдара рукописи передавались с XVI века. Сам он унаследовал от своего отца 9000 книг, крупнейшую частную коллекцию в Тимбукту. Отец Хайдара учился в Судане и Египте, он скупал рукописи, нередко переписывал их от руки. В то время многие другие семьи в Тимбукту начали закрывать свои библиотеки, иногда даже пряча их в ямах в песке, опасаясь, что они могут быть конфискованы французскими колонизаторами. Подобные случаи бывали, и в Национальной библиотеке Франции имеется немало незаконно присвоенных манускриптов.

Откуда в Тимбукту так много рукописей?

Источник: rfi.fr

Абдель Кадер Хайдара первым сделал свою частную библиотеку открытой, и убедил других владельцев книжных коллекций сделать то же самое. Работая в созданном в 1973 г. в Тимбукту Институте Ахмеда Баба, он скупал древние рукописи у местного населения, а также занялся их оцифровкой, наладив сотрудничество с международными институтами и организациями. Благодаря ему, в библиотеке института было собрано 30 000 рукописей.

Беда пришла, откуда не ждали. В 2012 г. Тимбукту был захвачен фундаменталистской группировкой «Аль-Каида в странах исламского Магриба» (запрещена в РФ), что создало прямую угрозу бесценным сокровищам библиотеки, несмотря на исламское происхождение многих книг. Эта группировка была известна тем, что уничтожала исторические артефакты, которые противоречили их строгим взглядам.

Беспокоясь за рукописи, Абдель Кадер Хайдара и его племянник Туре разработали план. Они скупали металлические сундуки – столько, сколько смогли найти, и стали укладывать в них тысячи книг из частных коллекций и библиотек по всему городу. Им помогали другие волонтеры, которым приходилось работать тайно и часто в темноте. Затем сундуки были переданы сочувствовавшим им домовладельцам, чтобы те их спрятали.

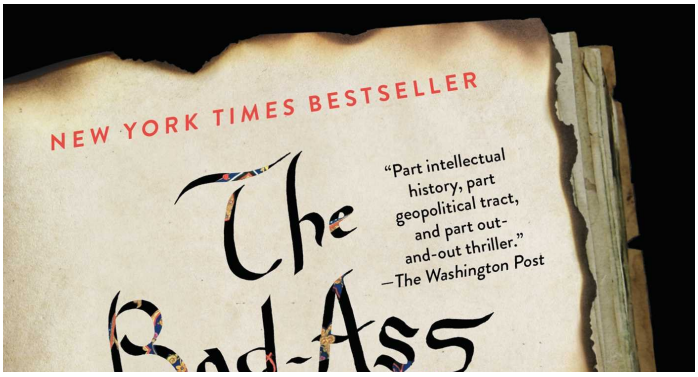
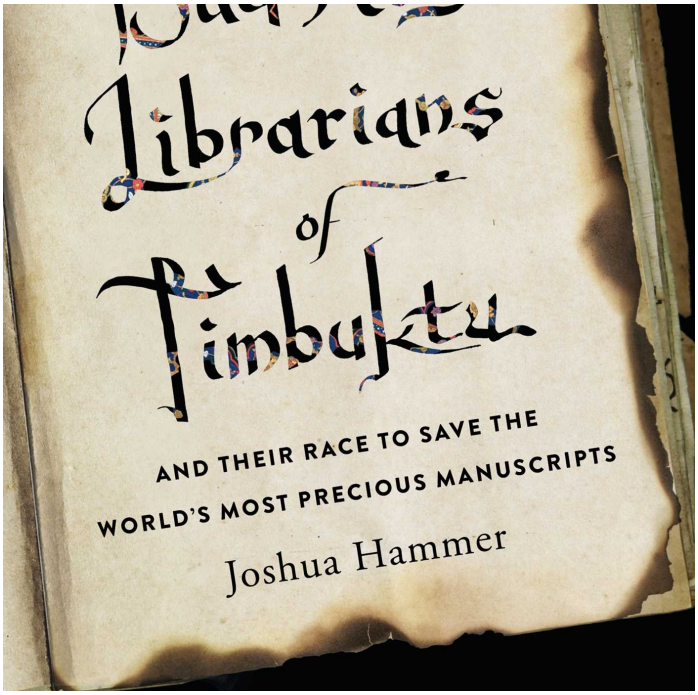
Помогут ли малийские рукописи переосмыслить исламскую культуру?



Источник: wsj.com



За несколько следующих месяцев благодаря масштабным общественным усилиям сундуки, полные книг, были вывезены в багажниках машин в город Бамако. Перевозчикам книг приходилось проезжать контрольно-пропускные пункты с солдатами, их даже арестовывали. Несмотря на все опасности и угрозы, из Тимбукту к началу 2013 года были благополучно вывезены 350 000 рукописей. Таким образом, Хайдара и его соратники своими усилиями спасли сотни лет исламской и африканской исторической хроники.

Когда к Тимбукту приблизились французские войска, боевики «Аль-Каиды в странах исламского Магриба», перед тем как уйти, сожгли 4200 рукописей, оставшихся в библиотеке Института Ахмеда Баба. К счастью, книги, вывезенные в Бамако, уцелели, а позже были возвращены в освобожденный город.

Абдель Кадеру Хайдара и его соратникам была посвящена книга Джошуа Хаммера «Крутые библиотекари Тимбукту и их эпопея по спасению ценнейших рукописей мира» (The Bad-Ass Librarians of Timbuktu and Their Race to Save the World's Most Precious Manuscripts).

Рукописи раскрывают исламскую историю Африканского Рога.

На маршруте благовоний: как ладан помог изменить мир

поделиться поделиться поделиться

Ладан называют «белым золотом» Омана, пишет Эмма Томсон.

Ладан используется людьми, по крайней мере, уже более 6000 лет. Египтяне набивали им тела умерших при мумификации, волхв Мельхиор преподнес его в подарок младенцу Иисусу, царица Савская привезла его в Иерусалим Соломону. Также эта смола применяется для ароматизации в церквях и мечетях.

Ладан представляет собой смолу ладанного дерева или босвеллии священной (Boswellia sacra). Для его получения на стволе делают надрезы, оставляя выступившую смолу застывать.

Эти невысокие сучковатые деревья растут в Йемене, Сомали и Эфиопии, но лучший ладан получают в Омане. Южная провинция страны Дофар когда-то находилась в центре древнего Пути благовоний, который возник отдельно от Шелкового пути между 700 годом до н.э. и 200 годом н.э. Смола перевозилась верблюдами через пустыню в регион, где сейчас находятся Саудовская Аравия, Ирак и Египет, а также через море в Индию, Китай, Африку и Европу. Сумхурам на южном побережье современного Омана, когда-то служивший главным портом побережья и одним из центров торговли ладаном, сейчас лежит в развалинах. Марко Поло упомянул его в своих трудах, но неправильно описал его местоположение в Йемене, поэтому он был обнаружен только в конце XIX века. И прошло еще полвека, прежде чем археологи начали здесь раскопки в 1950 году.

Когда мы приближаемся к руинам, внесенным в список ЮНЕСКО, яростное солнце обжигает нам лица. Мы проходим через бывшие монументальные въездные ворота. «Смотри сюда, это арабские надписи 2300-летней давности», – указывает мне моя проводница Рая, одетая в черный платок и абайю. Мы идем дальше. Лучше всего сохранились центральный колодец и храм, посвященный божеству луны Сину, но другие сооружения разглядеть труднее. На полу – каменный сенет (древнейшая настольная игра в мире) и огромная амфора, служащая доказательством торговли с Египтом и Индией. Через другие ворота открывается потрясающий вид на залив, где Вади Дурбат впадает в океан. Рядом находятся две старые лодки и руины, которые все еще ждут раскопок. «Возможно, это старые склады ладана», – говорит Рая.

Греческий мореплаватель так описывал Сумхурам: «Благовония могут стоять у причала без охраны, благодаря силе бога, который защищает их. Даже крупица драгоценной смолы не может быть загружена незаконно. Если кто-то осмелится сделать это, корабль не поплывет, потому что это против воли бога».

Под богами здесь подразумеваются джинны. Вера в них сильна и сегодня. «Только оманцам разрешено собирать ладан, чтобы не злить джиннов. Балид – самое лучшее место в Салале, но там никто не строится, потому что люди верят, что там обитают джинны», – рассказывает Рая. «У нас сохраняется традиция открывать окна и сжигать ладан до наступления темноты, чтобы уберечься от джиннов и болезней. Сейчас, конечно, многие делают это, так как знают, что ладан убивает микробы», – добавляет она

Действительно, древние крепости, возможно, и превратились в развалины, но ладан пользуется таким же спросом, как и прежде. От дорогого лекарственного сорта аль-худжари, используемого для лечения высокого давления, тошноты, расстройства желудка, улучшения памяти и в качестве зубной пасты, до аннайди и ашаби, которые применяют для ароматизации одежды и отпугивания комаров.

Между тем, ладанные деревья находятся под угрозой. Экологи обеспокоены тем, что производство ароматной смолы сократилось вдвое за последние 15 лет. Также они высказывают опасения, что эта земля будет потеряна для сельского хозяйства, потому что старые деревья не заменяются.

Рая берет меня на базар аль-Хафа в Салале. Улицы пыльные и тихие. Этот рынок скоро будет снесен, а на его месте возведены современные павильоны. Поэтому большинство лавок закрыты. Но одна из них, где продается ладан, открыта, и я делаю покупку.

Позже, ночью, я поджигаю его, и древний мистический аромат наполняет комнату. Этот скромный кусок смолы привел к таким инновациям, как использование верблюдов в качестве вьючных животных, раннему развитию письменного языка и достижениям в судостроении. Никакие другие благовония не могут претендовать на такое влияние.

L'Afrique et la présence des religions abrahamiques : le bilan en 5 points

Les religions dites révélées ou abrahamiques, c'est-à-dire le Judaïsme, le Christianisme et l'Islam, sont entrées il y a des siècles en Afrique et y compte des millions d'adeptes. Quelles ont été leurs conséquences sur la trajectoire historique de notre continent ? C'est ce bilan que nous allons essayer de dresser du point de vue de la pensée africaine qu'est Maât.

Nous invitons la lectrice et le lecteur, pour comprendre ce qui sera dit ici, à se documenter à travers nos articles précédents, sur les variables origines du Judaïsme, du Christianisme et de l'Islam.

1. La diabolisation des Africains de l'antiquité

Les 3 religions en question représentent à des degrés divers les informations données par le Pentateuque, c'est-à-dire l'ensemble des cinq premiers livres composant la bible hébraïque ou Torah, et qui mettent, les faits et enseignements transmis par Moïse au peuple juif.

La diabolisation des Égyptiens

C'est par cette source commune du Pentateuque que ces religions diaboliseront toutes les Égyptiens anciens ; ceci en raison de la mise en esclavage supposée des Hébreux par les Égyptiens. Or comme nous l'avons montré, cette mise en esclavage n'a jamais existé et les Égyptiens, que l'historien grec Hérodote décrivait comme « les plus scrupuleusement religieux de tous les hommes » (II, 37) se servaient plutôt montrés protecteurs envers les Hébreux.

L'invention de cette histoire est probablement un sketch destiné à montrer que Dieu avait choisi les Hébreux au-dessus de la plus forte nation au monde de l'époque. Les raisons ici seraient la volonté de justifier le statut des Juifs en tant que peuple élu de Dieu.

La diabolisation des Cananéens

Les ancêtres des Hébreux, originaires de Mésopotamie, sont arrivés au Proche-Orient en Canaan, pays peuplé de Noirs aux temps premiers. Ils y ont été accueillis les bras ouverts. Mais au fil des siècles, leur volonté d'avoir leur propre territoire, allait les amener à combattre celui des Noirs cananéens-phéniciens. Ils inventeront ainsi la notion de terre promise par Dieu et la malédiction divine des Noirs (Cham) à travers les Cananéens (Genèse, 9, 8-27). Le but étant d'utiliser Dieu pour condamner les Cananéens à l'esclavage, et ainsi justifier leur extermination (livre de Josué) afin de prendre leurs terres.

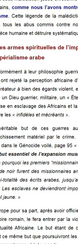

Illustration de Josué, successeur de Moïse d'après la Bible et qui s'apprête à entrer dans la terre promise (Canaan) avec ses égaux et ses armes. Il agit sur ordre de son Dieu (l'Eternel des armées), pour exterminer les Noirs cananéens afin de leur voler leur terre.

La diabolisation des Sabéens

Si la malédiction des Noirs à travers les Cananéens n'est pas dans le Coran, celui-ci diabolise pourtant les Noirs sabéens, premiers habitants du sud de l'Arabie. L'Islam est né du plagiat de la Spiritualité Africaine des Sabéens. Les Arabes, arrivés plus tard dans la région, l'ont réinventée conformément à leurs mœurs patriarcales et guerrières. La nécessité d'imposer cette nouvelle religion, allait pousser les Arabes à diaboliser les Sabéens et la Spiritualité Africaine en général (Sourate 27, 22-44).

Certes tous les peuples noirs anciens ne sont pas tout le temps diabolisés dans les écrits de ces religions, mais ce qui prédomine ce sont les innombrables insultes contre les Égyptiens, vus comme le peuple le plus cruel des temps anciens, et la diabolisation à d'autres des pratiques spirituelles africaines.

2. La naissance du racisme anti-noir

C'est cette malédiction judéo-chrétienne de Cham, qui a fait naître le racisme contre les Africains, comme nous l'avons montré en détail dans notre article général sur le racisme. Cette légende de la malédiction de Cham est en filigrane depuis 2500 ans, dans tous les anciens comme notre nous. Elle a été utilisée pour nous chasser de l'espèce humaine et détruire systématiquement tout ce que nous sommes.

3. Les armes spirituelles de l'impérialisme occidental et de l'impérialisme arabe

Conformément à leur philosophie guerrière, ces religions, pourtant bâties sur l'héritage noir, ont rejeté la perception africaine d'un Dieu fondamentalement bon, pour dessiner un Créateur à bien des égards violent, et aux services de leurs buts impérialistes. C'est donc un Dieu guerrier, militaire, un « Éternel des armées » qui conduira l'Occident dans la mise en esclavage des Africains et la colonisation, et le monde arabe dans le Djihad contre les « infidèles et mécréants ».

Le véritable but de ces guerres au nom de Dieu, était pourtant bel et bien l'enrichissement matériel par le crime. L'historien sénégalais Tidiane Ndiaye nous dit ainsi dans le Génocide voilé, page 95 « La diffusion de l'Islam n'était qu'un prétexte : le but essentiel de l'expansion musulmane en Afrique était la recherche de l'or. Voilà pourquoi les premiers "missionnaires" de l'Islam qui se présentèrent aux portes du monde non fermé des missionnaires armés. « Cette soif de l'or est manifeste dans la quasi-totalité des écrits arabes, jusqu'au pèlerinage de Kansa Moussa, empereur du Mali. Les esclaves ne deviendront importants que progressivement, pour supplanter le métal jaune. »

L'Europe pour sa part, après avoir officiellement créé le Christianisme au 4e siècle sous l'empire romain, le fera entrer par la violence en Afrique par l'Égypte, en y écrasant la Spiritualité Africaine. Le but étant de contrôler spirituellement les sujets de l'empire. C'est ce même but que poursuivront les États européens à partir du 15e siècle en allant violemment conquérir le monde.

Du temps de la traite négrière européenne, il n'y avait pas de séparation entre l'Église et l'État en Europe. L'Église avait donc son mot à dire dans toutes les décisions que prenaient les États européens de ces époques. Tous les esclavagistes européens qui ont attaqué, brutalisé et pillé l'Afrique, l'ont fait aidés des missionnaires, avec la bénédiction de l'Église et de ses papes, à commencer par Nicolas V, à travers sa célèbre bulle de déclaration de guerre aux Noirs.

Le Christianisme et l'Islam sont des puissants outils psychologiques pour faire accepter aux Noirs les dominations des Blancs et des Arabes.

Jésus, Marie et les anges sont blancs, donc Dieu est blanc et les Blancs sont divins. La domination blanche est l'ordre indiscutable de Dieu. Allah, à travers son messager, parlant en arabe à un Arabe en Arabie, Allah est donc arabe, les Arabes sont divins. La domination arabe est l'ordre indiscutable de Dieu.

C'est pourquoi l'Occident et le monde arabo-musulman ont commis les pires crimes contre nous, nous méprisent infiniment, nous voient tout jusqu'à notre histoire, mais partagent généralement leurs religions avec nous.

4. La disparition du matriarcat africain

Le féminin dans la pensée africaine est une partie de Dieu comme le masculin, mais la femme est surtout l'incarnation de Maât. C'est-à-dire l'équilibre, la perfection qui fait le socle du statut égal à celui de l'homme, et fondamentalement même supérieur, accordé à la femme dans l'Afrique authentique. C'est cela le matriarcat africain.

Les religions révélées quant à elles enseignent que la femme est un être impur, agent du mal, du diable et du péché par excellence (histoire d'Adam et Ève). Elles relèguent les femmes au rang de sous humains. Ces enseignements en Afrique ont complètement détruit le statut et la place de la femme noire. Les Africaines aujourd'hui sont partout discriminées. La disparition du matriarcat, pourtant le plus beau trait culturel du monde noir. est la conséquence la plus grave et la plus désolante des religions révélées sur la culture africaine.

Alors qu'en Afrique authentique la femme est Maât, donne la parole mystique transmise à l'Afrique elle est le psyché originel, le mâat.

5. L'aliénation et la haine des Africains envers eux-mêmes

Les religions révélées sont fondées sur un refus profond de l'authenticité. C'est pourquoi elles enseignent au monde entier et à l'Africain aussi que la culture et les traditions africaines sont païennes et ne sont qu'une vaste diablerie organisée.

Les Africains convertis rejettent ainsi les traditions africaines, qu'ils qualifient souvent de sorcellerie et de satanisme, et répondent leurs ancêtres, surtout leurs glorieux ancêtres égyptiens civilisateurs de la Terre, qu'on traite de génocidaires. Ils rejettent leurs ancêtres alors que les Hébreux, Européens et Arabes qui leur ont pourtant apporté ces religions, rendent hommage à leurs propres ancêtres et les honorent en les appelant des saints (Sainte Jeanne d'Arc, Sainte Thérèse, Abraham, etc.).

Tout ceci pousse les Africains convertis à s'inventer des ancêtres juifs ou arabes, dire que le Moyen-Orient c'est l'Afrique, dire que les religions révélées sont africaines, dire que les Hébreux et Arabes étaient en fait noirs. Toutes ces acrobaties intellectuelles mensongères, ne sont qu'une volonté de mendier les ancêtres « divins » des autres, après avoir été poussés par « les peuples de Dieu » à rejeter ses propres ancêtres.

Presque révélatrice ce Égypte représentant le Noir comme personnification du diable et du mal. Cette vision diabolique du Noir implicite ou explicite (comme sur cette image) est commune à toutes les religions dites révélées. Il en résulte donc un Africain qui rejette ses ancêtres, ses histoires, ses cultures, ses traditions, l'Afrique. Les religions révélées ont transformé les Noirs premiers humanistes et civilisateurs de l'humanité, en des Terres fertiles, complices, soumis et exploitables, serviteurs serfs ou pouvoirs des sociétaires impérialistes étrangères.

Les religions révélées ont-elles apporté quelque chose de positif à l'Afrique ? On pourra arguer qu'elles ont détourné les Africains des sacrifices humains, qui étaient le principal défaut de la Spiritualité Africaine, qui sont en voie de disparition et que les Africains devront veiller à retirer pour de bon de leurs cultes ancestraux.

Seulement les milliers de personnes non sacrifiés sont largement 400 à 600 millions de pertes humaines causées par la traite négrière européenne, la traite négrière arabe et la colonisation. Le bilan des religions révélées apparaît donc négatif sous tous les aspects. Elles ont été en tout point le contraire de Maât (vérité, justice, harmonie).

Le cerveau humain a-t-il rétréci à cause de l'intelligence collective?

Sa taille aurait diminué de 150 centimètres cubes, soit une balle de tennis, depuis Homo sapiens.

L'être humain est doté d'un cerveau de grande taille qui, pendant une bonne partie de l'histoire de l'évolution, n'a cessé de grossir. Il y a 20.000 à 30.000 ans, Cro-Magnon et Homo sapiens détenaient le plus gros cerveau connu. Mais il y a environ 3.000 ans, au cours de l'époque géologique actuelle de l'Holocène, la taille de notre cerveau a commencé à diminuer.

C'est ce que met en évidence une récente étude de scientifiques des universités de Dartmouth et de Boston. D'autres estiment que ce rétrécissement a débuté plus tôt: au cours des 20.000 dernières années, le volume moyen du cerveau humain est passé de 1.500 centimètres cubes à 1.350, soit une perte de 10% de sa taille (l'équivalent d'une balle de tennis). Quoi qu'il en soit, tous sont d'accord: le cerveau humain rétrécit. Mais pourquoi? Les hypothèses se multiplient.

Des scientifiques ont par exemple pensé que ce rétrécissement était dû à la diminution de la taille du corps. Mais ceux des universités de Dartmouth et de Boston ont émis un nouveau scénario.

Le rôle de l'intelligence collective

Selon eux, la diminution de la taille de notre cerveau résulterait de la création de nos systèmes sociaux. Ces derniers favorisent la collecte et le partage de connaissances et d'informations, et présentent l'avantage de la «prise de décision au niveau du groupe». Faire société, partager les savoirs et diviser les tâches aide le cerveau à consommer moins d'énergie et à mieux trier les informations recueillies. Qui dit moins de connaissances à stocker dit moins d'espace d'accueil, d'où le rétrécissement.

Pour établir cette nouvelle hypothèse, les scientifiques ont observé les fourmis. «Les humains vivent dans des groupes sociaux dans lesquels plusieurs cerveaux contribuent à l'émergence de l'intelligence collective», note l'équipe. Les fourmis fonctionnent de manière semblable sur les «aspects de la sociabilité», ainsi que sur «la grande taille des groupes, les histoires de vie agraires, la division du travail et la cognition collective».

La taille du cerveau des fourmis et leur consommation d'énergie ont été étudiées. Les scientifiques ont compris par ce biais que l'intelligence collective et la division du travail jouaient un rôle sur la variation de la taille du cerveau. Par souci d'efficacité, le cerveau diminue lorsque les fourmis partagent leurs connaissances et se spécialisent dans une tâche individuelle.

Les Mayas étaient en partie des Noirs

Les Olmèques, situés à l'origine de la plus ancienne des civilisations de l'Amérique ancienne, ont laissé des peintures murales décrivant leur vie. Et on ne peut que constater qu'ils étaient, en partie au moins, des Noirs. Cet article introduit d'ailleurs sur les iconographies en question et en esquisse brièvement la compromis, comment cela a vraisemblant été possible.

En 1968, les Occidentaux malfont pas des peintures murales à Bonampak au Mexique. Ancienne cité Maya, Bonampak a la particularité de posséder une chapelle dont les peintures murales ont été réalisées vers l'an 1000 de l'ère africaine (ED après J.C).

Le site quotidienne de ce peuple et l'origine de leur déclusion. Pour rappel le Mexique avait 26 millions d'habitants à l'arrivée des Européens. Il n'en restera plus que 1 million après [1]. La majorité, y compris des Mayas, sera anéantie. Le royaume Maya périra lui-même sous les assauts européens.

Les images qui ouvrent sont des peintures de Bonampak. Nous avons choisi des images jugées crédibles par nous, et nous les avons presque toute authentifiées par des sources universitaires.

Nous avons personnes avaient d'images authentiques que possédés et n'avons vu en très grande majorité, que des Noirs.

Alors on se demande comment est-ce possible que les Mayas aient été des Noirs avec des cheveux crépus? Ou comment est-il nous semble suffisamment subtile aujourd'hui pour tenter de fournir des réponses. La vie de Pedra Furada au nord-est du Brésil est le plus ancien lieu habité par l'homme moderne en Amérique. Les peintures murales le prouvent.

La présence humaine sur le site a été datée à 65 000 ans [2]. Géographiquement, Pedra Furada régente très clairement l'Afrique. Les autres objets attestant de la présence humaine sur le continent sont datés postérieurement et locaux en Amérique du sud.

Le plus vieux squelette d'Amérique, Luzia, est vieux de 12 000 [3] et est un squelette négroïde. On peut donc s'accorder pour dire aujourd'hui que l'Amérique a été initialement peuplée depuis l'Afrique de l'ouest. Voici à titre de pure spéculation notre vision, mais probablement d'Ousmane-Aziz comme le suggèrent les études génétiques.

Les Noirs auraient donc vécu sur le continent jusqu'à ce que les écailleuses arrivent [ ] à l'ouest. Ils auraient alors été repoussés vers le sud, vers la forêt. Ils auraient été [ ] à changer entre les deux avant d'arrêté seulement aux Amérindiens. En somme vous, qui [ ] et les Inca Mayas noirs avec des cheveux crépus n'ont pas disparu.

Laisse question qu'ils connaît de se poser est la suivante : qu'est ce qui explique les formes bizarres des têtes Mayas? La réponse est hypothétique mais c'est dans la tradition africaine qu'on semble trouver la réponse.

Une femme Maya et un homme Jivaro des Andes de la plume africaines est d'Afrique.

Une tête monumentale Maya (Source : Musée de Bonfil-Batsan). Il n'est pas rare de voir des têtes Mayas avec des formes bizarres. Ce qui est encore une énigme.

Alors si les Mayas avaient des cheveux crépus comme les Africains, quelle est de savoir comment ils les ont acquis. Soit les premiers Américains avaient déjà ces traits culturels ( ), y de dispersa de milles d'années, soit c'est dû au contact avec les Egyptiens. On sait avec certitude que les Egyptiens ont voyagé en Amérique très tôt et qu'ils ont grandement contribué à l'essor des civilisations amérindiennes. Le savant africain, guyanais Ivan Van Sertima a suffisamment démontré.

Ce savoir dont au contact des hoirs d'Afrique puisque les ex-Amérindiens auraient acquis ces traits culturels africains. Ou alors derniers hypothèse, les Mayas eux-mêmes auraient des descendants d'Egyptiens anciens. Ce n'est pas impossible. Les avais de découvrez et de recherches sont ouverts.

In 1971, the Rockefeller Museum in Jerusalem acquired a sealed ancient Egyptian coffin containing the well-preserved mummy of a high-ranking official named Usermontu. Now, a team of scientists made a shocking discovery — the mummy displayed evidence of a complex surgical procedure to repair a broken knee. The operation was performed 2,600 years ago, and the mummy was not the original owner of the coffin. Instead, it was the body of a man named Usermontu, the priest of Montu — an Egyptian god of war — who lived around the 7th century BC. Nevertheless, the mummy of unknown origin has come to be known by the name of Usermontu.

Analysis of the embalming procedure revealed that Usermontu was an upper-class Egyptian who died around the age of 40 between the 8th and 7th centuries BC. His mummified remains are 1.75 (5'9in) tall and display traces of red hair.

Shocking discovery

In August 1971, Professor Yigael Yadin of Hebrew University Jerusalem, Uzzi, and a team of Egyptologists, set out to carry out mummies housed in the Rockefeller Museum, Jerusalem. Among the mummies was a coffin that was labeled as belonging to the mummy of Usermontu. The mummy was in the form of the mummies and the mummies had a hole in the coffin.

Ancient or modern?

Brigham Young University (BYU) reports that it was impossible to see that the metal implant was removed from the x-ray alone, leading Professor Griggs to believe that the pin had been placed there in more modern times to reattach the leg to the rest of the body.

"It was the first time we saw this pin inside a mummy. I thought it was interesting to determine how the ancient Egyptians were able to repair bones and graphic bone fractures so recently. It had been implanted into the bone," Griggs says in a statement. "Without an x-ray, it would be impossible to see an interesting footnote to this. Numerously, got an ancient mummy and put a modern pin in it to help the leg together."

Unraveling the mystery

In order to investigate the nature of the implant, Griggs, Dr. Richard T. Jackson, an orthopedic surgeon from Provo, Utah, and Dr. Grady Jeder, a forensic pathologist from Salt Lake County, Utah, carefully dried out the tissue to allow access to the pin's material to examine the pin, and to x-ray the mummy.

Advanced orthopaedic procedure

The research team concluded that the pin had been created with the same designs used today, to create bone stabilization.

"We are amazed at the ability to create a pin with biomechanical principles that we still use today —rigid fixation of the bone, for example," said Dr. Richard Jackson. "It is beyond anything we anticipated to find here."

But reports that the pin "seems into a conclusive as it enters the femur, or thigh bone, similar to biomechanical fixation methods used today." The pin was placed in the middle of the femur or shin bone, two-fibres fragments extending outward from the core of the pin that prevent rotation of the pin inside the bone.

Before or after death?

Following the examination process, the scientists left an incision's eye hole — had the surgeon carried out while Usermontu was alive or after his death?

A full-arm amputation of the surgeon's left arm was performed on the mummy that was between the time of Usermontu's death and his burial. The ancient Egyptians believed in a physical resurrection after death, and the mummy was to be buried with all of his body parts. Griggs says that this is a good condition was believed to be essential for the mummy's journey into the afterlife.

"The story tells us how sophisticated ancient people really were," Griggs says. "Even though ancient embalmers were the 'lay' of the ancient world, they were highly skilled and knowledgeable people who knew how to treat injuries and how to take bones and put them back together."

MOOR MEANS DEAD

Odwirafo Kwesi Ra Nehem Ptah Akhan

The term in ancient Kamit (Egypt) written MR in the metutu (hieroglyphs) has been identified as a cognate for the term moor found in english as a noun and a verb. The term in Kamit is typically pronounced in the Coptic dialect (Late Kamit dialect which came into use c2000 years ago) as MER or MAR/BAR. Note that in the language of Kamit the 'm' and 'b' sounds can interchange. This interchange also exists in the Akan language of Ghana and Ivory Coast, West Afuraka/Afuraitkait (Africa). For example, the word for blood 'mogya' is also written and pronounced 'bogya' in Akan. The term MR in Kamit:

Many 'egyptologists' arbitrarily place an 'e' between consonants of words from Kamit when they are unsure of the ancient pronunciation. Sometimes this placement is accurate and sometimes it is not. The means by which we can find out the proper pronunciations of words spelled in the metutu (hieroglyphs) such as MR is to look at the languages of Afuraka/Afuraitkait (Africa) which are directly descendent of the language of Khanit (Nubia) and Kamit. This includes languages such as the Akan, Yoruba, Ewe, Igbo, Bakongo and many more. We can also find the proper vowel placements for different dialects of the ancient language in the Coptic dialect (Late Kamit dialect coming into use about 2,000 years ago). For example, we see above that the term MR written in the metutu is written mer by the egyptologist. In the Coptic dialect the term is written MHRE (mereh): Copt. ⲙⲉⲣⲉ. In this instance, the placement of an 'e' sound in between MR to facilitate the pronunciation MER *(*MHRE in Coptic) is a valid placement.

As we can see the term mr (mer) has the definition: collection of water, pool, flood; swampy land. It can also mean desert land, waste, wilderness.

What kind of water? There is a relationship between the flood (water overrunning the land) causing destruction, displacement, death: swampy land (marsh, morass); wasteland (infertile/dead land), wilderness. We thus have the term mr also meaning death and related to death: fatality, the dead, the damned:

As we can see above the term mr also means a funerary coffer or chest – a reference to death. Also: sickness, illness, pain, sorrow, fatal disease; to die, dead, death. The mru and mrti are the dead, the damned. A title of the Ntoro (Deity) Set is Mr meaning the damned one.

The term mr is also the term for pyramid which is a structure dedicated to the dead. The dead were often buried in the mr (pyramid). Finally, we have a name of Kamit being Ta Mra. The term Ta means land. Ta Mra thus references the land of Mra or Mra*-land*.

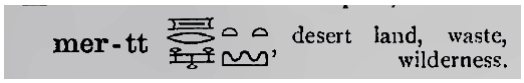
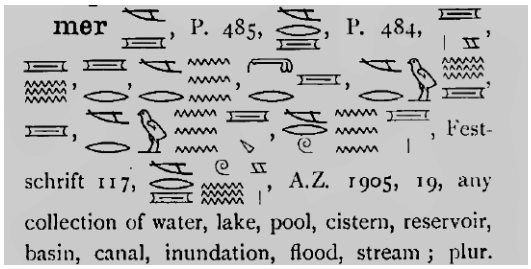
This references the 'dead land' with mr referencing dead, death, flood, swamp, etc. Why is this so? It is rooted in the cosmology of ancient Kamit. First however, let us look at the etymology of the term moor as propounded by the whites and their offspring. From etymonline.com (online etymology dictionary):

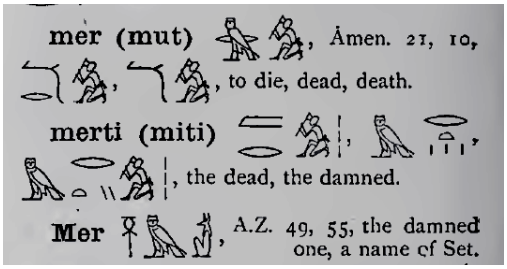


moor (n.)

"waste ground," O.E. mor "morass, swamp," from P.Gmc. mora-* (cf. O.S., M.Du. Du. meer "swamp," O.H.G. muor "swamp," also "sea," Ger. Moor "moor," O.N. mörr "moorland,"marr "sea"), perhaps related to mere (n.), or from root mer-* "to die," hence "dead land." The basic sense in place names is 'marsh', a kind of low-lying wetland possibly regarded as less fertile than mersc 'marsh.' The development of the senses 'dry heathland, barren upland' is not fully accounted for but may be due to the idea of infertility. [Cambridge Dictionary of English Place-Names]



As we can see, the whites and their offspring trace the term moor only back to proto-germanic and proto-indo-european 'roots'. They list the following definitions:



1. waste ground
2. morass, swamp
3. sea
4. 'perhaps related to mere or from root mer "to die" dead land

These four definitions are stolen directly from our Ancestral language of Kamit as shown in the metutu:

The language of Kamit is an Afurakani/Afuraitkaitnit (African~Black) language that predates any european or asian language by thousands of years. These four definitions found in the metutu prove conclusively that the term mr (moor and mere) originated with Afurakanu/Afuraitkaitnut (Africans) thousands of years before the whites invaded ancient Kamit and learned of the term.

The Akan have a proverbial saying, 'Love is death'. This is more than the notion that being 'in love' with someone is often 'painful' or makes someone want to 'die'. There is a cosmological meaning. First, the concept can be found in the term mr in Kamit:

As we can see the term mr also means love, desire, to crave for. One who is 'beloved' is thus called mri. The beloved are called mriti. One's beloved (masculine) is mri while one's beloved (feminine) is mrit. The 't' feminizes nouns in Kamit. [This is where the 'ette' in english as a 'feminizer' originates – Paul, Paulette; Anton, Antonette; the diminutive: cigar, cigarette, etc.]

We see above that the term written MR in the metutu is written mer by the egyptologist. In the Coptic dialect the term is written with the 'e' and thus spelled ME: Copt. ϣϫϵ. The term for lover, beloved is written MRIT and translated by the egyptologist as merit. In Coptic the term is spelled MERIT: Copt. ϣϵριτ. The Coptic dialect has given us a proper dialectical variant of the word with an 'e' vowel placement (as opposed to placing a 'u' or 'o' between MR). Further confirmation comes from the Akan language. The Akan term for love in the sense of desire is ope or pe. A term for lover has the forms mpra, mpena. The Coptic version of Mer is ME. The 'R' is dropped. This features in many Afurakani/Afuraitkaitnit (African) speech patterns where we drop the 'R' at regular conversation speed when it occurs at the end of a word. Afurakanu/Afuraitkaitnut (Africans) in america have continued this practice when pronouncing words such as: her (pronounced 'huh') or there (pronounced by some as 'theh' as in 'see theh' ['see there']). This features prominently in the Akan language as well. This is how MER in ancient Kamit becomes ME (meh) in ancient Coptic and PE (OPE - from MPE, MME, ME - Coptic) in Akan. This is how Meri (lover) in Kamit becomes Mpera (Mmera Mpena, Mpra) in Akan.

The 'R' is pronounced as a rolling 'R' in Afurakani/Afuraitkaitnit (African) languages (tongue tapping the roof of the mouth once). This is why the rolling 'R' and the 'N' interchange in various words. They sound identical when speaking at regular conversation speed because the pronunciation of the 'N' sound also requires that the tongue taps the roof of the mouth once.

Note that mr, love is also mr, death:

The Akan have the ebe (proverb) which says 'Love is death'. In Kamit, the word for love (desire) mr is also the word for death, mr. This is a manifestation of cultural and cosmological continuity, for the Akan are one of many Afurakanu/Afuraitkaitnut (Africans) in West Afuraka/Afuraitkait (Africa) who migrated from ancient Khanit (Nubia/Sudan) and Kamit in ancient times.

Moreover, just as the term mr (mer) was corrupted into moor (mohr) by the whites meaning swamp land, water, sea, wasteland, marshland, death, so was the term mr (mer) meaning love, corrupted by the whites into mour (mohr) as in amour (love) and mi amour (my love):

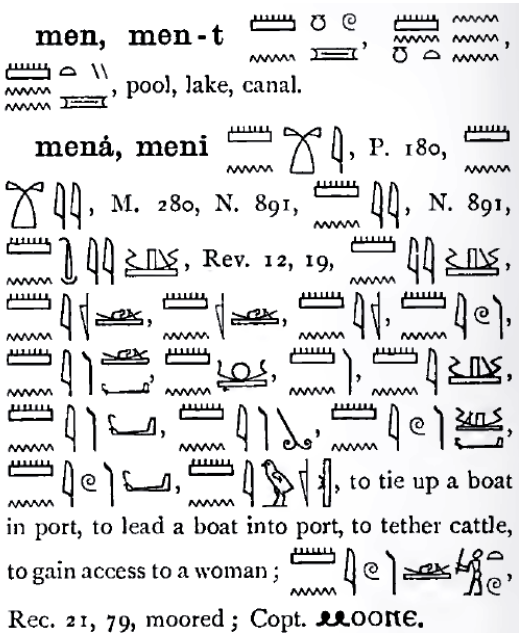
c.1300, "love," from Old French amour, from Latin amorem (nom. amor) "love, affection, strong friendly feeling" (it could be used of sons or brothers, but especially of sexual love), from amare "to love" (see Amy). The accent shifted 15c.-17c. to the first syllable as the word became nativized, then shifted back as the naughty or intriguing sense became primary and the word was felt to be a euphemism.
A common ME word for love, later accented ámour (cf. enamour). Now with suggestion of intrigue and treated as a F[rench] word. [Weekley]



In both instances the term spelled with an 'e' in the Coptic dialect was changed to an 'o' by the whites and their offspring: Mer (mehre) meaning swampland becomes moor. Mer (me) and the variation amer, meaning love becomes amour.

These facts once again prove the Afurakani/Afuraitkaitnit (African) origin of the term popularly rendered 'moor'. The five definitions (wasteland, swamp, sea, death, love) found in eurasian languages are identical to the same five definitions found in the earlier metutu because this is their origin.

We also have the term mr meaning boats, shipping in port. This is key to the cosmological understanding of mr meaning love, death, water, wasteland, swamp, etc.

As shown above, the term mn (men) means pool, lake. The term mna or mni means to tie up a boat in port – to moor a boat. Notice in the Coptic dialect it is spelled MOONE. Copt. ⲙⲟⲟⲛⲉ.

As stated above, in the language of Kamit as well as Akan and other Afurakani/Afuraitkaitnit (African) languages, the letter 'R' is pronounced as a 'rolling R' meaning the tongue taps the roof of the mouth once. This is why the 'N' and 'R' interchange. If you pronounce Mera Mena Mera Mena out loud and 'roll' the 'R' you would not be able to tell the difference between the two words. This is why mera (water, lake, pool) is also written mena (water, lake). This is also why in Akan the name Bena is also written Bera or Bra and Bono is also written Boron. There are numerous examples of this in the languages of Kamit and Akan. The term mna pronounced moone [mooh-neh] in Coptic sounds like moore (mooh-reh) with a 'rolling R'. The term moone (moo-reh) became moor in english, as in 'to moor a boat':

"to fasten (a vessel) by a cable," late 15c., probably related to O.E. mærels "mooring rope," via unrecorded mærian* "to moor," or possibly borrowed from M.L.G. moren or M.Du.maren "to moor," from W.Gmc. mairojan*. Related: Moored, mooring. French amarrer is from Dutch.

As we can see, the whites and their offspring have stolen a term and attributed it to themselves. The term mni and the Coptic moone (moorey) is the exact same term as moor for the language of Kamit holds the etymological root. Related terms:

The term mna or mni (mra or mri) means to arrive in port, to die; boats, shipping in port. The term mnat means the dead. The term mnat also means mooring post. Ancient Kamit was a riverine culture. We quote at length from our article: The Origin of the Term Nsamanfo in Kamit for the cosmological context:

"….Ancient Kamit (Egypt) and parts of Khanit (Nubia/Sudan) were/are riverine cultures. Our Nsamanfo (n-sah-mahn'-foh), our Afurakani/Afuraitkaitnit (African) Ancestresses and Ancestors, thus had/have an understanding of the value of water and images and concepts related to water are found throughout the texts, symbolism and culture of Kamit and Khanit. The sky for example is seen to be comprised largely of a mass of water. Thus, as the Aten (Sun) moves through the sky it is depicted as sailing through the sky in a boat. The Aten rises in Its boat in the abtet (east), sails across the sky and sets in Its boat in the ament (west):

Ra, Hawk-headed, sitting inside the disk of the Aten (Sun) which is inside of the boat of the Aten (Sun) as it sails across the sky

When the Aten sets in the ament (west), it sinks down below the horizon. Here, the Aten is said to enter the hidden (ament) land (ta), the underworld, the spirit world – the Ancestral realm. The Aten has 'died' or moved through the gate of Death to now bring light to the spirit world for the 12 hours of the night. The Aten subsequently reemerges in the abtet (east) at sunrise and appears above the horizon. The Aten has thus been 'born' or 'resurrected' from the 'dead'. The Afurakani/Afuraitkaitnit (African) human is recognized to go through the same process, not only in the context of rising in the morning (sunrise) and going to sleep at night (sunset), but through our life-times. Our sunrise is our appearance in the world at birth, while our transition to the spirit world through the gate of Death is our sunset.

To arrive in port, to die

When a boat arrives at its port, its final destination, it docks. The inhabitants then leave the boat. The same is said of the boat of the Aten. The Aten rises above the horizon through the eastern mountain range in Kamit called Bakhau. On the western horizon is the western mountain range called Manu. When the boat of the Aten arrives at the mountain range of Manu in the west (ament), the Aten has arrived at its port. The boat docks and the inhabitants – Spirits – leave the day boat (Mandjet boat) and go into the spirit world (underworld). For the spirit world journey, They board the night boat (Mesektet boat).

mna – death, the dead

mnau – to die

mna – death, the dead

mna – dead one

mn – dead one

The term mn or mna meaning to die or dead one, the dead and death as shown above is also the term for: to arrive in port. Three versions of the term mn or mna meaning to arrive in port, to die are below:

mnau – to arrive in port, to die

mna – to arrive in port, to die

mn – to arrive in port, to die

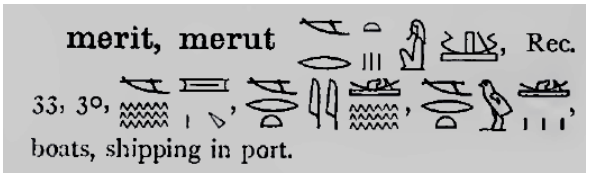
The first version of the term is comprised of the metutu (hieroglyphs) for the mn combination  , for the letter 'n'  , for the letter 'a'  and for the letter 'u'  . The final metut (symbol) is a determinative metut. This is a symbol that is not pronounced but is an indicator or determiner of what is being spoken of in the word. The determinative metut in this instance is the boat:  .

In the second version of the word we have the metutu for the word mna, however the determinative is not a boat. It is the mummified body – a dead person:  . In the third version of the term mn the metut of the mummified body/dead person is used alone and encompasses the word and the idea in total:  mn. It is a common practice in the written language of Kamit to spell out the entire word and use a determinative metut or to simply use the determinative metut alone to signify the word and concept…."

Quote from pages 6-7:



"….It is relevant in this regard that the term mn means dead one, mummified one, one who has arrived in port. The one who arrives in port, or docks has his/her boat 'moored' or tied/fastened. The term mni thus means 'moored' and is the etymological origin of the english term 'moor' as in 'mooring post':

Once the boat has arrived in port, it is mni - moored or tied to a mooring post. [See the Coptic version of the term: MOONE (Mooh-reh): Copt. ⲙⲟⲟⲛⲉ from which the english 'moor' is derived. The rolling 'r' sound (tongue tapping the roof of the mouth once) and the 'n' sound are identical and interchange in Afurakani/Afuraitkaitnit (African) languages. moone (moo-neh) thus sounds identical to moore (moo-reh).]…"

The key here is the relationship between mn meaning to arrive in port, to die and mr meaning death, the dead but also boats, shipping in port:

A moored boat is one that has arrived in port (mni, mri) and is fastened. Like a person reaching their final destination (death) and the body is placed in the ground (port) and 'tied' to Asaase Afua (Earth Mother), so is the boat which reaches its final destination fastened after its arrival/death. It will not be sailing anymore – its journey has come to an end. There is no longer freedom of movement. When the boat arrives in port and is moored, the inhabitants disembark - leave the boat. When the individual arrives in port, dies, and his/her body is 'moored', fastened to Asaase Afua (buried in Earth), the inhabitant (spirit) of the body leaves for the body is dead. There is no longer freedom of movement for the body. The spirit therefore disembarks, leaves the physical vessel.

The notion of death, lack of freedom, being moored/tied, submerged (flood water, buried) and more is the basis for a class of people who are referred to as mr or mru (plural, also written mrw), meaning not only the dead and the damned but also servants, slaves, bondsmen/women, serfs, vassals, dependents, etc. They are the 'socially dead' - tied, fastened, lacking of freedom, weak, wretched, etc:

We also have the english term 'mourn' which is also directly tied to the term 'moor' with its etymological roots in mer and mni – death:

Mnt or Mnut (Mrt or Mrnut) meaning suffering, mourning, etc. is the root of the term 'mourn'. We also have:

As we can see above, we have the term agb meaning to mourn, grieve and the same term agb meaning flood, primordial waters, inundation. Some have identified the term egp.t (Egypt - the land of the inundation) being derived from agb, the inundation. The notion of a descriptive title of the country being defined through flooding, inundation and mourning, death in the term agb is identical to the notion of mer (death, mourning) and mer (inundation, flood) being used as a descriptive title of the country – Ta mri. It should be noted that the swelling of the river during the inundation is said to be caused by a tear-drop falling from the star Sapadet (Sopdet – also called Sirius or Sothis by the whites). This star has the title 'Eye of Ra (Creator)'. The 'crying' or mourning (agb or mn/mr) from this Divine tear-drop thus causes the inundation (agb or mn/mr). These terms and definitions are all united through the cosmology of Kamit.

Merit Shema

Merit Meht

Merit is the name of the Ntorot (Ntrt/Netert term for Goddess) of the inundation of the river in Kamit. There are Two Female 'Nile' river Ntorotu (Goddesses), Merit Shema and Merit Meht meaning Merit of the Southern Branch of the river and country and Merit of the Northern Branch of the river and country. These Two Ntorotu are often shown to be the Wives of the Male Ntorou (Ntru plural term for Gods) of the Nile – Hapi:

Hapi Meht and Hapi Reset

Above are the Twin Ntorou (Gods) Hap Meht (Hapi of the North) and Hap Reset (Hapi of the South). The Nile River is often referred to simply as the Hapi river. However, when speaking of the inundation (flood) of the river we are focused on the Female Ntorotu, the Meriti (dual Merit) Who are the Female Spirit-Forces behind the flood.

[The term for water in Kamit is mu. Mu Hap Meht means waters (mu) of the Northern Nile Deity Hap Meht. MuHapMeht was corrupted into muhammed by the whites and their offspring and applied to a fictional character/prophet of the false religion of islam who in fact never existed at all. See our KUKUU-TUNTUM – The Ancestral Jurisdiction for details.]

In ancient Kamit, it very rarely rained. However, every year the river would flood creating a tremendous lake, hundreds of miles long and 10-12 miles wide in certain regions. Kamit was situated along the river which is the longest river in the world. When the river would flood once a year, it was a time of ritual invocation of the Ntorou/Ntorotu (Gods/Goddesses) to ensure a promising future crop-yield. The flooding of the river would bring black silt and deposit that black silt along the river banks. Months later when the water would recede, there would be fertile land wherein the people would plant their seeds. The Kamau (people of Kamit - 'Egyptians') were totally dependent upon the flood of the river every year for their sustenance.

When the river would flood, Merit Shema and Merit Meht were the Spirit-Forces Who presided over the swelling or 'pregnancy' of the river [Note: in Akan the term menem *[merem] means 'to swell' as in the swelling of a river*]. To the dwellers along the riverbanks, it appeared that the entire country had been inundated. It appeared as it was in what is called the Sep Tepi or First Time – The beginning of Creation. In our cosmology, we recognized that at the beginning of the Creation of the world there was no land, only water. While today approximately 71% of the Earth is covered by water, in the beginning the entire Earth was covered by water. Ra and Rait (Creator and Creatress of the Universe), operating as a Spirit-Force through the solar energy/fire of the Aten (Sun), activated the fire in the Earth's core thereby activating the Earth Mother. This resulted in earthquakes on the ocean floor and volcanic eruptions which ultimately caused a primordial hill to surge up from underneath the surface of the water. This raised land would become the first landmass of Earth - Afuraka/Afuraitkait (Africa).

Every year during the inundation, the Kamau were reminded of the cosmology. When Merit Meht and Merit Shema presided over the pregnancy/swelling of the body of the river, a large portion of the land was buried or submerged under water. This was a form of death. The plant life was submerged. The land animals living along the banks retreated. The land was buried/submerged for a period. However, when the new season came it was time for a re-emergence, a rebirth. The land emerged from its submergence/burial/death, the plant life was 'resurrected'. This recalled the story of Ausar, the Ntoro (Deity) who was killed, buried and resurrected. Ritually, this recalled the notion of initiation being a process of someone 'going under', dying to the old self and resurrecting as a new individual with new responsibilities (priesthood/priestesshood) and much more. It also recalled the fact that when men and women were in conflict with regard to their love-relationships, the desire (mr) for their significant other manifested as the flood of the rivers of blood in the body to the heart. One's heart would then be submerged, flooded, become heavy with anxiety, would pain them and he or she would feel like a death (mr) has occurred – 'love is death' (mr is mr) – the heart would 'freeze' or 'stop'. There may even be a flood or inundation of tears – crying. Resolution of conflict however would bring an end to the heavy (dead) heart. A rebirth or restoration of balance would occur as the heart would begin to palpitate at its normal rhythm again. The tears would cease. The flood waters would recede.

It is important to note that in Afurakani/Afuraitkaitnit (African) culture, Death in and of Itself is not seen as evil or as a curse. Death also is not the opposite of life. One is born into the world, we live in the physical world, then go through the gate of Death and live in the Ancestral world. In our culture, we recognize Death to be the opposite of Birth – life is continuous in the physical realm (after birth) and the spirit-realm (after death).

Ancient Kamit was distinguished in many ways. The mru (pyramids) are magnificent structures which define an aspect of Kamit. The yearly inundation governed the entire economy and social life of the people. This is why Kamit would be referred to as Ta Merit, the land of the inundation. This name is also related to Mer meaning the land of the Mer or pyramids. However, in both instances we are referring to death (mr), submergence, burial, inundation, shrines for the dead (meru), etc. This is why those who died were referred to as those who arrived in port (mni or mri) like a boat docking and being moored (mni, mri).

This is not without precedent. The land south of Kamit, contemporary Sudan and Ethiopia, was called Ta Aakhu meaning – Land of the Ancestresses and Ancestors (Aakhu) – Land of the Venerable Deceased Spirits/Dead:

The people of Kamit and Khanit paid great attention to those who lived honorable lives and continued to support us as Ancestresses and Ancestors (Aakhu/Aakhutu) from the Ancestral realm. They were/are our beloved (mri, mriti) deceased. We therefore built our beloved (mr) dead (mr) shrines/pyramids (mr). This practice was only for those who lived in harmony with Divine Order while on Earth.

However, societally, those who were engaged in self-destructive lifestyles were referred to as being 'dead' – meru (mru). Those who were slaves, servants (prisoners of war or convicted felons for example) were tied (mr) to their lot in life and thus to those whom they served. In contemporary culture we often refer to those who are tied/addicted to drugs as 'dead' or those who are engaged in self-destructive behavior as mentally or spiritually 'dead'. The same is true of the culture of ancient Kamit:

"…As for the fool does not hear, he can do nothing at all. He looks at ignorance and sees knowledge. He looks at harmfulness and sees usefulness. He does everything that one detests and is blamed for it every day. He lives on the things by which one dies. His food is evil speech. His sort is known to the officials who say, 'There goes a living death every day'. One ignores the things that he does because of his many daily troubles…" [Instructions of Ptah Hetep - c4400 years ago]

When the whites and their offspring invaded Kamit, they learned of these terms from our language and continued to use them. We have proven conclusively that this is the case, for the varied definitions of the term 'moor' (waste land, sea, swamp, death, love, fastening a boat) have been shown to have their roots in the language of Kamit. The whites and their offspring continue to use the terms to this day with the exact same six meanings – although they lack cosmological understanding. The same is true of the whites and their offspring designating Black people as Moors:

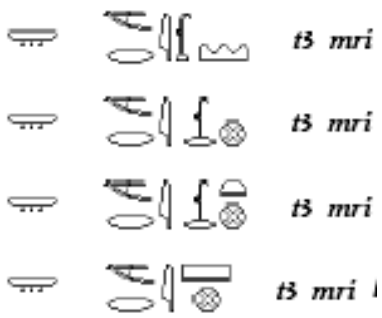
Moor (n.)



"North African, Berber," late 14c., from O.Fr. More, from M.L. Morus, from L. Maurus "inhabitant of Mauritania" (northwest Africa, a region now corresponding to northern Algeria and Morocco), from Gk. Mauros, perhaps a native name, or else cognate with mauros "black" (but this adjective only appears in late Greek and may as well be from the people's name as the reverse). Being a dark people in relation to Europeans, their name in the Middle Ages was a synonym for "Negro;" later (16c.-17c.) used indiscriminately of Muslims (Persians, Arabs, etc.) but especially those in India.

The terms moor and blackamoor were used by europeans as a descriptive of Black people who were muslims and Black people in general over time. The term was also used to identify anyone who was darker that the western european such as white arabs and hindus, although white arabs and white hindus are not Afurakanu/Afuraitkaitnut (Africans~Black People). [The original people of these areas were Black. However, just as in 'egypt' today, the white invaders are in control of these regions. The white invaders in arab-controlled regions of the world, in india and elsewhere are not Black.] Just as the term mer (love) was corrupted into amour (ah-mohr) meaning 'love' in european languages, so was the term mer (singular) or meru (plural) referring to 'dead people; the damned; slaves, servants, vassals' etc. corrupted into moor (mohr) and moors in european languages.

In Kamit, to be labeled a 'mer' or a dead, damned person or a slave was a pejorative. This carried over into the european usage of the term. The only difference being that all Black people were labeled 'moors' as a pejorative by the whites. The europeans understood that the color Black was associated with Divine Power, Ancestrally vested power in Kamit. It was therefore associated with death. Because the whites and their offspring improperly associated death with evil, they sought to associate being Black with death in a pejorative sense, and therefore with evil. This is how mr (dead, damned, slave, servant) was connected with Ta Merit – land of the Dead (submergence/inundation/wasteland - see mere the 'dead land') and because Ta Mert (land of the pyramids) was also Kam-t (Kam - Black; Kam-t - Black land/Land of the Blacks) then Black was improperly associated by the whites with 'death', 'slave', 'servant', etc. We must also recall that it is the Merit Ntorotu, the Goddesses of the inundation/flood/submergence/death, who bring the black silt from the south to deposit on the banks of the river. The merit-water (flood-water as opposed to the water during the remainder of the year) was thus the 'black'-water. The black silt comprised the Kam-t or Black land. The black silt is sacred to Ausar. It is His shrine on Earth. He thus has the title Kam-Ur, the Great (Ur) Black One (Kam):

Ausar also called Kam-Ur. Ausar is the Sovereign of the Ancestral Realm – The Realm of the 'Dead'

Above are four different versions of the name Ta Mri or Ta Mra. Note that in the first version the determinative metut is that of the notched palm branch  which references time as in the beginning of a season or period. We also have the metut for desert land  - dead land, wasteland, land of the west, land of the setting Aten/Sun where the boat of Ra arrives in port (mni, mri) [Note that waste means 'desolate region'. The land of the west is the desertland (waste/westland) where the Aten (Sun) goes to 'die' (mer)]

Ta Mri is thus the land which returns, via inundation, to a dead-land (mere), the land which is buried for a season, then resurrected/reborn. It is important to recall that in Kamit, the Ntoro (Deity) Set is the Ntoro of the desert/dead land. Set is also called Mr – the 'damned' one meaning one who works with deceased spirits:

[Set or Seti was corrupted by the whites into Setin or Satan – the spirit who rules the dead, the damned, in the underworld/hell.]

The term mru (mrw, meru) meaning the damned is indicated by the determinative metut of a man on one knee driving an axe through the middle of his forehead:  He is engaged in self-destructive, suicidal activity. The axe through the head shows that he is not only mentally dead but spiritually and physically dead. Self-destructive behavior, inclusive of suicide is taboo, Divinely prohibited, in Afurakani/Afuraitkaitnit (African) culture. This dead person is thus a damned person. In Akan culture the term akyiwade is the word for taboo. It describes that which is kyi - hated by Nyamewaa-Nyame (the Supreme Being). Just as in all of Afuraka/Afuraitkait (Africa), taboos are Divinely prohibited/Divinely hated deeds, entities, objects, etc. If we violate an akyiwade, a Divine prohibition or restriction, we 'damn' ourselves because we place ourselves out of harmony with Divine Order. The term mru meaning serfs, servants, vassals is also spelled with the notched palm branch:

Mrat Ta Mra

In the second and third versions of Ta Mri above, the notched palm branch is the determinative metut along with the metut for country, territory. Ta Mri is thus a descriptive of the country in the context of the time/season of the merit – inundation (submergence, death). This is why we have the term Ta mrau with the same determinative symbols referencing the time of the inundation – death, submergence when referring to a group of people: Ta-merâu . Note that the ancient name of the country most often used is Kamit and the people Kammau:

Kam

Kammâu , with , Jour. As. 1908, 285, Egyptians.

The name Ta Mra or Ta Mrit is not attested until the 11th dynasty – thousands of years after the civilization was founded. The name Kamit is used from the early dynasties. In the last version of the term Ta mri above, the determinative is the metut for a mass of water and the metut for country or territory – the land/country of the great merit – inundation (submergence, death). These facts collectively show that Ta mert is defined specifically as the land of the inundation, death, submergence and not the 'beloved land'.

Again, the whites and their offspring took a term that was a pejorative when referring to a class of people in Kamau society (mr or mru) and used that pejorative term to apply to all Black people. Instead of simply referring to us all as Kamau (Black People/Blacks – Black being Divine) – as we referred to ourselves - they decided to use the term mr (corrupted into 'moor') - specifically because it was/is pejorative.

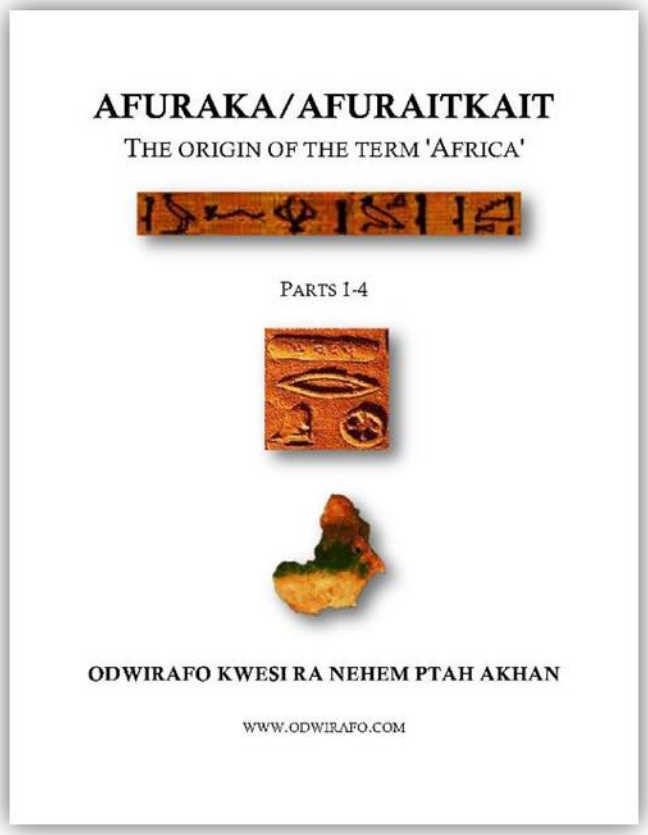
Ancient Black people of Kamit and those outside of Kamit never referred to themselves as 'Moors'

Again, some Black people colloquially refer to drug addicts in america as the 'walking dead'. A white foreigner could enter a Black community in america, learn of the label that Black people use - 'walking dead' - and begin to refer to all Black People (including all those not addicted to any drugs) as the 'walking dead'. This is a pejorative used by a community for a certain segment of the population who are self-destructive being taken by a foreigner and used as a label of identity for the entire community. This is a deliberate attempt to insult and redefine the people. [In fact, many whites in america do refer to all Black people in america in these terms today.]

The whites and their offspring, after invading Afurakani/Afuraitkaitnit (African) civilizations and losing numerous wars to Afurakanu/Afuraitkaitnut (Africans), decided to work on destroying our Ancestral Religion and Culture. This was a means by which they believed that they could disrupt the society, exploit divisions and ultimately divide and conquer. Part of the process was to demonize Black people. This is why all throughout white pseudo-religion black is defined as evil, of the devil, demonic, etc. Black is associated with death in a negative fashion. This goes directly back to ancient Kamit where Merit (death of the crops, flooding of the land, end of a cycle/season) was associated with Mer (pyramids/shrines for the dead) and mer (the dead, those who arrived in port and were mer-ed or moored and also the class of the dead who were damned) [see the related terms: morose, morbid, mortuary, moron, etc. meaning melancholy, psychologically unhealthy – associated with death, sanctuary of the dead, ignorant – mentally dead, etc. – all of which have the same roots in mr and later moor and are pejoratives]. Yet, the association with a social class (slaves, servants – socially dead/bound/moored/fastened to their labor and service) and a spiritual designation for a certain class of the deceased (the damned) was artificially expanded by the whites as a definition of all Black people.

Those Afurakanu/Afuraitkaitnut (Africans~Black People) who have embraced the idiocy of 'moorish' culture and identity and refer to themselves as 'moors', 'muurs', etc. are perpetuating the perverse agenda of the whites and their offspring. They are identifying themselves as 'dead people'.

Mru (Moors) – the dead, the damned



Many of these individuals perpetuate as well the false notion that the term Black means 'death'. They therefore do not call themselves Black nor do they understand the proper etymology of the term Afurakani/Afuraitkaitnit (African). They therefore do not recognize nor embrace the reality that they are Afurakani/Afuraitkaitnit (African).

Black does not mean death – Moor means death

Such individuals have been given false and foolish definitions – directly from the whites and their offspring – and have accepted these false definitions because of a deeply seeded and deeply seated self-hatred. The whites and their offspring have spent centuries attempting to convince us that 'Black' and 'African' mean inferior, ugly, ignorant, slave, etc. This began before the enslavement era and continues today. Misguided individuals who identify themselves as 'moors', 'muurs', etc. have internalized this false doctrine and thus have a psychological need to believe that they are something – anything – other than Black or Afurakani/Afuraitkaitnit (African). Many of them detest the mention of the word African. Yet, deep inside they know that is exactly who and what they are. They know this from genealogy, trustory, archaeology, genetics/DNA and common sense. However, they hate this reality and therefore seek any measure to distort it. This is a manifestation of their ingrained conditioning to accept Black inferiority and the insane notion of white supremacy. This ingrained conditioning is also made manifest in their maniacal search of the entirety of the ancient world for words with the consonantal structure 'MR' in order to make them mean 'moor' in order to retro-fit a false assumed identity.

There are also those Black people who are agents of the whites who know the truth but continue to serve their white masters by miseducating as many Blacks as possible about our identity. All of the founders of these 'moorish' as well as 'Black muslim' and 'hebrew' movements fit into this category.

We have published an extensive analysis of the term 'Africa' and have shown that his term was created and used by Afurakanu/Afuraitkaitnut (Africans) thousands of years before any other group existed on Earth:

www.odwirafo.com/AFURAKA-AFURAITKAIT.html

In the publication we show that the Creator and Creatress of the Universe are called Ra and Rait in Kamit. They operate through the Aten (Sun). When Ra and Rait, the Great Spirit/Divine Living Energy in Creation, move within matter, they take on the titles Afu Ra and Afu Rait. The term 'afu' means 'house' or 'flesh'. On an individual level, your flesh/body is the house or place of residence for your spirit. When the Spirit of Ra and Rait moved within the primordial Earth to activate It and give It life (like sunlight penetrating Earth and stimulating the Earth's core), They were/are referred to as Afu Ra and Afu Rait. When Their movements caused earthquakes on the ocean floor, ultimately resulting in volcanic eruptions and a portion of the ocean floor surging upward above the surface of the water which covered Earth, this first 'raised land' or hill became the first landmass of Earth. The male/female terms for 'hill' or 'raised land' in Kamit are Ka and Kait. The Ka of Afu Ra is Afuraka. The Kait of Afu Rait is Afuraitkait. Afuraka/Afuraitkait is the land of the Creator and Creatress. This information is detailed in the above referenced article-series.

Because Ra and Rait operate through the Aten (Sun), They are often erroneously referred to the as the 'Sun God' and 'Sun Goddess'. In reality, Ra and Rait use the Aten (Sun) and other stars as physical transmitters of Their Spiritual Energy. This is how They manifest through the fire of the Aten (Sun).

The term black is erroneously traced back to eurasian languages by the whites and their offspring:

The same root produced Old English blac "bright, shining, glittering, pale;" the connecting notions being, perhaps, "fire" (bright) and "burned" (dark). The usual Old English word for "black" was sweart (see swart). According to OED: "In ME. it is often doubtful whether blac, blak, blake, means 'black, dark,' or 'pale, colourless, wan, livid.' " Used of dark-skinned people in Old English.

Old English blæcan "bleach, whiten," from P.Gmc. *blaikjan "to make white" (cf. Old Saxon blek, Old Norse bleikr, Dutch bleek, Old High German bleih, German bleich "pale;" Old Norse bleikja, Dutch bleken, German bleichen "to bleach"), from PIE root *bhel- (1) "to shine, flash, burn" (cf. Sanskrit bhrajate "shines;" Greek phlegein "to burn;" Latin flamma "flame," fulmen "lightning," fulgere "to shine, flash," flagrare "to burn;" Old Church Slavonic belu "white;" Lithuanian balnas "pale"). The same root probably produced black; perhaps because both black and white are colorless, or because both are associated with burning. Related: Bleached; bleaching.

As we can see, the term black is traced to the proto-indo-european root bhleg and the root bhel meaning 'to shine, flash, burn'. The greek and latin related terms are phlegein and flagrare. Note that flagrare is the root of the english term flagrant. We can also see that the term bleach is traced to the same root. The reason why bleach and black are related is because bleach burns and something that has been on fire or has burned becomes black. The whiteness associated with bleach and black (both related to burning) has to do with the fact that the fire of the Aten (Sun) and fire in general shines/burns 'white' and burns things black. These terms also have their roots in ancient Kamit.

As we show in the AFURAKA/AFURAITKAIT article series, the people of North Afuraka/Afuraitkait (Africa) called Aourigha also pronounced Afarak and Afri have their roots in Khanit and Kamit. The terms Afer and Afri in Kamit mean to burn, to be hot and smoke, hot vapor respectively:

This is because the roots of these terms are Afu Ra and Afu Rait. Ra and Rait, the Creator and Creatress operating through the Aten (Sun), the Great white shining, burning fire, caused the water of the primordial Earth to boil and create vapor. It is Their Divine Energy which activates our abatumm, melanin, and causes us to become black. Some of the descendants of the Northern Afurakanu/Afuraitkaitnut (Africans), now called Berbers (the Black Berbers as opposed to the white invaders who now erroneously call themselves Berbers) are called Fula (Fulani). The name Fula is directly derived from Afura (Afri people).

[In ancient Kamit there was no letter 'L'. The metut (hieroglyph) used to translate foreign words that included the 'L' sound is the metut for the letter 'R'. This is because the rolling 'R' and the 'L' interchange linguistically. The greek title Ptolemis is translated in the metutu as Ptuaremis for example. The same is true in the Akan language. There is no letter 'L'. If an Akan speaker pronounces a foreign word that includes an 'L' sound, he or she will pronounce it with a rolling 'R'. The foreign term 'mulatto' is pronounced by Akan speakers as 'murato-ni' for example. This is why Fula and Fura are identical.]

The Fula or Fulani can be found across the continent of Afuraka/Afuraitkait (Africa), from East Afuraka/Afuraitkait (Africa) [in Sudan/Khanit] through Central, North and West Afuraka/Afuraitkait (Africa) all the way to the regions of Senegal and Gambia.

There are variations in the way that the Fula pronounce their name. In Afurakani/Afuraitkaitnit (African) languages the 'P' and 'F' often interchange. This is why some Fula people pronounce and spell their name Peul or Pel. Thus, a branch of the ancient Aourigha or Afarak, Afurak, Afri – the Furak or Fula, also call themselves the Peul. This is a manifestation of the ancient roots of the relationship between bhleg and bhel - Fula (Furak, Afarak) and Peul. The 'B', 'P' and 'F' in european languages interchange because this feature was taken from Afurakani/Afuraitkaitnit (African) languages. This is how bhleg becomes phlegein and flagrare. This is how the name of the ancient region of Kamit called Paaraka (Pilak in Coptic – 'R' and 'L' interchanging) becomes Philae in greek. The 'P' becomes an 'F' (PH) sound. Another example is a title of the Creator, Ra. A major title of Ra in Kamit is Pa Ra. The term Pa is the definite article. Pa Ra means 'The' Ra – Thee God.

In Coptic, Pa Ra or Pra becomes Phre (Fra or Freh) ⲫⲣⲏ.:

Moreover, the 'B' and 'F' (Ph) sound interchange in Kamit. The term brg (barg) in ancient Kamit becomes pharg in Coptic Copt. ⲫⲱⲣⲝ.:

Fula Women

Original Ancient Black Berber (Afri)

The Aourigha or Afaraka, Afuraka, Afurak, Afura, Fula people were/are black people because black refers directly to our skin color, our abatumm (melanin) and the solar fire moving through our afu (flesh). When the white, shining, fire of Ra/Rait moves inside of the physical matter of the body (afu) we have Blackness as a result. This is the connection between the english corruptions black and bleach. The titles Afura and Afurait are also the origin of the english term 'fire' (Fura). This also accounts for the notion of the adjective 'pale' (Peul, Fula) being associated with black and bleach. It references the radiant light (pale/white), light of the fire of Fura - Afura and Afurait. Moreover, the terms phlegien, flagrare are rooted in Afarak(n) and Afuraka.

The first landmass, called Ka/Kait, to rise up from the primordial ocean in the Sep Tepi (First Time) was a primordial, Black, landmass. The terms Ka/Kait and their variations Kaka/Kakait (Kk, Kkt – often written Kek and Kekut) references Divine Blackness – Deities of the Divine Black Substance of Space. The Black Substance of Space (see Dark matter and Dark energy in astronomy) within which all of the planets, Suns, stars, dwell is that plasma from which the bodies of the planets and stars (see Black Bodies in astronomy) were formed. This is why the original Earth's first landmass was recognized to be a Ka/Kait – a primordial Black hill or 'raised land'. The terms Ka and Kait are also the masculine and feminine terms for 'Soul' in Kamit.

The term Black as a designation for Afurakani/Afuraitkaitnit (African) people has always been a sacred designation referencing our skin color as well as our identity as children of Afu Ra and Afu Rait. Afu (flesh) Ra (Spirit) Ka (Soul and melanin-body), Afu (flesh) Rait (Spirit) Kait (Soul and melanin-body) – Afurakanu/Afuraitkaitnut (Africans~Black People).

MAR/BAR

In Akan culture the term for law is mmara. The 'm' and 'b' interchange in Akan as well as ancient Kamit. This is why mmara – law, has as its singular form bara. As a verb, bara often contracted to bra means to forbid. The noun and plural form becomes mbara or mmara – law. Those who uphold the law are called barafo (mmarafo) pluralized as abrafo. The suffix 'fo' means 'people' as in a group. The abrafo or abarafo are that group of people 'fo' who uphold the law bara (mmara). They are the bara (law) fo (people). In common english, this group of people are referred to as the 'police officers' [In american parlance, police are often called 'law-men' or 'the law']. They oversee the proper functioning of various aspects of the nation on a continuous basis. This title and function have their roots in Kamit:

A designation for the Two Divine Eyes, Sun and Moon is Mrt (Mart). The egyptologist translated the term as Mert. However, notice that in the Coptic dialect the term is pronounced BAR: Copt. ⲃⲁⲗ. The term Mr meaning overseer, chief officer, director, etc. written Bar in Coptic is the same title Bara (Barafo, Mmarafo) in Akan. The obara-fo is the bara or mmara person – the law person – the police officer. This is the individual who in-spects all activity in the nation in order to determine where imbalance exists so that he/she may exercise his/her authority to uphold law by enforcing order. This is the association of the Divine Eye (MAR or BAR) with the one who in-spects (looks within), the over-seer, the chief officer (BARA-fo).

Mr-ti (Bar-ti) the two (ti) Eyes (mar/bar) from the coffin of Hetep Nebi

The two Divine Eyes, the Sun and Moon, are often referred to as the Right and Left Eyes of Heru. Heru Ur is depicted as a Hawk – the highest flying bird in the sky in Kamit with the keenest vision. He is the great Over-Seer. He is also, as Heru Behudet (Behdety), the Enforcer of Divine Order. He is called Bena in Akan culture. Bena is often contracted to Bera and Bra. He is the Obrafo Kesee, the Great Obrafo, Divine Executioner, created at the beginning of the world to Enforce Divine Order in Akan cosmology. There are many titles in Kamit referencing 'overseer, inspector' beginning with 'Mr' which are rooted in this cosmological reality.

The term mr (mar) in Kamit meaning overseer, chief, head as well as brave man was corrupted into mir and emir in arabic meaning 'commander'. The arabic language is not an ancient language nor is it Afurakani/Afuraitkaitnit (African). It includes numerous words with roots in ancient Kamit (just as english, latin, greek, sanskrit, etc. do also) because of the invasions of the whites and their offspring and their cooptation and perversion of our language and culture. There is a relationship between mr (bar) meaning overseer, inspector and mer meaning death, for in Akan culture the abrafo (bara-fo) are also adumfo meaning executioners. When someone is convicted of a crime and sentenced to death (mr) the mr (bara-fo) carries out the execution. The term mr as mar/bar however is not the origin of 'moor'.

The term mr (mar) is also found in ancient Sumer (later called Babylon). Sumer was an ancient Afurakani/Afuraitkaitnit (African) civilization founded by migrants from Afuraka/Afuraitkait (Africa) over 6,000 years ago. The migrants from Khanit and Kamit who established what would later be called Sumer of course brought their language, culture and cosmology with them. This is why the term Mar.tu also written Mar.ta means 'west'. This is the same term from Kamit - amn.t or amn.ta meaning 'west'. The general term amn (amen) in Kamit means 'hidden' or 'concealed'. When the Aten (Sun) sets in the west and sinks below the horizon it becomes the 'hidden' Aten (Sun). The west was thus called the 'hidden land' – amnt (ament). The Ancestral Realm was also called the 'hidden' land (amnt.t).

As quoted above, the Aten rises from the mountain range called Bakhau in the east (abtet) and sets in the mountain range called Manu in the west (ament). The term for the western mountain range, the region where the Aten dies (mn), sets (mn), arrives in port (mn) is called Manu and has the same roots as the term mn - dead, hidden (amn). The name Manu or Mnu related to Amnt becomes Mar.tu or Mar.ta in Sumerian meaning 'west'. A description of the people called Mar.tu, later referred to as Amurru or Amorites can be found in Sumerian texts:

"…The MAR.TU who know no grain... The MAR.TU who know no house nor town, the boors of the mountains... The MAR.TU who digs up truffles... who does not bend his knees (to cultivate the land), who eats raw meat, who has no house during his lifetime, who is not buried after death...

They have prepared wheat and gú-nunuz (grain) as a confection, but an Amorite will eat it without even recognizing what it contains!..."

[E. Chiera, Sumerian Texts of Varied Contents, Chicago, 1934, No.3]

Again, we have the ancient association of those who are considered socially 'dead' called mar.tu (manu, mnu, mrtu – the rolling 'R' and 'N' interchange). They are called the boors of the mountains - Manu – the western (martu) mountain range (manu) where the Aten 'dies' – mn. The english word 'boor' chosen by the translator means 'uncivilized, unrefined'. They are uncivilized and are not buried after death (mn). The unburied are the 'perpetually dead'.

The term mar.tu of Sumer is descendent of the term mru (mrt) – socially 'dead' of ancient Kamit. This is a cosmological concept that the ancient Khanitu and Kamau (Nubians and Egyptians) carried with them as they migrated from Khanit and Kamit to the Near East thousands of years ago.

As we can see in the excerpt addressing the character of those referred to as mar.tu, the description fits the character of the whites and their offspring. The Mar.tu were later caller Amurru which translates in english to Amorites. In Kamit, these people were called Aamu. [Note that Amurru means 'west' and is a version of amnu (amenut/amanu). Aamu also means 'west' and 'right'.]. The original inhabitants of the region of what is now called palestine, israel, lebanon and syria were Afurakanu/Afuraitkaitnut (Africans) who migrated from Khanit and Kamit. Some of these people migrated further east to establish Sumer. However, these areas were invaded by the whites and their offspring. The mru (mar.tu) designation meaning 'uncivilized', 'socially dead' was naturally given to the white invaders as a group of uncivilized criminals. This is why the Aamu (Amurru, Mar.tu, Amorites) in the murals of ancient Kamit were typically depicted as non-Black:

This painting from the tomb of Ramses 111 (1200 BC) shows that the Egyptians saw themselves as Blacks, and painted themselves as such without possible confusion with the Indo-Europeans [Caucasoids] or the Semites. It is a representation of the races in their most minute differences, which insures the accuracy of the colors. Throughout their entire history, the Egyptians never entertained the fantasy of portraying themselves by types B or D.

A) The Egyptian seen by himself, black type B) The "Indo-European"
C) The other Blacks in Africa
D) The Semite

This excerpt from Civilization or Barbarism by Cheik Anta Diop shows an artist's rendition of a mural inside of the tomb of Ramessu III. [See the KV11 tomb for actual images]. The first figure, Rtu is a Kamau. The second figure, Aamu, is an 'amorite'. The third figure, Nehesu, is one of the people of Khanit (Nubia) and the fourth figure Tmhu, is one of the white invaders of North Afuraka/Afuraitkait (Africa), East Afuraka/Afuraitkait (Africa) and arabia which includes the arab-type [The Arabian peninsula was originally populated by Afurakanu/Afuraitkaitnut (Africans). The whites invaded thousands of years later. They also corrupted the traditional religion – which was the same as that of Kamit – and manufactured the false god allah, the fictional character muhammad and the false religion of islam]. The Aamu figure (called Mar.tu, Amurru in Sumer) is one of the whites and their offspring. These invaders of the Black civilizations of the ancient Near East had the characteristics of barbarians as shown in the quoted text. They were uncivilized, spiritually and mentally dead individuals. Those who would attempt to trace the term 'moor' back to the mar.tu are tracing the term back to white, uncivilized, barbaric invaders. They also reinforce the reality that the term defines 'the dead/damned'.

Moreover, the name mar.tu is related to the name Mari which was a city-state to the west of central Sumer and situated on west bank of what is now called the euphrates river. Mari flourished about 5,000 years ago. The original inhabitants of this area were Afurakanu/Afuraitkaitnut (Africans) who had migrated north from ancient Khanit and Kamit. The name Mari, directly related to the later Mar.tu also references the 'west'. The names Mari, Mar.tu, Amurru have their etymological roots in Mni, Mrt, Mnu and Mru. They reference the 'west' as a geographical region, but most importantly the aspect of our cosmology wherein the nature of the inhabitants of the 'west' are defined as the 'dead'. The ancient designation mni, mri meaning the dead land was carried by Afurakanu/Afuraitkaitnut (Africans) from Kamit wherever we migrated. This is why the later kingdom of Maure (Mari) geographically to the extreme west of Kamit, bears this title. It was the greeks and romans who began to use the term maure (mauri) to refer not only to the people of the Numidian kingdom of that time (Mauritania - c2200-2300 years ago) but to Black people in general. The greeks, romans and later arabs were familiar with the root of the name maure being the term mru – the dead, damned, etc. - and its origins in Kamit for they had invaded Kamit, occupied Kamit for centuries and learned of the language including this term. The greek and roman invaders of Kamit not only began to imitate the dress, statecraft and ritual practices of the Kamau, but also misused the language. As stated previously, the white invaders took the term mru that was a pejorative designation for a certain class of society in Kamit and over time labeled the entirety of the Black race with the term – wherever they came into contact with us in the world.

Just as the whites and their offspring did in the past, so do they continue today. The whites and their offspring including arabs, turks and others utilized the derogatory term mru, corrupted into 'moor', to apply to Black people in general. They then use Black 'moors' to brainwash other Black people to accept the insanity of white supremacy and Black inferiority – which includes the false religion of islam and the pseudo-esotericism of masonry.

This is the origin of such individuals as Timothy Drew/Noble Drew Ali, Elijah Muhammad and Abdul Hamied Sulaiman – all of whom were worshippers of the white arab or turk as divine or 'god' – dedicating their lives to brainwashing Black people with white worship. The Canaanite Temple, Moorish Science Temple of america, Nation of islam, all other forms of islam, Nuwaubianism, all forms of hebrewism including Moorish hebrewism and others continue to perpetuate the agenda of the white slavemaster from eastern eurasia, just as Black 'christians' continue to perpetuate the agenda of the white slavemaster from western eurasia and america.

These individuals all taught Afurakanu/Afuraitkaitnut (Africans~Black People) to hate ourselves – reject the reality that we are Afurakani/Afuraitkaitnit (African) – and to embrace a pseudo-'asian' identity. They taught us to denigrate and reject Afurakani/Afuraitkaitnit (African) Ancestral Religion and Culture and to worship the white arabs, turks and hindus as 'god' or as having a divine position as custodians of the 'true religion'. This is the contemporary origin of Black people foolishly referring to themselves with the derogatory name 'moors'. The title 'moor' is an insult to the intelligence of all Afurakanu/Afuraitkaitnut (Africans) and all of our Ancestresses and Ancestors. It is the equivalent of calling ourselves 'nigger'. [Notwithstanding the false etymologies now being circulated regarding 'nigger' by the uninformed].

The ancient origin of this self-denigrating behavior is rooted in the greek, roman and arab invasions of ancient Kamit and the advent of what is referred to as the 'arab slave trade', 'indian ocean slave trade', asian enslavement of Afurakanu/Afuraitkaitnut (Tang dynasty in china) and the 'atlantic slave trade'. [It must be understood that Afurakanu/Afuraitkaitnut (Africans) were not 'slaves' – we were captured as prisoners of war and forced into 'enslavement']. The whites and their offspring continue to promote the false 'moorish', 'islamic', 'christian' and 'hebrew' identities among Afurakanu/Afuraitkaitnut (Africans) in Afuraka/Afuraitkait (Africa) and outside of Afuraka/Afuraitkait (Africa) today through their Black agents. They will continue until we eradicate them.

After having endured enslavement as Afurakanu/Afuraitkaitnut (Africans) in the western hemisphere, many Afurakanu/Afuraitkaitnut (Africans) embraced the perversity of Black self-hatred promoted by the whites and their offspring [Externally manifested through hair-straightening, skin-lightening, etc. Internally manifested through the acceptance of the insanity of white-worship]. This is why it has been relatively easy for white christians, muslims, hebrews, hindus, buddhists, vedantins, pseudo-new age 'spiritualists', pseudo-'native' american spiritualists, pseudo-esotericists, pseudo-metaphysicians, 'extraterrestrialists', 'lost-land-ists' [those who promote the idiocy of our origins being in the mythological 'lost lands' of atlantis and mu. Note: mu/mut in Kamit means 'mass of water' and also 'death'] and others to lure us away from Afuraka/Afuraitkait (Africa) and our actual direct Afurakani/Afuraitkaitnit (African) Ancestresses and Ancestors. The same is true of the relative ease with which the Black agents of these white criminals can lure our people into an organized system of self-hatred – their promoted pseudo-'spiritualities' – for we were already pre-programmed with a disdain for Afuraka/Afuraitkait (Africa) and anything Afurakani/Afuraitkaitnit (African) as a result of enslavement.

However, that ability to perpetuate these false identities amongst Afurakanu/Afuraitkaitnut (Africans~Black People) has come to an end. We have returned to our Nananom Nsamanfo (Akan term for Honored/Spiritually Cultivated Afurakani/Afuraitkaitnit Ancestresses and Ancestors), Who have given us our true cultural and spiritual identity which is rooted in our connection to Nyamewaa-Nyame (Amenet-Amen, the Supreme Being) the Abosom (Deities) and our reincarnation through specific Afurakani/Afuraitkaitnit (African) blood-circles – blood-circles which have not been broken for thousands of years predating the existence of the whites and their offspring on Asaase Afua (Earth Mother).

Akan, Ewe, Yoruba, Igbo, Bakongo, Bambara, Dogon, Minianka, Goromantche, Nguni, Afar, Batswana, Fon, Ovimbundu, Bassa, Fula, Fang, Azande, Gikuyu, Maasai, Galla, Chokwe, Mende, Lobi, Kru, all other Afurakanu/Afuraitkaitnut (Africans) on the continent of Afuraka/Afuraitkait (Africa) and wherever we find ourselves in the world as a result of migration or forced-migration, are not, never were and never will be moors, hebrews (a fictional people), atlanteans or children of mu (fictional groups) or any other foolish and degenerate designations.

We are Afurakanu/Afuraitkaitnut - the Ka/Kait bodies and souls of Afu Ra and Afu Rait.

The Akan people of Ghana and Ivory Coast West Afuraka/Afuraitkait (Africa) are directly descendant of ancient Khanit (Nubia) and Kamit. The language, culture and religious practices including the names of the Deities from ancient Khanit and Kamit are thus found intact within Akan culture today. Naturally, we find that the term mr (mer, merew, mere) continues to be used in the Akan language today:

mmerɛw, a. [berɛw, berɛbere] 1. soft (e. g. wood, pr. 1244.), impressible, yielding. — 2. meek, mild. — 3. tender; delicate, effeminate. — 4. weak, feeble, infirm, sickly; nehõ yɛ m., he is not strong (bodily); – oyɛ m., a) = odwo, he is meek; b) he is weak, yielding, pliable, indulgent; n'asõ yɛ m., he is obedient. — Syn. bètɛ̃, bódõ, bɔ̀kõ, bɔ̃rɔ̀gõ, dábõ, dufudufu, dɛ̀fɛ̃, fifã, fɛ̃tefɛtɛ, hɔ̀dwõ, horòhorɔ, n'ã, n'i, nyámõ, siámõ, pɔsopɔsɔ, pósoposo &c. opp. den.

ɔ-bɛ̃rɛfo, pl. a-, a needy, indigent, poor, destitute man; syn. obiani, ɔmanehunufo. Ps. 41,2. 72,13.

[A Dictionary of the Asante and Fante Language Called Tshi (Chwee, Twi). J.G. Christaller]

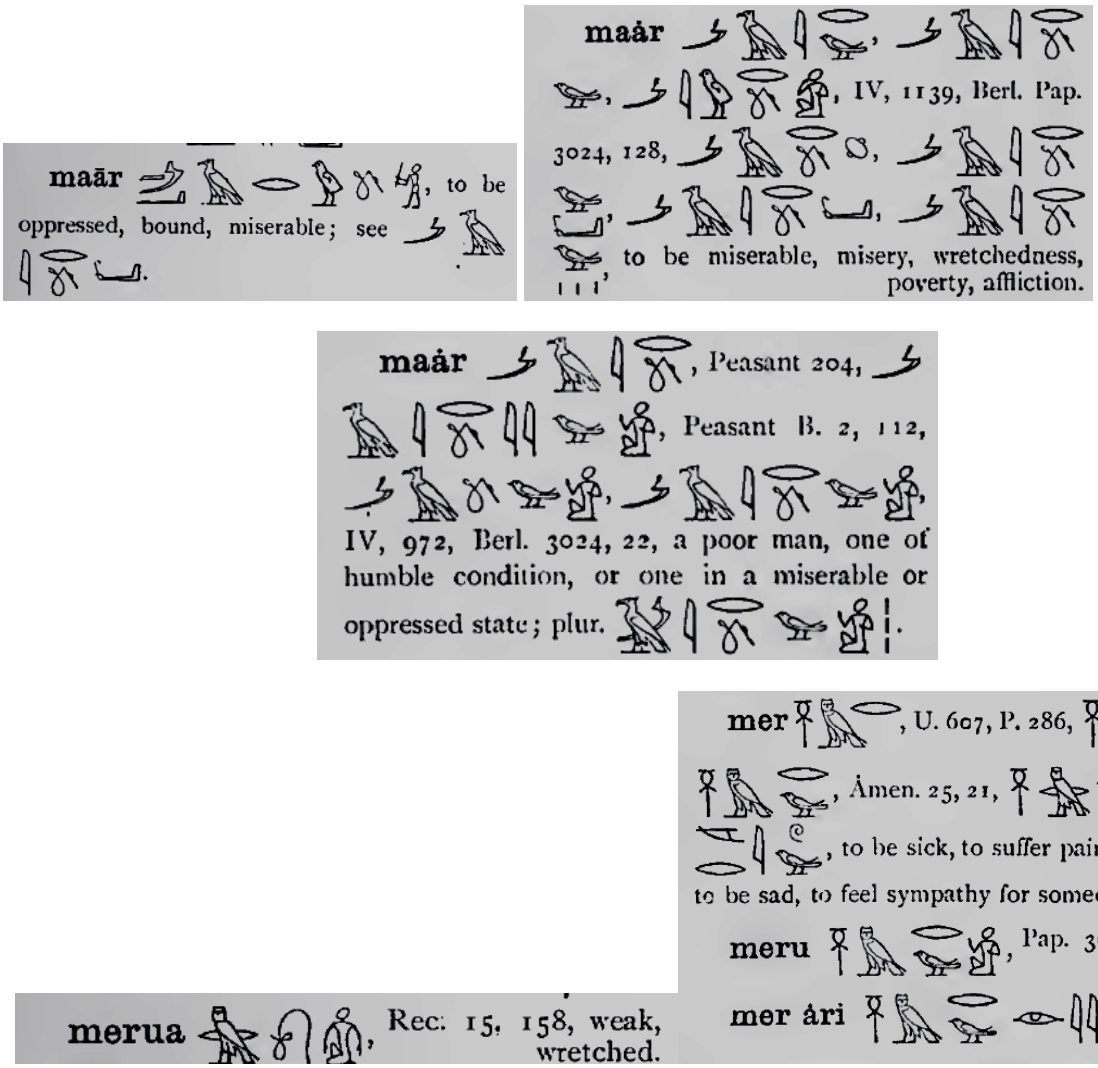
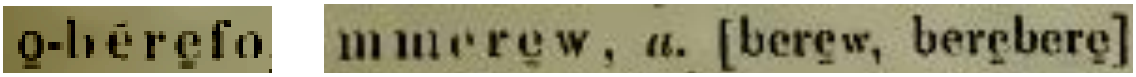
mer , U. 607, P. 286, , , Amen. 25, 21, , , , to be sick, to suffer pain, to grieve, to be sad, to feel sympathy for someone.

meru , P'ap. 3024, 131, a sick man.



merua , Rec. 15, 158, weak, wretched.

mer âri , a sick man.



As we can see above, in the Akan (Twi) language the sounds 'm' and 'b' interchange. We thus have mmerew and berew. The same is true for the term 'law' written in the Akwamu Twi dialect 'mbra', while written in the Asante Twi dialect 'mmara' (ma-ra, maa(t) in Kamit). The the suffix 'fo' denotes plurality as in a group of people, while 'ni' denotes individuality. Thus Akanfo means Akan people (fo), while Akanni means an Akan individual (ni). The term mmerew when describing an individual means: weak, feeble, infirm, sickly. The mmerew-fo are those people (fo) who are weak, feeble, infirm, sickly. The mmerew-ni is an individual who is weak, feeble, infirm or sickly. This is directly derived from mer and the variation merua meaning weak, wretched in Kamit. Note that the synonym in Twi for mmerew is omanehunufo. This term means a sufferer, one who labors in affliction; trouble, wretchedness, torments, misery:

amanne-húnu, inf. [hũ amane] suffering, affliction, tribulation, trouble, adversity, unhappiness, misery, wretchedness, torments; yegyina amandzehunum', F. we stand in jeopardy. am.-kúrow, hell, Gehenna, the place of torment. – ɔ-manne hunufo, pl. a-, a sufferer, one who labours under affliction.

[Note the variation maar (mer) meaning oppressed, bound, miserable; afflicted, wretchedness]

The term bere-fo also written and pronounced in some Akan dialects as mberefo, mmerefo are the group of people (fo) who are needy, indigent, poor, destitute, afflicted. The Akan term bere (mbere, mmere) is derived from mer (mere) in Kamit referencing the indigent, destitute, needy, servants, slaves, etc. This is what it means to be a 'moor'. It has always been a pejorative term. It was therefore used by the whites and their offspring to falsely identify our people as a race of weak, wretched, indigent, afflicted people. Just as it is an insult today in Akan culture to label someone as mmerew or bere (mbere, mere) – mr (moor) – weak, wretched, sickly, infirm, when they are truly not that, so was it an insult in ancient Kamit to label someone a mr (moor), slave – socially dead, spiritually dead/damned, afflicted, wretched, etc. when they truly were not that. This is precisely why the whites and their offspring decided to label all Black people 'mr' (mer, moor). Only the ignorant amongst us can accept such a designation.

you know that the symbol was influenced by "The Goat Of Mendes" from Egypt?

Levi was already influenced by the Occult Sciences disclosed by melanated geniuses in Egypt's Priesthoods. Do you believe he chose a goat as his "magical" symbol by chance? Although technically the "Goat of Mendes" was a Ram (and it was NOT evil), you can see where Baphomet's idea came from. Not only that, but the Baphomet emblem, in its purest esoteric essence, represents the completed 'hue-man' – the original melanated man and woman with knowledge of self.

Legend Of Medusa: Story Of European Fear Of Black Women With Spiritual Power, Like The Sibyls

Although extremist caucazoid satanists and religious zealots have stolen the symbol and notion of Baphomet and converted it into "The Devil," the diligent student of life sciences will not be misled or disheartened by such foolishness. Because the real curious melanated mind understands the physics of polarity, it is unaffected by the subjective pendulum swing of good and evil. With that understanding, you may lift the veil and see the image's coded symbolism without being overwhelmed by fear of the unknown.

The Aggressive Emasculation of the Negro Man: The Latest Assault On Our Race

to the belief that Osiris' backbone was the Djed pillar (which represented stability). This provides an intriguing glimpse into the ancient Egyptian understanding of death. They feared death, but they saw the stability and harmony inherent in the cycle of decay and rebirth.

Africans Are BLACK People – Never Let Caucasian Definitions Influence Your Understanding Of Who You Are

The Ba of a person was not their soul, but their essence (strength, efficacy, renown, or charm), and the Ba was represented by the hieroglyph for a "ram." As a result, Banebdjed was portrayed as a ram or ram-headed man, and a living "holy ram" (considered to embody the god's spirit) was worshiped in Djedet (near Osiris' cult center at Djedu). The rams were mummified and buried in their own necropolis with all the pomp and ceremony befitting a Pharaoh.

Are White Supremacists Trying To Provoke Blacks Into A Race War In The United States?

During the late period, Greeks mispronounced the word Ba-neb-Djetet ('Ram Lord of Djedet') and named the city Mendes, referring to Banebdjed as "the goat of Mendes." Some esoteric academics have linked "the goat of Mendes" to Baphomet (the "false god" the Templars were accused of worshiping), while others have converted it into a diabolical cliché. The only issue with this is that Banebdjedt was a ram, not a goat, and he (or she) was not regarded malevolent or even hostile.

Occultist Eliphas Levi created the figure of Baphomet in 1854 for his book “Dogme et

“The goat on the frontispiece carries the sign of the pentagram on the forehead, with one point at the top, a symbol of light, his two hands forming the sign of hermetism, the one pointing up to the white moon of Chesed, the other pointing down to the black moon of Geburah,” explains Eliphas Levi. This symbol represents the ideal balance of mercy and justice. His one arm is feminine, the other male, like the androgyn of Khunrath, whose attributes we had to combine with those of our goat because he is the same sign. The intelligent flame flashing between his horns symbolizes the cosmic balance’s magical light, the image of the soul exalted beyond matter, just as the flame, while bound to matter, shines above it. Because the soul is insensitive by nature and can only suffer when it materializes, the beast’s head represents the horror of the sinner, whose materially acting, totally accountable component must endure the penalty exclusively. The rod standing in place of the genitals represents eternal life, the body coated in scales represents water, the semi-circle above it represents the atmosphere, and the feathers following above the volatile. The two breasts and androgynous arms of this occult sciences sphinx symbolise humanity.”

OCCULT SCIENCE VS. SATANISM

OCCULT SCIENCE VS. SATANISM

One thing is certain: the esoteric sciences disclosed by ancient melanated minds have nothing to do with satanism. The Egyptian priesthood did not worship Satan. This persona and magical references may terrify the normal individual, but the inquiring Melanated Mind with knowledge of self knows that this is a sham.

Worshiping Satan is as absurd as worshiping Jesus. Becoming a magician, occultist, or alchemist is all about understanding your inner power. True occultists would never advise you to delegate your power to an entity other than yourself. So keep that in mind when you explore the Universe of Occult Knowledge. We are attempting to evolve our own situation via knowledge of self and the Universe, rather than being too focused on one side of the pendulum.

BLACKNESS, MAGIC, OCCULT SCIENCE AND THE MELANATED MIND

Every major religion and school of philosophical or metaphysical thinking has been founded on the science developed and disclosed by ancient Melanated Minds, particularly in the Egyptian priesthoods.

Advertisement

What exactly is occult science? The term Occult originally meant “hidden, concealed, secret,” whereas Science refers to structured knowledge.

A general definition of “Occult Science” for the purposes of this book is as follows:

Accumulated and classified knowledge of the invisible forces and processes that regulate reality in the mind, nature, and the Universe.

Occult studies include the highest circumstance of the mind, magnetism, electricity, astrology, anatomy, alchemy, universal laws, and so on. Essentially, it is the science of the self and the Universe from the inside out. Because most people are content with immense disaster.

Anyone who has this great Knowledge of Self and the Universe has access to higher realms of consciousness, allowing the adept to act as a True and Living God.

Unfortunately, many of the old texts containing this information have been destroyed or taken by the Caucazoid, who poses as the inventor of supreme wisdom. Many people still mistakenly attribute the development of the “higher sciences” to Caucasian Greeks. “The Greeks were not the inventors of Greek Philosophy,” stated George G.M James, “but the inhabitants of North Africa, popularly known as the Egyptians were.” Nothing was discovered by Greek philosophers; everything was stolen from the Egyptians.

Another thing to consider is that wherever supreme wonders are located on planet Earth in the form of an old understanding of complicated science reflected in discovering art, literature, or building, the likeness of Black (melanated) people can be found. From the exquisite Olmec Heads in Mexico to the huge portrayals of Buddhas with negro characteristics inscribed in the mountains of Cambodia, and the infinite depictions of Black people in Egyptian art and sculpture, there is no end to the right? Because their "intellectual contributions" were so profound, why aren't the Greeks inscribed in stone around the world in gigantic monuments to be remembered and venerated forever? Apparently, the "good stuff" is always located where melanated people are, and what they dig up in Greece is insufficient to satisfy intellectual interests.

If you read the great Occult texts published by the Caucazoid (Transcendental Magic by Eliphas Levi), you will understand what I mean.

Giuliano Kremmerz's The Hermetic Science of Transformation, for example. They will repeatedly pay homage to Hermes Trismegistus and the "supreme universal wisdom he endowed to the world," but they will rarely mention that Hermes is nothing more than a Greek version of the Egyptian diety Tehuti (Thoth), which was actually a supreme priesthood of Melanated Minds rather than a single man. Some texts, such as Thomas H. Burgoyne's The Light of Egypt, state unequivocally that all esoteric, philosophical, and occult science was developed and revealed by ancient Melanated Minds.

Despite those who seek to conceal or destroy ancient knowledge's desperate efforts, enough information has "slipped through the cracks" to provide a Curious Melanated sufficient to assist any earnest student fill in the blanks.

Many of the Occult publications available to us at this time contain fractured truths, and much worse, the Caucazoid's limited non-melanated worldview. Invading invaders destroyed or stole much of the greatest wisdom known to adepts and taught to initiates of the ancient Egyptian Mystery Systems. Unfortunately, the true researcher must sift through stacks of available Occult books, many of which are now written by non-melanated peoples, compare those findings to our pre-existing Knowledge of Self and the Universe, and extrapolate the gold from their rendition of our ancestor's universal sciences. Because of archeological robberies of ancient writings and artifacts, they have had considerably more access to stolen occult information than melanated peoples during this time period, yet they are unable to fully employ the knowledge they discover and write about owing to their biological predicament. Without enough levels of Melanin, it is nearly impossible to communicate with nature and energies on a supreme level. The potential to create "magical" phenomena is a fairy tale for the non-melanated mutant who dares to strut arrogantly while carrying our ancestors' great knowledge. Meanwhile, the Melanated Mind's potential to create “magical” events is a normal occurrence.

Pay close attention. Why do you think most occult literature published by non-non-melanated “magician” lacks the biological circumstances to consciously connect with the cosmos’ dark matter in a fruitful way. As a result, blackness becomes an uncontrollable, unfathomable, unreachable, never-ending tsunami of doom that is always coming to overwhelm non-melanated peoples. In contrast, melanated beings are empowered not only by the energy of the sun (the light), but also by the limitless blackness. The Melanated Mind moves through the infinitely expanding Universe’s blackness (dark matter) like a fish in the sea.

Advertisement

This is why it is critical to regain the supreme esoteric sciences discovered and revealed by our forefathers. Another motive for writing this book is to encourage people of color to take ownership of the sciences that our forefathers left behind. If we improve ourselves to fully represent our supreme circumstance, our science and spirituality become our technology. With Knowledge of Self and the Universe, the evolved Melanated Mind can act as a True and Living God, manipulating atoms and energies through mental conception or spiritual alchemy to achieve a desired result in physical reality.

Melanin's quantum actuality – the black, transmutable, life-giving, multi-dimensional, super conductive substance of the Universe – can only be properly comprehended

"The Black Dot is an ancient sign for blackness; it is the black seed of all mankind, the archetype of humanity, the secret doorway to the collective unconsciousness-darkness, the shadow, the primeval ocean, chaos, the womb, and the doorway to life." This ancient symbol for blackness was the topic of 300 thousand years of serious scientific inquiry by profound ancient scientists who were themselves black in consciousness. A long line of very bright scientists investigated their own essence and discovered a hidden portal to their souls and spirits, as well as a doorway to advanced rules and rhythms that span the Universe. They discovered universal rules based in the black seed that nourished all dimensions of time and space. These first titans discovered that all life arose from a black seed, that all life was based in blackness, and that all creatures carried a memory of their collective forebears. The one truth from which life's weave spun was blackness, the universal solvent of everything. All hues and vibratory energies were merely shades of black. The color black was found in the night sky, primordial ocean, outer space, the birthplace and womb of the planets, stars, and galaxies of the Universe; black holes were discovered at the center of our own galaxy and many other galaxies. Carbon, the essential atom found in all biological matter, was the color Black. Carbon atoms joined to form Black Melanin, the first molecule capable of capturing light and reproducing itself. Black Neuromelanin was discovered to be the chemical key to life and the brain itself. Pineal blood was discovered to be dependent on inner vision, intuition, creative genius, and spiritual

If Black people are the “Original” humans, the archetype of humanity, then Melanated Minds are at the root of everything: “agriculture, animal breeding, architecture, art, astronomy, business and trade, cash and currency, ceramics, clothing, dance, economics, healthcare, housing, jewelry, mail, mathematics, medicine, metalworking, mining, music, pottery, science, shoes, spoken language, sports, technology, and written language.”

Advertisement

Our nature is to be top creators, which is why we are the foundation of all that is brilliant and creative. Melanated peoples are biologically equipped to produce “magical” phenomena – the ability to consciously manipulate atoms and energies of the Universe at will using mental force, conceptions, and/or spiritual alchemy – and with the active use of occult science (knowledge of the seen and unseen forces and processes that influence the Universe and everything in it) passed down from our forefathers, melanated peoples have the potential to evolve into something even greater.

The Catacombs of Paris: History & How to Visit

by Courtney Traub | January 10, 2023

Few places in the French capital inspire the morbid curiosity that the Catacombs of Paris do– and for good reason. The section that's open to the public is made up of around 1.5km/1 mile of underground tunnels, carved from limestone and neatly lined with the remains of some six million corpses. Astonishingly, this only represents a tiny section of the vast network.

The catacombs– an anonymous memorial to millions of unnamed, deceased Parisians– are filled with human femurs, skulls, and other bones, piled in oddly ornate, neat displays, and narrated by poems and aphorisms about death. Leave it to the French to make it artful and philosophical, right?

But however tidily the nameless bones and skulls may be stacked, they also hit a taboo nerve.

The ossuaries speak both to our dread of mortality, and to our fascination with how societies manage death, from a logistical standpoint. In the West, where death is rarely confronted directly in daily life, it seems apt that it would be driven deep underground. A bit like Hades, or the ancient Greeks' subconscious realm of nightmares.

Created starting in the late 18th century, the Catacombs of Paris may seem like an old-fashioned oddity. But they are in fact the result of modern, more hygienic and efficient ways of managing human remains. And their almost poetic curation into a 'museum' of sorts is connected to the development of the tourism industry in the 19th century– another distinctly modern phenomenon.

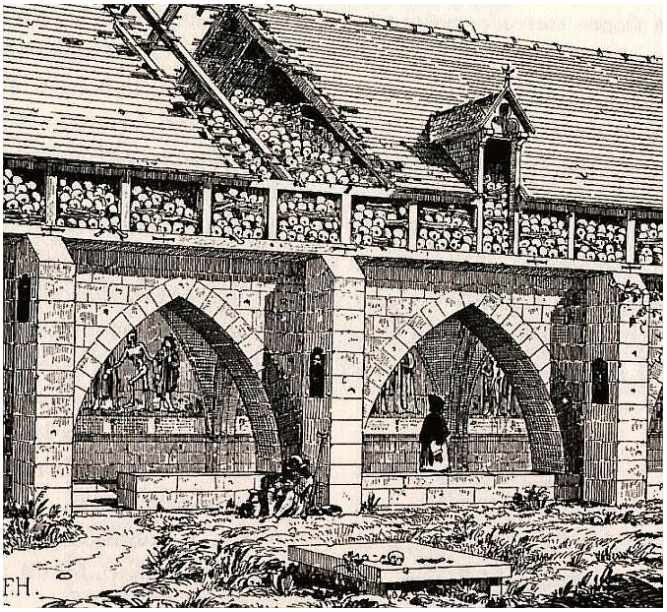
The story of the Paris Catacombs begins in the late eighteenth century, when officials began to recognize that traditional city cemeteries had become putrid, overflowing, deeply un-hygienic catastrophes.



For hundreds of years, the centrally located Cimetière des Innocents had been the postmortem home of generations of Parisians. With origins in the early medieval period, it served as a burial ground for the 5th-century Notre-Dame-des-Bois church. It soon became the city's main cemetery.

{Related: Take a Self-Guided or Virtual Tour of Medieval Paris}

Located in close reach of the bustling Les Halles animal market (since transformed into an enormous, confusingly laid-out shopping center), the cemetery was overcrowded and shambolic, with many layers of graves and human remains piled atop one another.

By 1780, conditions had worsened further. To create space, graves of Parisians who had been dead for decades or centuries were exhumed, their skeletal remains tightly packed together into *charnier*s (mass graves) built in the walls of the cemetery.

TOP

The main burial grounds reportedly rose two metres (more than six feet) above the ground compared to surrounding streets, with layers of graves separated only by loose mounds of earth.

16th-century French writer Rabelais alluded to the horrifying conditions at the cemetery in a section of his famous multi-volume work Pantagruel, describing Paris as > "a good city to live in, but not to die in, since the beggars of Saint-Innocent {cemetery} warmed their asses on the bones of the dead."

And during the mid-18th century, merchants and residents began to complain of fetid, horrifying odors emanating from the Innocents and infecting surrounding buildings. Most famously, in 1780, a restaurant owner named Gravelot was terrified to find that part of a mass grave had collapsed; the cellars of his restaurant on rue de la Lingerie were "invaded" by corpses.

TOP

Some historians claim this horror-movie-worthy incident was "the" event that pushed local authorities to close the Innocents cemetery, in 1785– leading to the creation of new burial places, and the Catacombs, of course.

Creating the Catacombs: A new site on the left bank

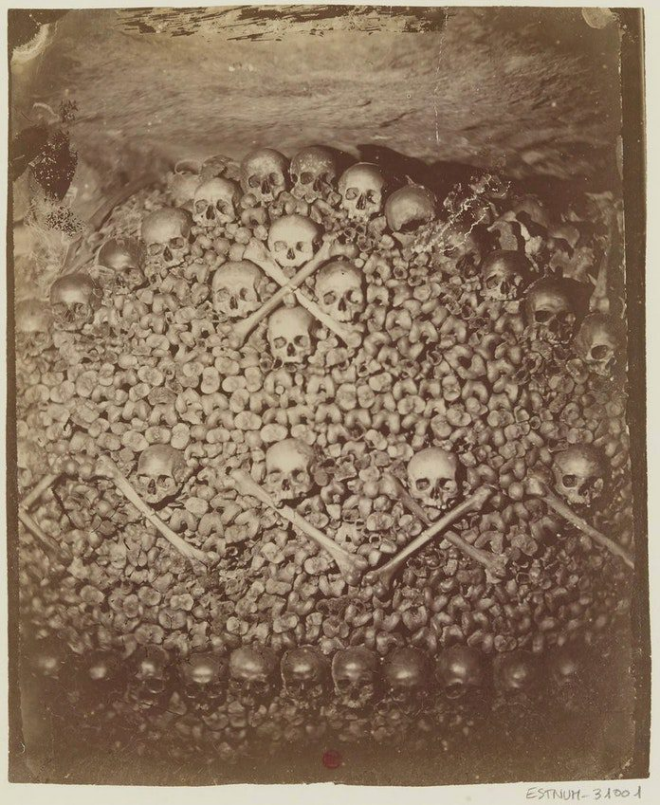
TOP

To solve the problem of relocating the remains of millions of people from the Innocents, city planners and officials had to get creative. They identified a vast network of underground limestone quarries on the left bank– much of them then outside the bounds of Paris– as an ideal place to store the remains of millions of Parisians.

Thus, from 1785 through 1787, the city undertook a first major "evacuation" of remains from charnel houses and mass graves at Les Innocents. The transfers were completed at night in an attempt to fend off criticism or shock from residents and church officials. Workers heaped bones into quarry wells, then piled them in the galleries of old subterranean quarries. The site, near modern-day Montparnasse, was deemed the "Paris Municipal Ossuary" in 1786.



[Related and nearby: A Walk Through Montparnasse Cemetery]

In later decades and following the French Revolution, other graveyards and cemeteries in the city center were exhumed, with more remains transferred to the 1840, as Haussmann's and others' efforts to modernize the city picked up significant speed.

In 1809, the Catacombs were opened to the general public, but only by appointment. It quickly became a hit with locals and tourists, and even figures such as Napoleon III and his son visited the site.

Part of the appeal was its mythical association with ancient Roman catacombs in nearby Italy. Another part of it a nineteenth-century, Romantic interest in the macabre (and the medieval). And by the mid-19th century, early photographers such as Felix Nadar brought worldwide attention to the Catacombs and their "empire of death".

Félix Nadar took early images of the Paris Catacombs, such as this one from 1861.

Today, the Catacombs are connected to and managed by the same team behind the Musée Carnavalet, dedicated to the history of Paris. Of course, I highly recommend a visit to both.

Touring the Paris Catacombs: Highlights & Tips

Touring the Paris Catacombs is fascinating, but (at least to me) it's more of an archeological adventure than a creepy attraction fit for a Halloween outing. The 45-minute circuit takes you down a long spiral staircase to enter the old limestone quarries.

{Lore & Legends: A Few Famous French Ghost Stories & Hauntings}

As you pass through the tunnels– some quite narrow and almost claustrophobic, others wide "galleries", take note of how the thousands of bones and skulls tightly packed around the sides are have been arranged.

Some form crosses or other recognizable, symmetrical patterns, while others appear to be unceremoniously lumped together in tall stacks and lines, sometimes behind metal grates and under low ceilings.

There's something overwhelming and moving, but also oddly impersonal, about the spectacle. Who are all these people, and what sorts of lives did they live? We know, as mentioned above, that many were plague victims. But beyond that, their particularity melts away, forming an uncanny sea of anonymous bones, eye sockets and grinning teeth.

It's a reminder of our smallness, our impermanence, our fragility. Even the limits of memory, since many or most of these unnamed people once had graves that marked their lives, that differentiated them from others. All of those individuating markers were swept away when these remains were exhumed and transferred to the catacombs. Who knows what skull belongs to which femurs?

bones and another? You'll see signs that state the source of a particular set of remains, and the date of their exhuming, such as this one, reading "Bones from the former St-Jean Cemetery (Rue du Faubourg Montmartre, n. 60)/ Deposed in 1846-1847 in the Western Ossuary and transferred to the Catacombs in September 1859":

If you're a Buddhist, you might find the erasure of individual lives liberating or even slightly funny. With the exception of the odd tomb for notable Parisian aristocrats, no egos can thrive here, and the bounds between rich and poor, prominent and ordinary have essentially disappeared.

But if the idea of being remembered means something to you, there's something quietly terrifying, and very sobering, about it all.

Luckily, you'll be aided in your existential reflections by carefully placed poems and philosophical musings about mortality throughout the circuit– one of my favorite aspects of the displays.

Poem in the Paris Catacombs- by ~Ealasaid~ is licensed under CC BY 2.0

The block above roughly translates as follows:

Occupy, between these walls, the dust of races!

It is in these places of forgetting, and among these tombs

That time and death come to cross their false(hoods),

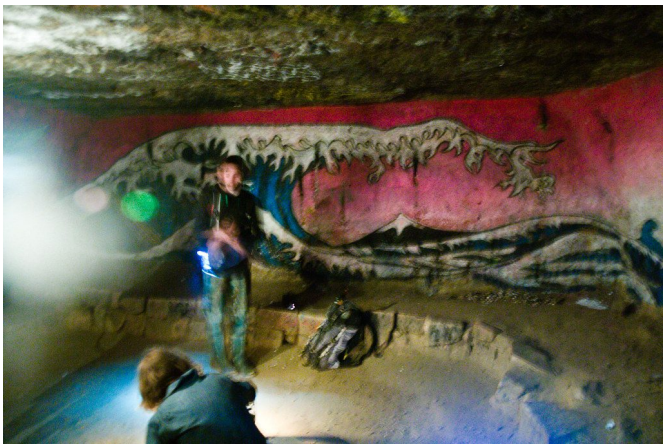
That the dead are piled and pressed under the earth!

The numbers here are nothing, the crowd is alone"

Whether you find these poems and musings pretentious or thought-provoking, their presence reminds you that you're in a carefully constructed and curated space: one that has over the decades become one of Paris' most popular tourist attractions.

My Tips for Visiting

The Catacombs can be easily visited year-round (scroll down for practical information on getting there, tickets, etc.) But I do have a few suggestions for making the most of your exploration:



Best time of year to visit: Try to go in the early morning or during low season (roughly, mid-October to March). The crowds will generally be thinner during these times, making for a more relaxed (and less claustrophobic) experience. Believe me, some of the tunnels are narrow enough. You don't want to feel crowded as you pass through them.

What to Wear: Even in the summer, go with long sleeves, closed, sturdy shoes, and possibly a light jacket. The Catacombs are kept quite cool (around 14 C/57 F) to preserve the remains from damage. Also, make sure your shoes have decent traction, as some areas in the passageways can be slippery and even wet.

Use an audioguide: Available in English as well as French, Spanish, and German, the audioguides cost only a few Euros extra and will allow you to gain a better understanding of the site's history and highlights.

Catacombs? Can I Visit Those?

"Paris Catacombs, Feb-2012" by maltman23 is licensed under CC BY-SA 2.0

As documented in Atlas Obscura, BBC, and numerous other outlets, there are some 200 miles of "off-license" catacombs that have periodically been explored by cataphiles: curious residents, squatters, artists and DJs staging (literally) underground parties.

The non-official tunnels, accessed from several secretive points around the city, include swimming holes and pools, cataphile bars, sculptures, "street art", and even a makeshift auditorium offering clandestine movie screenings and plastered with film references.

Sounds amazing, right? Unfortunately, it's illegal for the general public to access these non-official parts of the underground network– and likely pretty dangerous. While I understand the appeal (and especially wish I could see the secret cinema myself) I strongly recommend against trying to visit them.

They may be structurally unsound, are reportedly infested with rats and riddled with electrical lines, and you may well not be able to find an exit unless accompanied by a very experienced local guide. Even if you feel safe and think you can manage them, you can be fined or even arrested if found roaming in tunnels not open to the public.

In short: delight in the many interesting photo essays and podcasts out there on the topic of the secret catacombs, including the ones cited above. But unless you have a taste for breaking the law and putting yourself in danger, don't try to go explore them yourself.

Buying Tickets & Practical Info

The catacombs are open year-round from Tuesday to Sunday, 10 a.m. to 8:30 p.m. The ticket window closes at 7:30 p.m. The attraction is closed on Mondays, and on January 1st, May 1st, and December 25th.

Where is the Entrance to the Paris Catacombs?

The recently-renovated entrance to the Paris Catacombs off of Place Denfert-Rochereau.

The entrance is located at 1, Avenue du Colonel Henri Rol-Tanguy, on Place Denfert-Rochereau, 75014 Paris (14th arrondissement).

Metro/RER: Denfert-Rochereau (M Line 4, RER Line B)

Exiting the metro at Denfert-Rochereau, look for building with a light-green glass entrance area and ticketing booth, where you can access a long, winding set of stairs down to the catacomb tunnels (131 steps).

Accessibility & Rules for Visitors

- Accessibility: Unfortunately, the catacombs are not accessible to wheelchairs, and visitors with cardiovascular disease may wish to avoid this attraction. This is especially true since you'll have to climb 112 stairs back up to the street. In addition, visitors with sight disabilities must be accompanied by a guide.

- The exit is from 21 bis, Avenue René-Coty. It can be a bit disorienting to exit in a different place from where you entered, so make sure you have a streetmap (whether digital or print) on hand to navigate back to the metro or to your next destination.
- Only 200 people are allowed in at a time, so you may have to wait during busy times.
- You can only bring a small bag or purse with you during your visit, and the catacombs are not equipped with coat or luggage storage. Leave large bags and other items at the hotel before visiting.

Buying Tickets for the Paris Catacombs (in Advance & on the Day)

You can either buy tickets onsite/on the day at the booth near the entrance (see current rates here), or purchase them in advance.

- To save time and hassle, consider purchasing skip-the-line tickets (including audioguide) for the Paris Catacombs here (via Tiqets).
- You can also opt for a semi-private guided tour in English (also from Tiqets).

The first time I visited the Catacombs, I walked slowly imagining the people, and the lives they might have lead. All remains are from every walk of life.the rich, and the poor, and everyone in between. Some of the remains I was looking at could very well have been victims of the crazy times of the French Revolution. It was one of the tourist attraction I am glad I didn't miss.

The Cutting Truth about Circumcision: It Was All About Rites and Religion

ANDREW GRAY, MAR 2016 , ANCIENT ORIGINS

When was circumcision first practiced? How did it evolve? Why was it practiced? The earliest known evidence for the practice of circumcision goes back to ancient Egypt.

Circumcision in Egypt and Israel

Ancient Egypt circumcised males at the onset of puberty before sexual union and process their 6 did in ancient Israel. In ancient Israel, circumcision was taken to be a sign of the covenant between God and Abraham. It was the ultimate mark showing that they were a part of the Israelite nation.

Although it could be performed on males of any age, it usually occurs when they are adult. Tools, including knives, were used to perform the procedure. Evidence of this can be found in ancient Egyptian tomb paintings. Some of these tomb paintings even show how the procedure was performed. A number of men would be held down while one man would perform the circumcision. One was that was. Constantly, that distinguished itself from Israelite circumcision. Israelite circumcision was performed on children, usually around the age of eight days.

A Little or a Lot

Circumcision was commonly practiced in parts of Africa, Oceania, Judaism, and Islam. The form of circumcision practiced in these societies was most limited with a complete removal of the foreskin or prepuce, as it is practiced in Judaism.

However, in ancient Egypt and other cultures in Africa, only part of the foreskin was removed. In fact, the Egyptians, Greeks, and Romans would sometimes mock Israelites for their practice. An interesting circumcising a Biblical event known as Moses Yahweh commanded the Israelites to circumcise their children again, "a second time" (Joshua 5:2). Some scholars have argued that this event must have already been circumcised Egyptian style, or else it would not have been necessary.

The Practice in Other African Cultures

Egypt is not the only African culture that practiced or practices circumcision. It is common among many African societies and the Bantu, usually as a rite of passage into the adult community. Among the Xhosa and Zulu ethnic groups traditionally had an elaborate circumcision ritual where boys underwent the procedure in order to become men.

During the process, they would be isolated from the community for several weeks, especially during the healing process. Afterward, they would be considered men. Among the Xhosa, a boy who cried during the procedure was considered a coward. Also, a boy who took an anesthetic of a man. Circumcision is still regularly practiced among these cultures. Its practice is also increasing, instead of the traditional rites.

Circumcision in Oceania

Circumcision historically was not limited to only Africa and the Middle East. A form of circumcision is practiced in Oceania and Aboriginal Australia among many tribes. Here, the practice is also a rite of passage into the adult community. Circumcision in Oceania and Australia is also practiced by males of all ages (as recorded as well as a test of bravery).

Wartime

Circumcision is not only used as a rite of passage to manhood or for religious reasons. It has been used for other purposes. Some have used it as a way to distinguish between enemies. If a battle would be circumcised, especially in the Middle East, east Africa, and south Asia.

Historical Impact

Circumcision was once a rare custom, and most cultures outside of Africa, the Middle East, and Oceania did not originally practice it. Circumcision has had a significant impact on the history of civilization, especially since one of the pillars of western civilization, ancient Israel, made it an ethnic marker by breaking it.

Today, the practice still continues with an estimated one-third of males worldwide being circumcised. In some countries, like the United States, it is very common, but it is also widespread in countries like Israel, Turkey, and Nigeria. It is also experienced for prevention of health conditions.

Circumcision is becoming increasingly controversial due to concerns about lack of informed consent and unnecessary pain.

The Life and Times of Mansa Musa: The Richest Man in History

READ LATER | PRINT

Mansa Musa , the ruler of the Mali Empire in the 14th century, is believed to be the wealthiest person in history, with a net worth of $400 billion in today's dollars. For reference, that's four times Bill Gates' networth and a third more than John D. Rockefeller's. His immense wealth was primarily derived from the gold and salt trade , which flourished under his reign. However, Mansa Musa's riches were not just limited to his empire; he became renowned worldwide for his generosity and wealth.

His famous pilgrimage to Mecca in 1324, during which he distributed vast amounts of gold to the people he encountered, cemented his reputation as a generous and wealthy king. In fact, his gifts were sometimes so generous they caused hyperinflation, wrecking entire economies . This is everything you need to know about the life and times of Mansa Musa, his wealth, his legacy, and his impact on history.

The Kaaba Black Stone: A Holy Stone from Outer Space?

JASON COLAVITO, JAN 31ST MONDAY

ANCIENT ORIGINS | ISLAM

Each day, five times a day, Muslims across the world face the holy site of Mecca and pray. Mecca is believed to be the birthplace of the Prophet Muhammad but when Westerners visit the city, they are surprised to find that the most sacred site in Islam is the Kaaba, a cube-shaped building that is covered in black cloth and contains no religious icons. The focus of the Kaaba is the Black Stone, which Muslims believe is a meteorite, and there is much speculation over what the stone might be and why it is so important to the Islamic religion and to Muslims around the world.

The Hajj Pilgrimage Ritual

Starting during the month of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar, Mecca is flooded with pilgrims who have come to perform the Hajj, the pilgrimage to Mecca that is one of the five pillars of Islam.

There, they gather around the Kaaba, often within arm's reach, and walk seven times counterclockwise around the building. Pilgrims also visit the Black Stone, which is set in the eastern corner of the Kaaba, and attempt to touch it, kiss it, or point to it. The Hajj is a ritual practice that has been going on for hundreds of years.

The Kaaba measures 50 feet (15 meters) high, 34 feet (10.7 meters) wide and 35 feet (10.2 meters) long. It is covered with a black silk cloth woven as the cover and decorated with gold embroidered verses from the Quran. Pilgrims walk around the Kaaba seven times, and the Black Stone is set in the eastern corner of the building.

OUR MISSION

At Ancient Origins, we believe that one of the most important fields of knowledge we can pursue as human beings is our beginnings. And while some people may seem content with the story as it stands, our view is that there exist countless mysteries, scientific anomalies and surprising artifacts that have yet to be discovered and explained.

The goal of Ancient Origins is to highlight recent archaeological discoveries, provide academic research and evidence, as well as offering alternative viewpoints and explanations of science, archaeology, mythology, religion and history around the globe.

We're the only Pro-Archaeology site combining scientific research with out-of-the-box perspectives.

By bringing together top experts and authors, this archaeology website explores lost civilizations, examines sacred writings, tours ancient places, investigates ancient discoveries and questions mysterious happenings. Our open community is dedicated to digging into the origins of our species on planet earth, and question wherever the discoveries might take us. We seek to retell the story of our beginnings.

The Sunnis believed that the successor should be chosen by the strongest unit of their tribe, while smaller groups struggle found the followers of the Imam Ali, Muhammad's friend that he had the nickname of Persia.

The Pope Who Tried To Cheat Death By Drinking The Blood Of Children

Carly Silver
Updated September 7, 2021 • 8 items

There have been hundreds of popes in the history of the Catholic Church — each with his own unique peculiarities, like Pope Alexander VI's penchant for fathering children — but nobody took an approach to health quite like Pope Innocent VIII. This 15th-century Portifex is best known not as the failed cure rate was — not for his extra opinions and magicians nor for his slave ownership — but as the Pope who drank blood in an attempt to cure an ailment.

When he suffered a stroke and stopped into a coma, Innocent's doctors resorted to the most first-recorded blood transfusion in history, giving his patient little boys' blood to sip on. Unfortunately for Innocent, just because he received the first known blood transfusion doesn't mean he received the first successful one. It is recorded that he and the children whose lifeblood he consumed died shortly after.

When He Wasn't Drinking Child Blood, Pope Innocent VIII Was Executing Witches And Bankrupting The Papacy

Innocent VIII was hardly the best of popes. Brought to the papal throne by a puppet master, Cardinal Giuliano della Rovere, he took a strong anti-magic stance in the Vatican and persecuted supposed witches (and intellectuals) across Europe. Innocent was also well-known for pretty much bankrupting the papal treasury by interfering in Italian politics, getting one provincial monarch against another. His Encyclopedia Britannica entry even includes the assessment that Innocent was "[generally] regarded as unworthy and of low private morals," and "the scrofula Innocent reduced the Papal States to insolvency and anarchy."

For someone so diametrically opposed to what he perceived as witchcraft, drinking child's blood comes as something of a surprise.

After He Suffered A Stroke, His Doctors Tried To Pump Blood Into His Mouth To Stop Him From Dying

In 1492, Innocent suffered a stroke and fell into a coma. In order to bring him out of it, his doctors resorted to desperate measures. They made him swallow blood in an effort to restore him. This early version of a blood transfusion didn't work, but medics probably thought this would because of earlier theories on the subject, which directly associated life with blood. The mouth would be one of the easier orifices through which to insert fluid, and it follows that if blood brought life, ingesting the fluid would help cure restore a life on the brink. This, however, wouldn't prove to be the case.

Innocent's Doctor Was A Jewish Man, And In One Version Of The Story, The Blood Came From Christian Children

Photo: Universal Images Group / Universal Collection / Getty Images

The man behind the oral blood transfusion suggestion seems to have been Innocent's Jewish physician, a guy named Giacomo di San Genesio. He'd personally lured Innocent to Death of Near. In this recounting of the events around Innocent's blood consumption, the association of a Jewish doctor with the Pope's blood-drinking is particularly interesting, as it echoes the anti-Semitic blood libel narratives that were common in Europe. Giacomo suggested that Jews sacrificed Christian babies for and then let to fill health purposes, so charging Innocent's Jewish physician with this kind of bloodlust could have been used to propagandistic ends.

Three 10-Year-Old Boys Were Murdered For Their Blood — Because Children Have The Best Blood

So, regardless of the religious connotations, where exactly did the good doctor get the blood for Innocent to drink? In theory, he could have drawn it out in a bunch of ways, but rumor had it that he went about doing so in a morbid way. The medic bribed three 10-year-old boys with a ducat each to give their blood. Then he killed them. Innocent drank the blood and died a little later from the ensuing poisoning.

A 19th-century physician quipped, "Why shouldn't we call people 'namby-three-ten-boys-to-[child]-Innocent, because, the blood of a youth's or youth / Lay, who is willing, happy and temperate, whose bloody of the best but perhaps too abundant?" It only stood to reason, then, that a pope deserved the very best young blood.

ADVERTISEMENT

The Procedure Failed, And Innocent Died

Photo: Universal History Archive / Universal Images Group / Getty Images

Unsurprisingly, trying to transfuse blood orally didn't work (hey, intravenous influenced). Innocent died not long after the procedure — on July 25, 1492 — but not before cementing the fact that he hadn't been that great of a pope. Before he expired, he even asked the other cardinals to forgive — like his fun fact-ing and urged them to elect a better man as the next pope. On August 3, Innocent was buried in St. Peter's Cathedral near an altar of the Virgin Mary.

Innocent's Doctor Fled After The Pope's Death

Photo: Universal Images Group / Universal Collection / Getty Images

Probably afraid of accusations of murder or maltreatment, Innocent's doc, Giacomo di San Genesio, didn't stick around in Rome after his number one patient died. There's no existing word on where he went, but he probably headed underground, far away from papal authorities. Interestingly, Innocent's successor was Pope Alexander VI, AKA the notoriously lecherous Rodrigo Borgia, legendary for his wild-and-out "Banquet of Chestnuts" that he hosted in 1501.

ADVERTISEMENT

This Whole Event Might Have Just Been Anti-Semitic Propaganda

Photo: Universal Images Group / Universal Collection / Getty Images

It's possible that this entire event was a hoax designed to slander Jewish individuals. Medieval and Renaissance propaganda had long alleged that Jews ritually sacrificed Christian babies on Passover, moreover, the "blood libel legend" associated Jews with loathing in Christian blood or conducting anti-Hex with it. However, not all versions of the event record that Giacomo di San Genesio, the doctor, forced the children themselves as Jewish. And there seems to be some consensus around the idea that, at the very least, the Pope drank copious amounts of blood from a cup in a desperate attempt to stay alive.

ADVERTISEMENT

Was This All An Anti-Papal Hoax?

Photo: Universal Images Group / Universal Collection / Getty Images

Other sources contend that this transfusion was a bunch of nonsense, thanks to the chronicler who first wrote it down a guy named Stefano Infessura. Infessura really hated Innocent and would have wanted to portray him in a negative light. He really wasn't a big fan of the papacy in general. In particular, Stefano was involved in a conspiracy to make Rome a republic (rather than an entity ruled by the Pope), so slandering the Holy Father as undergoing bizarre rituals wouldn't be inconceivable for him. And many historians have indeed, we'll never know for sure.

Story of cities #5: Benin City, the mighty medieval capital now lost without trace

Benin City was described as 'wealthy and industrious, well-governed and richly decorated'. Illustration: Decompiling Dapper: A Preliminary Search for Evidence

With its mathematical layout and earthworks longer than the Great Wall of China, Benin City was one of the best planned cities in the world when London was a place of 'thievery and murder'. So why is nothing left?

Read other articles in our story of cities series

This is the story of a lost medieval city you've probably never heard about. Benin City, originally known as Edo, was once the capital of a pre-colonial African empire located in what is now southern Nigeria. The Benin empire was one of the oldest and most highly developed states in west Africa, dating back to the 11th century.

The Guinness Book of Records (1974 edition) described the walls of Benin City and its surrounding kingdom as the world's largest earthworks carried out prior to the mechanical era. According to estimates by the New Scientist's Fred Pearce, Benin City's walls were at one point "four times longer than the Great Wall of China, and consumed a hundred times more material than the Great Pyramid of Cheops".

Situated on a plain, Benin City was enclosed by massive walls in the south and deep ditches in the north. Beyond the city walls, numerous further walls were erected that separated the surroundings of the capital into around 500 distinct villages.

Pearce writes that these walls "extended for some 16,000 km in all, in a mosaic of more than 500 interconnected settlement boundaries. They covered 6,500 sq km and were all dug by the Edo people … They took an estimated 150 million hours of digging to construct, and are perhaps the largest single archaeological phenomenon on the planet".

Barely any trace of these walls exist today.

Benin City was also one of the first cities to have a semblance of street lighting. Huge metal lamps, many feet high, were built and placed around the city, especially near the king's palace. Fuelled by palm oil, their burning wicks were lit at night to provide illumination for traffic to and from the palace.

When the Portuguese first "discovered" the city in 1485, they were stunned to find this vast kingdom made of hundreds of interlocked cities and villages in the middle of the African jungle. They called it the "Great City of Benin", at a time when there were hardly any other places in Africa the Europeans acknowledged as a city. Indeed, they classified Benin City as one of the most beautiful and best planned cities in the world.

In 1691, the Portuguese ship captain Lourenco Pinto observed: "Great Benin, where the king resides, is larger than Lisbon; all the streets run straight and as far as the eye can see. The houses are large, especially that of the king, which is richly decorated and has fine columns. The city is wealthy and industrious. It is so well governed that theft is unknown and the people live in such security that they have no doors to their houses."

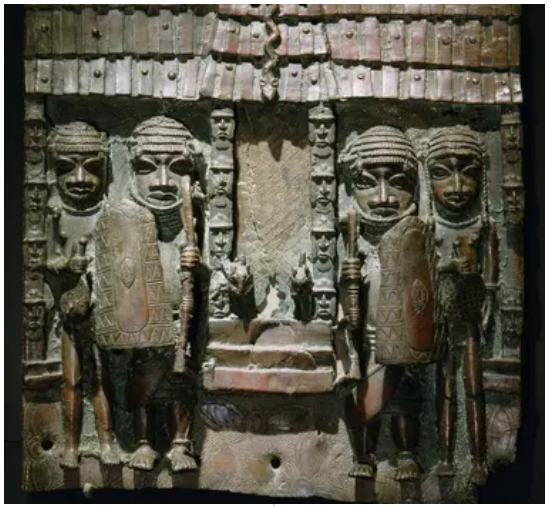
In contrast, London at the same time is described by Bruce Holsinger, professor of English at the University of Virginia, as being a city of "thievery, prostitution, murder, bribery and a thriving black market made the medieval city ripe for exploitation by those with a skill for the quick blade or picking a pocket".

African fractals



Benin City's planning and design was done according to careful rules of symmetry, proportionality and repetition now known as fractal design. The mathematician Ron Eglash, author of African Fractals - which examines the patterns underpinning architecture, art and design in many parts of Africa - notes that the city and its surrounding villages were purposely laid out to form perfect fractals, with similar shapes repeated in the rooms of each house, and the house itself, and the clusters of houses in the village in mathematically predictable patterns.

As he puts it: "When Europeans first came to Africa, they considered the architecture very disorganised and thus primitive. It never occurred to them that the Africans might have been using a form of mathematics that they hadn't even discovered yet."

At the centre of the city stood the king's court, from which extended 30 very straight, broad streets, each about 120-ft wide. These main streets, which ran at right angles to each other, had underground drainage made of a sunken impluvium with an outlet to carry away storm water. Many narrower side and intersecting streets extended off them. In the middle of the streets were turf on which animals fed.

"Houses are built alongside the streets in good order, the one close to the other," writes the 17th-century Dutch visitor Olfert Dapper. "Adorned with gables and steps ... they are usually broad with long galleries inside, especially so in the case of the houses of the nobility, and divided into many rooms which are separated by walls made of red clay, very well erected."

Dapper adds that wealthy residents kept these walls "as shiny and smooth by washing and rubbing as any wall in Holland can be made with chalk, and they are like mirrors. The upper storeys are made of the same sort of clay. Moreover, every house is provided with a well for the supply of fresh water".

Family houses were divided into three sections: the central part was the husband's quarters, looking towards the road; to the left the wives' quarters (oderie), and to the right the young men's quarters (yekogbe).

Daily street life in Benin City might have consisted of large crowds going though even larger streets, with people colourfully dressed - some in white, others in yellow, blue or green - and the city captains acting as judges to resolve lawsuits, moderating debates in the numerous galleries, and arbitrating petty conflicts in the markets.

The early foreign explorers' descriptions of Benin City portrayed it as a place free of crime and hunger, with large streets and houses kept clean; a city filled with courteous, honest people, and run by a centralised and highly sophisticated bureaucracy.

"What impressed the first visiting Europeans most was the wealth, artistic beauty and magnificence of the city

The city was split into 11 divisions, each a smaller replication of the king's court, comprising a sprawling series of compounds containing accommodation, workshops and public buildings - interconnected by innumerable doors and passageways, all richly decorated with the art that made Benin famous. The city was literally covered in it.

The exterior walls of the courts and compounds were decorated with horizontal ridge designs (aghen) and clay decorated with horizontal ridge designs (ugbeh) and clay carvings portraying animals, warriors and other symbols of power - the carvings would create contrasting patterns in the strong sunlight. Natural objects (pebbles or pieces of mica) were also pressed into the wet clay, while in the palaces, pillars were covered with bronze plaques illustrating the victories and deeds of former kings and nobles.

At the height of its greatness in the 12th century - well before the start of the European Renaissance - the kings and nobles of Benin City patronised craftsmen and lavished them with gifts and wealth, in return for their depiction of the kings' and dignitaries' great exploits in intricate bronze sculptures.

"These works from Benin are equal to the very finest examples of European casting technique," wrote Professor Felix von Luschan, formerly of the Berlin Ethnological Museum. "Benvenuto Celini could not have cast them better, nor could anyone else before or after him. Technically, these bronzes represent the very highest possible achievement."

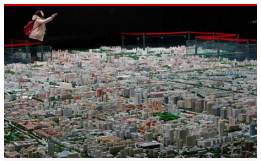
What impressed the first visiting Europeans most was the wealth, artistic beauty and magnificence of the city. Immediately European nations saw the opportunity to develop trade with the wealthy kingdom, importing ivory, palm oil and pepper - and exporting guns. At the beginning of the 16th century, word quickly spread around Europe about the beautiful African city, and new visitors flocked in from all parts of Europe, with ever glowing testimonies, recorded in numerous voyage notes and illustrations.

Lost world



Now, however, the great Benin City is lost to history. Its decline began in the 15th century, sparked by internal conflicts linked to the increasing European intrusion and slavery trade at the borders of the Benin empire.

Then in 1897, the city was destroyed by British soldiers - looted, blown up and burnt to the ground. My great grandparents were among the many who fled following the sacking of the city; they were members of the elite corps of the king's doctors.

Nowadays, while a modern Benin City has risen on the same plain, the ruins of its former, grander namesake are not mentioned in any tourist guidebook of its former, grander namesake are not mentioned in any tourist guidebook to the area. They have not been preserved, nor has a miniature city or touristic replica been made to keep alive the memory of this great ancient city.

A house composed of a courtyard in Obasagbon, known as Chief Enogie Aikoriogie's house - probably built in the second half of the 19th century - is considered the only vestige that survives from Benin City. The house possesses features that match the horizontally fluted walls, pillars, central impluvium and carved decorations observed in the architecture of ancient Benin.

Curious tourists visiting Edo state in Nigeria are often shown places that might once have been part of the ancient city - but its walls and moats are nowhere to be seen. Perhaps a section of the great city wall, one of the world's largest man-made monuments, now lies bruised and battered, neglected and forgotten in the Nigerian bush.

A discontented Nigerian puts it this way: "Imagine if this monument was in England, USA, Germany, Canada or India? It would be the most visited place on earth, and a tourist mecca for millions of the world's people. A money-spinner worth countless billions in annual tourist revenue."

Instead, if you wish to get a glimpse into the glorious past of the ancient Benin kingdom - and a better understanding of this groundbreaking city - you are better off visiting the Benin Bronze Sculptures section of the British Museum in central London.

Associate Editor, History

At its height in the 1840s, the West African kingdom of Dahomey boasted an army so fierce that its enemies spoke of its "prodigious bravery." This 6,000-strong force, known as the Agojie, raided villages under cover of darkness, took captives and slashed off resisters' heads to return to their king as trophies of war. Through these actions, the Agoije established Dahomey's preeminence over neighboring kingdoms and became known by European visitors as "Amazons" due to their similarities to the warrior women of Greek myth.

The Woman King, a new movie starring Viola Davis as a fictionalized leader of the Agojie, tells the story of this all-woman fighting force. Directed by Gina Prince-Bythewood, the film takes place as conflict engulfs the region, and the specter of European colonization looms ominously. It represents the first time that the American film industry has dramatized the compelling story.

As the Hollywood Reporter's Rebecca Keegan writes, The Woman King is "the product of a thousand battles" fought by Davis and Prince-Bythewood, both of whom have spoken out about the obstacles the production team faced when pitching a historical epic centered on strong Black women.

"The part of the movie that we love is also the part of the movie that is terrifying to Hollywood, which is, it's different, it's new," Davis tells Keegan. "We don't always want different or new, unless you have a big star attached, a big male star. … [Hollywood studios] like it when women are pretty and blond or close to pretty and blond. All of these women are dark. And they're beating … men. So there you go."

From the origins of the Agojie to Dahomey's eventual fate, here's what you need to know about the true history behind The Woman King ahead of its arrival in theaters on September 16.

Is The Woman King based on a true story?

In short, yes, but with extensive dramatic license. Though the broad strokes of the film are historically accurate, the majority of its characters are fictional, including Davis' Nanisca and Thuso Mbedu's Nawi, a young warrior-in-training. (Nanisca and Nawi share names with documented members of the Agojie but are not exact mirrors of these women.) King Ghezo (played by John Boyega) is the exception; according to Lynne Ellsworth Larsen, an architectural historian who studies gender dynamics in Dahomey, Ghezo (reigned 1818 to 1859) and his son Glele (reigned 1858 to 1889) presided over what's seen as "the golden age of Dahomean history," ushering in an era of economic prosperity and political strength.

The Woman King opens in 1823 with a successful raid by the Agojie, who free captives bound for enslavement from the clutches of the Oyo Empire, a powerful Yoruba state in what is now southwestern Nigeria. Dahomey has long paid tribute to the Oyo but is beginning to assert itself under the leadership of Ghezo and General Nanisca. A parallel plotline finds Nanisca, who disapproves of the slave trade after experiencing its horrors personally, urging Ghezo to end Dahomey's close relationship with Portuguese slave traders and shift to production of palm oil as the kingdom's main export.

The real Ghezo did, in fact, successfully free Dahomey from its tributary status in 1823. But the kingdom's involvement in the slave trade doesn't align as neatly with the historical record. As historian Robin Law notes, Dahomey emerged as a key player in the trafficking of West Africans between the 1680s and early 1700s, selling its captives to European traders whose presence and demand fueled the industry—and, in turn, the monumental scale of Dahomey's warfare.

Though the majority of individuals taken prisoner by Dahomey were enslaved abroad, a not-insignificant number remained in the kingdom, where they served on royal farms, in the army or at the palace. In truth, Ghezo only agreed to end Dahomey's participation in the slave trade in 1852, after years of pressure by the British government, which had abolished slavery (for not wholly altruistic reasons) in its own colonies in 1833. Though Ghezo did at one point explore palm oil production as an alternative source of revenue, it proved far less lucrative, and the king soon resumed Dahomey's participation in the slave trade.

In response to concerns about how her movie will depict Dahomey's engagement with European slave traders, Prince-Bythewood told the Hollywood Reporter, "We're going to tell the truth. We're not going to shy away from anything. But also we're telling a part of the story which is about overcoming and fighting for what's right."

Portraying the Agojie, through Nanisca's actions, as critics of the slave trade makes for a "nice story," says Larsen in an interview. "Do I think it's historically accurate? I'm skeptical." She adds, "These women are symbols of strength and of power. But … they're [also] complicit in a problematic system. They are still under the patriarchy of the king, and they are still players in the slave trade."

Maria Bello, an actress and producer who co-wrote the story The Woman King's script is based on, first learned about the Agojie during a 2015 trip to Benin. Recognizing the subject's cinematic appeal, she persuaded producer Cathy Schulman to find a studio willing to finance the project. Prince-Bythewood and Davis joined the team soon after. "It was a constant push and fight to convince people that we deserve a big budget, that we deserved to tell a story like this," Prince-Bythewood tells the Los Angeles Times.

The all-woman Dora Milaje regiment featured in Black Panther is based on the Dahomey warriors.
Marvel / Disney

That the film was greenlit at all likely stems from the blockbuster success of 2018's Black Panther, which testified to the demand for entertainment created by and featuring Black creatives. The movie's Dora Milaje regiment was inspired by the Agojie.

"For so long, Hollywood has only ever framed Africa in stereotypical ways," Aje-Ori Agbese, an expert on African cinema at the University of Texas Rio Grande Valley, tells Ms. magazine. "So [The Woman King], centered on African women and African history, will generate a conversation. We have Black Panther to thank for that."

Who were the Agojie?

The first recorded mention of the Agojie dates to 1729. But the unit was possibly formed even earlier, toward the beginning of Dahomey's existence, when King Huegbadja (reigned circa 1645 to 1685) created a corps of woman elephant hunters. Alternatively, Hangbe, who briefly ruled as regent following the death of her brother in the early 18th century, may have introduced the women warriors as part of her palace guard. Either way, the Agojie reached their peak in the 19th century, under Ghezo, who formally incorporated them into Dahomey's army. Thanks to the kingdom's ongoing wars, Dahomey's male population had dropped significantly, creating an opportunity for women to replace men on the battlefield.

“More perhaps than any other African state, Dahomey was dedicated to warfare and slave-raiding,” wrote Stanley B. Alpern in Amazons of Black Sparta: The Women Warriors of Dahomey, the first full-length, English-language study of the Agojie. “It may also have been the most totalitarian, with the king controlling and regimenting practically every aspect of social life.”

Dahomey’s standing army was an anomaly in and of itself, as most other African kingdoms disbanded their forces when not actively at war. The fact that the Agojie and their male counterparts wore uniforms also set them apart, establishing the Dahomean military as an organized, highly visible fighting force.

“They’re meant to have a public face,” says Larsen. “They wanted to … be feared by their neighbors. This was a slave trading kingdom, so warfare was part of their annual cycle. They needed to gather humans to be part of this heinous transatlantic slave trade,” as well as for human sacrifices to posthumously deified kings.

The Agojie’s ranks included volunteers and forced conscripts alike. “Regiments were recruited from slaves, some of them captured as early in age as 10 years old, also the poor, and girls who were rebellious," said Terri Ochiagha, an expert on colonial and postcolonial Nigeria at the University of Edinburgh, in the 2018 Smithsonian Channel documentary series "Epic Warrior Women." In The Woman King, Nawi ends up in the army after refusing to marry an elderly suitor.

During the 17th century, the Agooji were a battle-hardened, all-female warrior force that held a special place within the African kingdom of Dahomey. Most were former slaves, with only the bravest and toughest admitted into the fold.

All of Dahomey's women warriors were considered ahosi, or wives of the king. They lived in the royal palace alongside the king and his other wives, inhabiting a largely woman-dominated space. Aside from eunuchs and the king himself, no men were allowed in the palace after sunset.

As Alpern told Smithsonian magazine in 2011, the Agojie were considered the king's "third-class" wives, as they typically didn't share his bed or bear his children. Because they were married to the king, they were restricted from having sex with other men, although the degree to which this celibacy was enforced is subject to debate. In addition to enjoying privileged status, the warriors had access to a steady supply of tobacco and alcohol. They also had enslaved servants of their own.

To become an Agojie, recruits underwent intensive training, including exercises designed to harden them to bloodshed. In 1889, French naval officer Jean Bayol witnessed Nanisca (who likely inspired the name of Davis' character in The Woman King), a teenager "who had not yet killed anyone," easily pass a test of wills. Walking up to a condemned prisoner, she reportedly "swung her sword three times with both hands, then calmly cut the last flesh that attached the head to the trunk. … She then squeezed the blood off her weapon and swallowed it."

Another common form of training involved mock assaults that found recruits scrambling across towering walls of acacia thorns. In the words of a British traveler who examined the barriers, "I could not persuade myself that any human being, without boots or shoes, would, under any circumstances, attempt to pass over so dangerous a collection of the most efficiently armed plants I had ever seen." The warriors bore the pain without complaint, and the bravest among them received acacia thorn belts marking their stoicism.

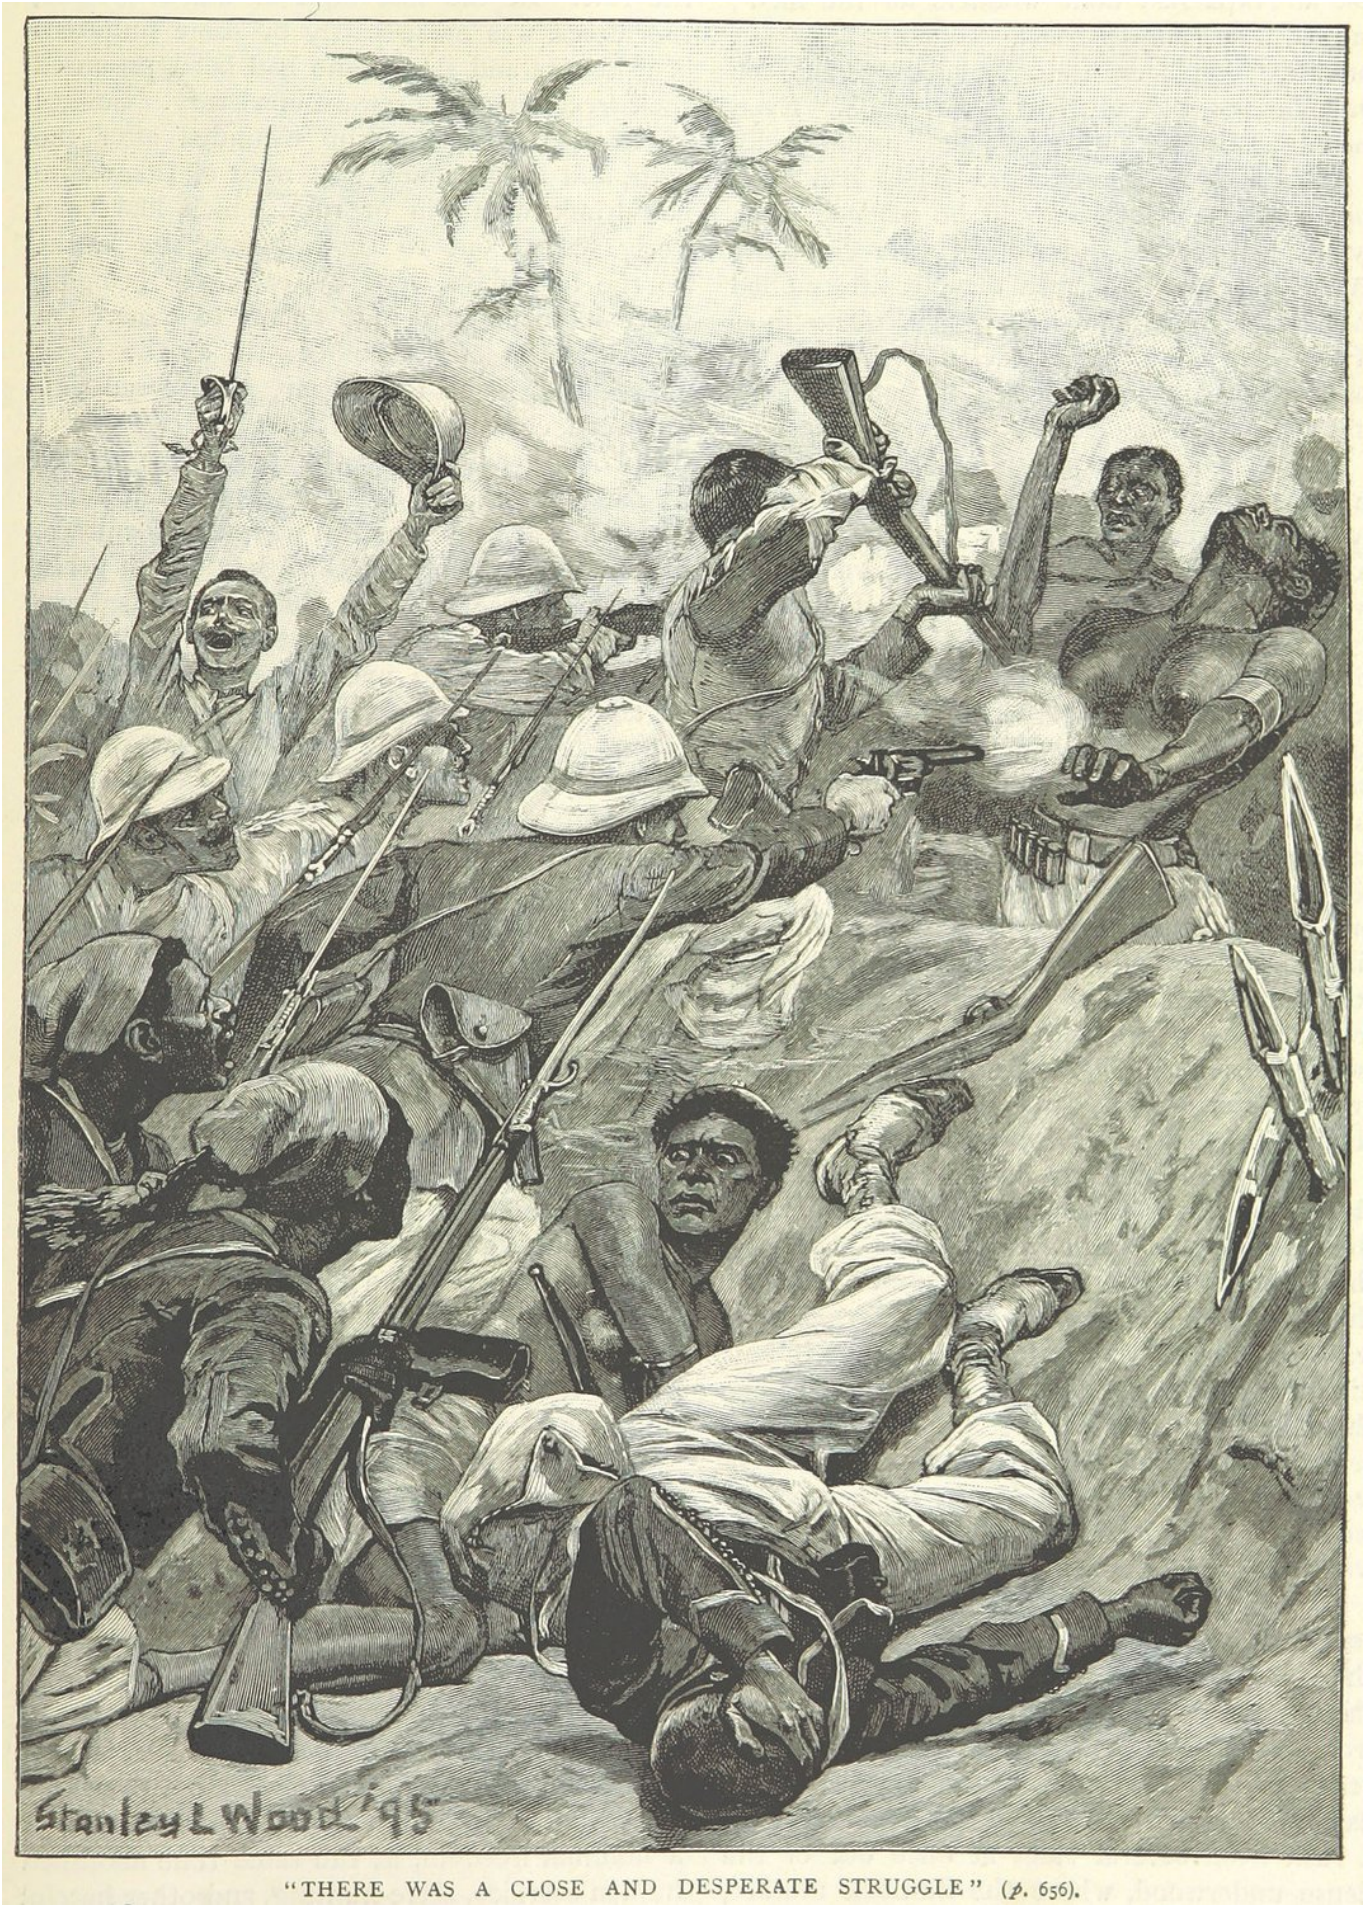
The Agojie's divisions consisted of five branches: blunderbuss or artillery women, elephant hunters, musketeers, razor women, and archers. Surprising the enemy was of the utmost importance. Warriors snuck up on villages at or before dawn, taking captives and decapitating those who resisted. Though European accounts of the Agojie vary widely, what "is indisputable … is their constantly outstanding performance in combat," wrote Alpern in Amazons of Black Sparta. With the rest of the Dahomean army, these women warriors were "the scourge and terror of the whole surrounding country, always at war and generally victorious," as an American missionary later recounted.

What happened to the Agojie?

Dahomey's military dominance started to wane in the second half of the 19th century, when its army repeatedly failed to capture Abeokuta, a well-fortified Egba capital in what is now southwest Nigeria. An 1851 battle with the Egba, who'd settled in the region following the decline of the Oyo Empire, resulted in the deaths of up to 2,000 Agojie; in 1864, King Glele, who succeeded Ghezo a few years earlier, sought to avenge his father's defeat at Abeokuta but was forced to retreat after just an hour and a half of fighting. Dahomean forces continued to target Egba villages until the early 1890s, when war with the French threatened the kingdom's very existence.



Dahomey's encounters with European colonizers had historically revolved mainly around the slave trade and religious missions. As the Scramble for Africa ramped up, however, tensions between Dahomey and France escalated. In 1863, the French declared the neighboring kingdom of Porto-Novo a colonial protectorate, angering Glele, who considered Porto-Novo a vassal of Dahomey.

Glele also clashed with the French over the port city of Cotonou.

"THERE WAS A CLOSE AND DESPERATE STRUGGLE" (p. 656).

As Larsen articulates, the existence—and dominance—of Dahomey's women warriors upset the French's "understanding of gender roles and what women were supposed to do" in a "civilized" society. The women's "flaunting of ferocity, physical power and fearlessness was manipulated or corrupted as Europeans started to interpret [it] in their own context of what they felt societies should be," she says. For the French, the Agojie were simply "more fuel for their civilizing mission," which sought to impose European ideals on African countries.

The First Franco-Dahomean War began on February 21, 1890, just two months after the accession of Glele's son Kondo, who took the name Béhanzin upon claiming the throne. On March 4, the Dahomean army attacked the French at Cotonou, only to fall to the Europeans' vastly superior firepower. Nanisca, the teenager who'd left such an impression on French officer Bayol the previous year, decapitated the enemy's chief gunner but died on the battlefield. Upon seeing Nanisca's body, Bayol wrote that a "cleaver, its curved blade engraved with fetish symbols, was attached to her left wrist by a small cord, and her right hand was clenched round the barrel of her carbine covered with cowries."

After facing a similar defeat at the Battle of Atchoupa on April 20, Dahomey agreed to a peace treaty assenting to French control over Porto-Novo and Cotonou. The lull in warfare lasted less than two years—an intermediary period that Béhanzin spent equipping his army with weapons equal to, or at least better matched with, the French's. According to Alpern, upon receiving news of the French's declaration of war, the Dahomean king said, "The first time, I was ignorant of how to make war, but now I know. … If you want war, I am ready. I wouldn't stop even if it lasted 100 years and killed 20,000 of my men."

Béhanzin proved true to his word. Over the course of seven weeks in fall 1892, Dahomey's army fought valiantly to repel the French. The Agojie participated in 23 separate engagements during that short time span, earning the enemy's respect for their valor and dedication to the cause. As one marine noted, "[N]either the cannons, nor the canister shot, nor the salvo fire stops them. … It is really strange to see women so well led, so well disciplined." Though sources disagree on the number of women warriors who fought in the Second Franco-Dahomean War, Alpern cites 1,200 to 2,500 as a likely range.

An illustration of Seh-Dong-Hong-Beh, a leader of the Agojie, holding the severed head of an enemy Public domain via Wikimedia Commons

At the village of Adégon on October 6, the Agojie suffered arguably their worst losses yet, with just 17 soldiers returning from an initial force of 434. Béhanzin's brother Sagbaju Glele, who lived until the 1970s, told a local historian that the battle brought a moment of clarity for Dahomey's courtiers, who now realized the inevitability of their kingdom's destruction. The Dahomean army made a final stand at Cana in early November. The last day of fighting, reported a French marine colonel, was "one of the most murderous" of the entire war, beginning with the dramatic entrance of "the last Amazons … as well as the elephant hunters whose special assignment was to direct their fire at the officers." The French officially seized the Dahomey capital of Abomey on November 17.

Between 2,000 and 4,000 Dahomean soldiers—including both men and women—died during the seven-week war. Of the roughly 1,200 Agojie in fighting shape at the beginning of the war, just 50 or 60 remained ready for battle by its end. Comparatively, the French side lost 52 Europeans and 33 Africans on the battlefield.

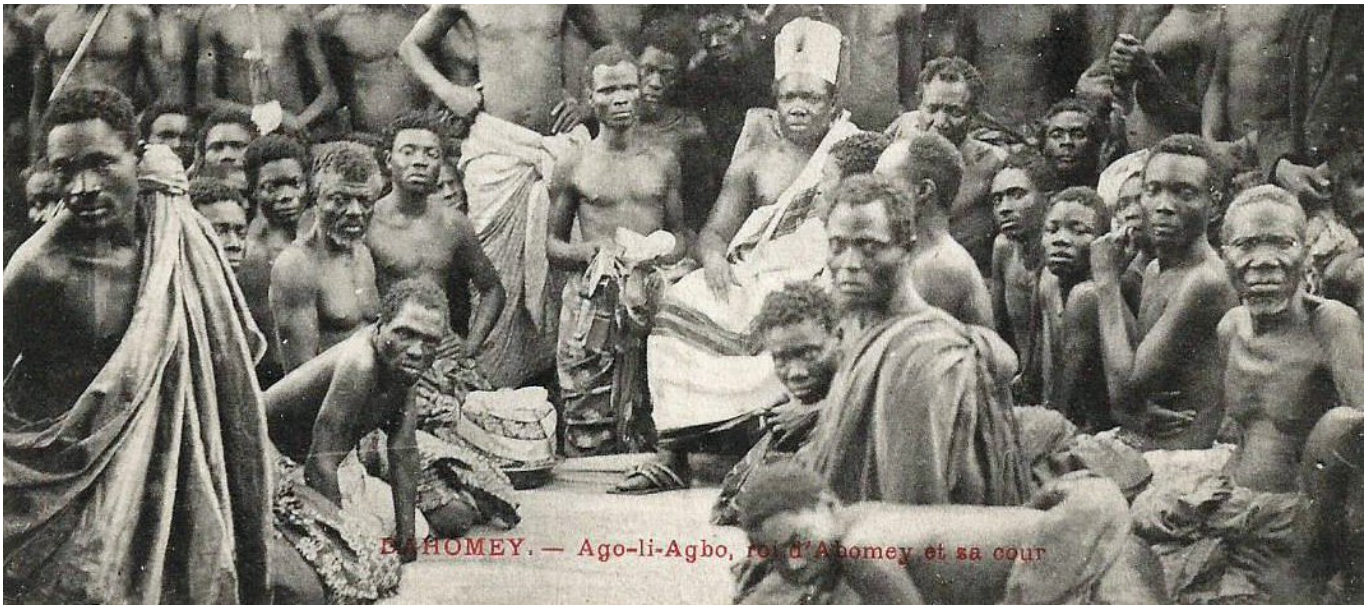
After the war, some of the surviving Agojie followed Béhanzin into exile in Martinique or served his brother, a puppet king installed by the French. Others tried to reenter society, to varying degrees of success. Still others toured Europe and the United States, performing dances and battlefield reenactments at "living exhibitions" that played into racist stereotypes of African people. At the 1893 World's Columbian Exposition in Chicago, visitors to the "Dahomey Village" were welcomed by a pair of juxtaposed paintings: an Agojie holding up an enemy's severed head and a white colonizer raising his helmet. "You have these parallel images of what was considered barbaric and what the civilizers were here to correct," says Larsen.

The Dahomey Village at the 1893 World's Columbian Exposition Public domain via Wikimedia Commons



Last year, Leonard Wantchekon, an economist at Princeton University and native of Benin who leads research seeking to identify the Agojie's descendants, told the Washington Post that French colonization proved detrimental to women's rights in Dahomey, with colonizers barring women from political leadership (in addition to serving as warriors, ahosi could become royal cabinet ministers) and educational opportunities.

"The French made sure this history wasn't known," he explained. "They said we were backward, that they needed to 'civilize us,' but they destroyed opportunities for women that existed nowhere else in the world."

Nawi, the last known surviving Agojie with battlefield experience (and the probable inspiration for Mbedu's character), died in 1979, at well over 100 years old. But Agojie traditions continued long after Dahomey's fall, with descendants of the warrior women sharing stories about their formidable ancestors and participating in religious rituals. When actress Lupita Nyong'o visited Benin for a 2019 Smithsonian Channel special, she met a woman identified by locals as an Agojie who'd been trained by older warriors as a child and kept hidden within a palace for decades.

Speaking with History.com, Wantchekon emphasizes the central role played by women in Dahomean society. "When we push back against [colonialist] misconception[s] and embrace the culture of gender equality that was thriving in Benin and places like it before colonization," he says, "it is a way to embrace the legacy of this exceptional group of African female leaders that European history tried so hard to erase."

What if, we've missed out on details ?
What if , we didn't understand the obvious ....

pillar
pil·lar 'pi-lər
: a firm upright support for a superstructure :
: a usually ornamental column or shaft especially : one standing alone for a monument
: a supporting, integral, or upstanding member or part a pillar of society
: a fundamental precept
the five pillars of Islam
: a solid mass of coal, rock, or ore left standing to support a mine roof
: a body part that resembles a column pillarless adjective
pillar
pillared; pillaring; pillars transitive verb
: to provide or strengthen with or as if with pillars Phrases
from pillar to post
: from one place or one predicament to another

That's quite a simple explanation ! And what if it was a little bit more complicated than we think La pile ! Mot francais demonstrate lots of similitude with the ancient pillars of our ancestors, maybe they knew something we dont ?

Thats said ! We know that the blocks at gizea , are filled with supraconductor! Piezoelectricity, quartz, copper , gold ,iron , and more ! These huge columns pillars and granit block act as a grid where the electricity (energy) is sorted and transport from a building to an other...

What if, we made smaller today, what was bigger yesterday !

What if, these are huge machine , computer , batteri ? Energie harvesters...

Une pile électrique, couramment dénommée « pile »[1], est un dispositif électrochimique qui produit de l'électricité en convertissant de l'énergie chimique en énergie électrique grâce à une réaction d'oxydoréduction.

Ce système électrochimique a été inventé par le scientifique italien Alessandro Volta en empilant[a] par des feutres imbibés d'acide. Le Bureau international des poids et mesures choisit de nommer l'unité de potentiel électrique le volt, en référence à Volta.

(des couches de deux métaux séparées)

Par analogie, le terme « pile » désigne pour tout empilement d'éléments produisant de l'électricité, de même que « batterie » désigne toute mise en série de piles ou d'accumulateurs électriques

Женщина в Марокко родила девять детей: семейству впервые разрешили сфотографироваться вместе

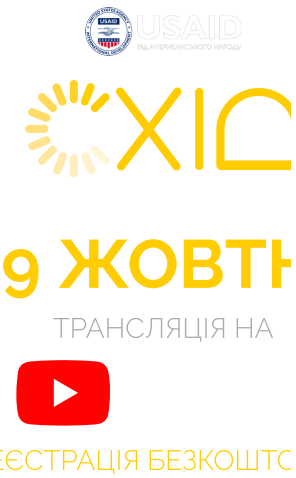
Семья из Мали с 9 детьми



Многодетной семьи помогает правительство Мали, а его представитель Джаминат Сангаре недавно навестил малышей.

В сети появились фотографии огромной семьи из Мали, которая прославилась на весь мир рождением в июле девятерых детей, что стало рекордом. Мать младенцев Халима Сиссе уже настроена выписаться из марокканской больницы и уехать домой, сообщает Daily Mail.

Хотя дети Сиссе родились преждевременно, на сегодняшний день они окрепли и чувствуют себя хорошо.

"Все они очень хорошо ладят и за ними приятно ухаживать. Они становятся сильнее с каждым днем и вполне возможно, что скоро им разрешат отказаться от медицинской поддержки, чтобы мы могли забрать их домой", — сообщила 26-летняя мать.

Всего женщина родила четырех мальчиков и пятерых девочек. Мальчиков назвали Мохаммед, Бах, Эль-Хаджи и Умар, а девочек — Хава, Адама, Фатума, Оуму и Кадидия.

Девять малышей были зачаты естественным путем, но родились недоношенными, из-за чего их вес составлял от 500 г до 1 кг. Их поместили в специальные инкубаторы отделения интенсивной терапии клиники, где за ними круглосуточно присматривала команда врачей и медсестер на протяжении нескольких месяцев. С инкубаторов детей сняли в августе, вся семья жила в квартире недалеко от больницы, чтобы врачи могли помогать потомству. Теперь все младенцы набрали вес и продолжают развиваться.

Девочки и мальчики рекордного потомства

Отцу малышей, 35-летнему моряку Кадеру Арби и Халиме Сиссе разрешили сделать фотосессию с детьми только сейчас, так как раньше они были слабы и находились в инкубаторах.

На фотографиях изображены мальчики — Умар, Эль-хаджи, Бах и Мохаммед — в зеленых комбинезонах с надписью "Брат". Девочки Адама, Оумо, Хава, Кадидия и Фатума одеты в розовые и голубые одежки.

Все малыши являются гражданами Мали, и на прошлой неделе их посетил Джаминату Сангаре, министр здравоохранения страны. Чиновник поручил безопасно доставить семейство домой. Известно, что счет за услуги медперсонала и за содержание детей с мамой приблизился к одному миллиону фунтов стерлингов, но большую часть денег выделило правительство Мали.

Халима Сиссе родила девятерых младенцев в июле, чем побила предыдущий рекорд 2009 года Нади Сулеман. Ее предшественница родила одним ребенком меньше.

Сиссе чуть не умерла от потери крови во время родов. Врачи подсчитали, что ее живот весил почти 30 кг за счет младенцев и околоплодных вод.

Пара поженилась в 2017 году, у них есть еще одна дочь Суда, ей 2,5 лет. Все это время за старшей присматривали родственники.

THE TARTARIANS WERE BLACKAMOORS:
Why we can't fully rock with the tartary/tartaria theory. It doesn't include black history or it white washes black (moor) history.

“Their manner of levying a money-tax upon the vanquished was precisely that of the Black Huns in Italy, many centuries before: and it is unnecessary to emphasize the fact that they scalped their enemies like the modern “Red Indians.” The Tartar features of these Black Danes are visible again and again: (the word “Tartar,” being used as it was done when “as Black as Tartars” was a proverbial expression).” [End quote from, “Ancient and Modern Britons,” by David MacRitchie, pg. 406.

Tartars or the people of Tartary are Moors/Muurs/Mers and the “Great Tartarian” Empire that is now the hot topic of the day was a MOORISH dominion in the Moorish Empire that spanned the earth.

Root Races: After the fall of Lemuria / Mu . Beginning of Atlantis
1. Rmoahal
2. Tlavatlis
3. Toltec
4. Turanian
5. Shemite
6. Akkadian/Arcadian
7. Mongolian

As mentioned Genghis Khan & the Mongols may have been fighting to keep the past civilization that was tartaria & others from falling to the current Rothschild/freemasons & other groups. There we're plenty of Russian or Germany artwork showing blacks as kings, knights,priests & any other position you can think of. Of course with the fall of Spain & other places centering around 1492 you will start to notice the removal of black faces from history in places. In some places depending on how fast colonization was Tartaria fell. Its great buildings were buried, and its history was erased. After this “great reset,” the few surviving examples of Tartarian architecture were falsely recast as the work of contemporary builders who could never have executed buildings of such grace and beauty, and subjected them to clumsy

There is a growing opinion in Russia that French invasion of Russia played out according to a different scenario. The one where Tsar Alexander I, and Napoleon were on the same side. Together they fought against Tartary. Essentially France and Saint Petersburg against Moscow (Tartary). And there is a strong circumstantial evidence to support such a theory.

They built the Great Wall in what is now China. Marco Polo wrote an extensive and detailed account of Asia in the 13th and 14th centuries and did not even mention a wall. The Great Wall is not seen on any maps pre-dating the late 1600's. Genghis Khan fought to restore the kingdom of Tartary and reclaim their land. His mounted warriors were called Tartars. Now Tartary is associated with hell.

The use of energy weapons has been going on for over a thousand years. It was perfected to the point where it was able to take out many millions of Tartarians. The energy weapons melted cities and destroyed the civilizations of Egypt, Greece and Rome which were approximately of the same time period as Jesus and were heavily influenced by Tartaria.

A known Energy weapon was the Arc of the Covenant. It brought down the Walls of Jericho. The Arc was an electrical capacitor composed of silver and brass alloys and gilded with gold. It's true purpose was to store and direct energy from the Earth to outside sources. But transporting it around was very dangerous and it caused people to become sick and die due to constant radiation, but it also sent out intermittent electrical surges where many people were killed instantly.

According to African scholars, his name must have come from "Nganga Nzambi" an expression meaning "God's priest" in Kikongo, language spoken in the Kongo empire.
Ganga Zumba is remembered by historians as the hero and freedom fighter who was central to the history and modern-day struggle of the Brazilian Black Movement, having led an alliance of “independent settlements” called Quilombo dos Palmares.
An area located between the states of Alagoas and Pernambuco, in northeastern Brazil, Quilombo dos Palmares was founded by runway Brazilian African captives in the late 16th century as resistance to European colonizers and enslavers. The area became one of the first places, in the Americas, where Black captives found freedom. For almost a hundred years, Black people in Quilombo fought against their oppressors, particularly the Portuguese who at that time attempted to colonize Brazil.
Zumba, as king of Quilombo in the 1670s, led these attacks against the oppressors, and despite repeated threats from the colonial authorities, Quilombo thrived as fugitive captive set up a collective economy based upon subsistence agriculture, trade, and communal land ownership, according to accounts. And all these were largely thanks to the leadership and intelligence of Zumba.

Brazil has an official national day in his honour, 20th November. The day Zumbi is reported to have died.

An interesting thing to note is that the word Quilombo derives from Angola where historically it refered to a Military Camp in languages like Umbundu and Kimbundu in which the word Quilombo occurs as Ochilombo and kilombo respectively. It also alternatively refers to a resting place during a Journey. Amazing to see how enslaved Africans in Brazil managed to retain some relative cultural memory of their history as such words attest. Nganga is a bit of tricky one though; in some Bantu languages, Nganga means a Healer but in our language, Umbundu it means a Wizard and therefore carries a sinister connotation. What others mean by Nganga in a positive sense, we refer to as Ochimbanda (a Healer and Foreteller) the practice of which is called Umbanda (the practice of Healing and Foretelling), a word that in Brazil came to refer to an Afro-brazilian religion. 5

..... هل كلكامش اول من صام؟؟؟

في هذه السلسلة سندرس جميع نصوص المسمارية التي أشارت للصيام بمعنى (الانقطاع عن الأكل والشراب طواعيا)

أقدم نص يشير للصوم بمعنى الامتناع عن الطعام هو ماورد في ملحمة كلكامش

لكن قبل أن أورد لكم النص.. دعونا نتفق ان الصوم بطبيعة الحال يحصل تلقائيا عند المصائب فعندما يتوفى شخص قريب أو حبيب لك تشعر بالاسى والحزن العميق وتفقد شهيتك بالأكل بل حتى تعلن الإضراب عن الأكل هذا حال صاحبنا كلكامش عندما مات انكيدو.... دعونا نرى ماذا يخبرنا النص المسماري عن حال كلكامش.

في اللوح العاشر عندما جاء كلكامش لصاحبة الخان شيدوري
فزعت من مظهرهُ واغلقت الباب بوجه وقالت لهُ:

لماذا وجنتاك غائرتان و وجهك ذابل ؟
وحالك بائس و منظرك هزيل ؟
لماذا يقيم الأسى في قلبك ؟
و وجهك كوجه من قدِم من بعيد
لماذا ملامحك غيّرها الصقيع و لهيب الشمس
ولماذا تجوب البريّة بجلد أسد؟
قال جلجامش
ولماذا لا تغور وجنتاي ، و لا يهزل وجهي ؟
و لماذا لا يكون حالي بائسا ، و منظري هزيلا ؟
و لماذا لا يقيم الحزن في قلبي ؟
و لماذا لا يكون وجهي كوجه من قدّم من بعيد ؟
و لماذا لا تتغير ملامحي بالصقيع و لهيب الشمس؟
و لماذا لا أجوب البريّة بجلد أسد ؟
صديقي إنكيدوالذي أحببته جدا
و كان معي في جميع المخاطر
صديقي الذي أحببته جدا
القدر المشؤوم أخذه منّي
ستّة أيام بكيته و سبع ليال
لم أوارِ جسده الثرى
حتى تساقطت اليرقات من أنفه
حينما شعرت بالفزع من أن أموت مثله
صرت أخاف من الموت.

هنا نلاحظ إشارات ان كلكامش كان صائما حزنا على فقدان انكيدو. فكل الإشارات تدل على أنه امتنع عن الاكل بسبب الحزن.

هنا نطقت شيدوري صاحبة الخان حكمتها الشهيرة

تذوق طعامك
واجعل كل يوم من أيامك بهجة
واستحم وادهن نفسك
وارتدي ملابس لامعة نظيفة متلألئة
ودع الموسيقى والرقص يملآن منزلك
أحب الطفل الذي يمسك بيدك
وامنح زوجتك المتعة في عناقك
هذه هي أفضل طريقة ليعيش الرجل حياته

في نصيحه شيدوري نستنتج ان الحزن الشديد على انكيدو جعل من كلكامش ممتنعا عن الطعام اي صائم بدليل قول شيدوري لكلكامش
(لماذا وجنتاك غائرتان و وجهك ذابل ؟وحالك بائس و منظرك هزيل ؟)) وهذة علامة من يصوم ايام متواصلة.
وهناك إشارة من شيدوري لكلكامش على الكف عن الصوم بقولها ((تذوق طعامك واجل كل يوم من ايامك بهجه))

وهذة أحبتي ربما أقدم إشارة للصوم في التاريخ

للحديث تتمة

شكرا على منشورك صديقي و لكن قياسك و تشبيهك غير صحيح و غير منطقي... الصيام عند المسلمين عبادة دينيا... يعني وجد ذكر من سبقنا في "عباااااادة الصيام" مثل اليهود و اهندوس و غيرهم.. ثم لو قلنا ان الصيام يكون بانقطاع الشهية عند الحزن ف مؤكد ان جلجامش ليس اول من فقد شخصا عزيزا و فقد شهيته و "صام" .. فمن المنطقي ان كل ام فقدت ابنها قبل عصر جلجامش و بعده ستحزن عليه و تنقطع شهيتها و تصوم.. هذا تعليقي على منشورك هذا فقط و لم أقرأ الاجزاء الاخرى 1

يجب ان نكف عن نسب كل شيئ الى سومر او كنعان او اشور و ان نعرف حدود الاشياء الصوم كممارسة فردية هي ليس الامتناع عن الطعام الصوم و اضع خطين على كلمة صائم هي انه يزهد و يقاطع شهوات جسمه لتسمو روحه هذا معنى الصوم الديني او معنى الصوم اصطلاحا اما الامتناع عن الاكل بسبب علة فهو مرض و ليس صوما اضف انه حتى الصيام عن الاكل فقط لا يصل فيه الجسم و الروح الى السمو بقدر الابيتعاد عن الشهوات 2

Le Siècle des Lumières ?

Non, le Siècle des Ténèbres, selon Alain pascal, car la vraie Lumière vient de Dieu, tandis que celle du XVIII° siècle sont héritiers de Rose-Croix "illuminés" par la Kabbale.

Une lecture "ésotérique" de Fénelon, Diderot, Voltaire et Rousseau permet à l'auteur de décrypter et de détruire le mythe de "lumières" qui seraient source de progrès.

Il présent aussi le rôle de la franc-maçonnerie dans la marche vers la Révolution, notamment à travers l'Encyclopédie.

Voici une remise en cause profonde de l'histoire du XVIII° siècle, dont les errements produisent encore leurs effets aujourd'hui avec le gauchisme et le mondialisme, fruits des ténébreuses Lumières..

Why Is Jesus Called “Son of Man”?

Resource with John Piper

Topic: The Person of Christ

Why is Jesus called "Son of Man"?

Let me give a common understanding and then a more sophisticated historical understanding.

The common understanding is that "Son of God" implies his deity—which it does—and that "Son of Man" implies his humanity, which it does too.

He was a son of man, that is, a human being. And he is the Son of God, in that he has always existed as the Eternally Begotten One who comes forth from the Father forever. He always has, and he always will. He is the Second Person of the Trinity with all of the divine nature fully in him.

He is born of a virgin. He had a human father but he didn't have sex with this virgin until Jesus was conceived. He was conceived of the Holy Spirit in the virgin Mary. Thus he is human—fully human. The Bible wants to emphasize that he is fully human.

So that's the common understanding: he is both divine and he is human—two natures, one person.

The more sophisticated and important historical insight is that the term "Son of Man" doesn't merely align him with humanity. It is probably taken from Daniel 7. And if you read that chapter you'll see that the Son of Man is a very exalted figure: not just a human figure but an exalted figure. It was Jesus' favorite self-designation.

If you do a study of the term "Son of Man" in the Gospels you'll see that he didn't refer to himself most often as Son of God but as Son of Man. He said things like, in Mark 10:45, "The Son of Man came not to be served but to serve and to give his life as a ransom for many." So he calls himself Son of Man very often.

I think the reason he did so is because, on the face of it, Son of Man is an ordinary phrase for "human being." He was born of a man. And there's no offense there: who isn't a son of man? But those with ears to hear could hear Daniel 7, in which he was claiming a very exalted role in the history of redemption. And he meant to do it.

Jesus was very subtle in that he was always opening his identity to those with eyes to see, but he wasn't opening it so blatantly that everybody would come and make him king. He had to steer a very narrow course in disclosing his identity, not just openly saying, "I'm the Messiah, I'm the King of the World. Come and acknowledge me as King." He didn't talk like that.

He was quiet. He was subtle. And he would make claims that were explicit in certain settings and implicit in others. And only when the time was right—mainly when he was on trial for his life, and they said, "Are you the Christ, the Son of the living God?"—did he say, "I am, and you will see the Son of Man coming with great power and glory." So he confessed his open deity right at the point where he knew he would be crucified for it.

So I hope that helps. "Son of Man" has the double meaning of human being and, according to Daniel 7, exalted heavenly one. And Jesus means to communicate both of those.

существуют микроорганизмы, которые могут разлагать материалы, используемые в строительстве исторических зданий, такие как камень, бетон и кирпич. Некоторые из этих бактерий могут проникать в поры материала и затем выделять кислоты, которые растворяют минералы, что приводит к разрушению материала.

Одним из наиболее известных примеров такой бактерии является "Thiobacillus ferrooxidans", которая может разлагать железо и серу в материалах, таких как камень или бетон, что приводит к появлению трещин и к разрушению конструкций.

Однако, необходимо отметить, что большинство исторических зданий имеют защитные покрытия и проходят регулярную инспекцию и консервацию, что позволяет сохранять их в течение многих лет.

опасен ли "Thiobacillus ferrooxidans", для здаровья человека

"Thiobacillus ferrooxidans" не считается обычно опасным для здоровья человека. Этот бактерийный вид встречается в природе и широко используется в промышленности, включая металлургическое производство, очистку сточных вод и производство удобрений.

Однако, при работе с материалами, которые могут содержать "Thiobacillus ferrooxidans", такими как руды, металлические конструкции или здания, которые были заражены этими бактериями, необходимо принимать меры предосторожности. Рекомендуется надевать защитную одежду, маски и перчатки, чтобы предотвратить контакт с бактериями.

Кроме того, если вы заметили признаки разрушения материала, возможно вызванные действием "Thiobacillus ferrooxidans", рекомендуется обратиться к профессионалам для проведения дополнительных исследований и оценки состояния материала.

Индийская полиция арестовала более 2000 мужчин за незаконные браки с детьми

КИЕВ. 6 февраля. УНН. Индийская полиция арестовала более 2000 мужчин за незаконные детские браки с участием девочек в возрасте до 18 лет. Об этом УНН информирует со ссылкой на Associated Press.

Детали

Среди арестованных на этой неделе более 50 индуистских священников и мусульманских священнослужителей по обвинению в браке с несовершеннолетними девушками в Ассаме, заявил начальник полиции штата.

"На данный момент мы арестовали 2169 человек на основании 4074 зарегистрированных полицейских дел, в которых участвовало в общей сложности около 8000 человек", - сказал он.

Дополнение

По данным Национального бюро регистрации преступлений, в 2021 году в штате было зарегистрировано только 155 случаев детских браков, а в 2020 году - 138.

В Индии законный брачный возраст составляет 21 год для мужчин и 18 лет для женщин. Бедность, отсутствие образования и социальные нормы и обычаи, особенно в сельской местности, считаются причинами детских браков по всей стране.

Парламент Индии рассматривает законопроект о повышении возраста вступления в брак для женщин с 18 до 21 года, чтобы привести его в соответствие с возрастом для мужчин и способствовать гендерному равенству.

Un tribunal du Myanmar, pays dirigé par l'armée, rendra mardi les premiers verdicts dans près d'une douzaine de cas contre la dirigeante déchue Aung San Suu Kyi, accusée de crimes dont les peines maximales cumulées dépassent 100 ans.

La populaire lauréate du prix Nobel de la paix a dirigé un gouvernement civil élu, renversé par un coup d'État militaire le 1er février et privé de contact avec le monde extérieur et de procès depuis juin, avec des audiences à huis clos.

Le coaccusé Win Myint, président renversé et allié de la Ligue nationale pour la démocratie (LND) de Suu Kyi, subit le même sort. "

кем был Merle (Jean Toussaint)

Merle (Jean Toussaint Merle) был французским философом и писателем, родившимся в 1880 году. Он известен своими работами в области онтологии, эпистемологии и феноменологии.

Мерль разработал концепцию "я-как-целостность" ("moi-comme-un-tout"), которая является центральной для его философии. Это понимание себя как целостного существа, которое включает в себя и физический, и психологический аспекты личности.

Он также разработал концепцию

"мировоззрения" ("monde-vecu"), которая представляет собой совокупность наших предположений, верований и представлений о мире, которые формируются в процессе нашего взаимодействия с окружающей средой.

Мерль был профессором философии в университетах Бордо и Парижа. Он написал несколько книг, включая "Феноменология восприятия" ("Phenomenologie de la perception"), которая стала одной из наиболее влиятельных работ в области феноменологии. Мерль умер в 1961 году.

о чем его книга Esprit Du Mercure De France: Depuis Son Origine Jusqu'a 1792
Книга "Esprit Du Mercure De France: Depuis Son Origine Jusqu'a 1792" (Дух "Меркура Франции": от его происхождения до 1792 года) была написана Мерле в 1912 году и посвящена истории литературного журнала "Меркур Франции".

В книге Мерль изучает историю "Меркура Франции" с момента его создания в 1672 году до революции 1789 года и дальше до 1792 года. Он анализирует различные эпохи журнала и вклад его авторов в культуру и литературу Франции.

"Меркур Франции" был одним из самых влиятельных литературных журналов в Франции XVIII века, и Мерль исследует его роль в распространении просвещенных идей и событий того времени. В книге Мерль также обращается к истории журналистики и исследует, как "Меркур Франции" стал примером для многих других литературных журналов того времени.

Книга "Esprit Du Mercure De France" является

важным источником для историков литературы, журналистики и культуры Франции XVIII века.

это он написал Le mercure Dolant???
Нет, книга "Le Mercure dolant" не была написана Жаном Туссеном Мерлем.

"Le Mercure dolant" - это произведение из эпохи Ренессанса, написанное французским поэтом Жаном Доратом (Jean Dorat) в 1553 году. Эта поэма в стиле петраркизма была написана в форме элегии и посвящена умершей даме.

Мерль написал книгу "Esprit du Mercure de France: depuis son origine jusqu'a 1792", которая посвящена истории литературного журнала "Меркур Франции", а не "Le Mercure dolant".

marabouts

Les societes secretes des marabouts ont historiquement joue un role important dans la vie politique de certains pays d'Afrique du Nord, notamment au Maroc et en Algerie. Ces societes secretes, appelees "turuq" ou "zaouias", ont souvent ete impliquees dans la lutte pour le pouvoir et ont soutenu differents dirigeants au fil du temps.

Au Maroc, par exemple, les zaouias ont traditionnellement joue un role important dans la vie politique en soutenant les sultans et en leur fournissant une base populaire pour leur pouvoir. Les zaouias ont egalement joue un role important dans la resistance a la colonisation francaise et ont continue a exercer une influence politique apres l'independance du Maroc en 1956.

En Algerie, les confreries soufies, qui ont des similitudes avec les zaouias, ont egalement joue un role important dans la resistance a la colonisation francaise et dans la vie politique post-independance. Les confreries ont souvent ete impliquees dans la mobilisation politique et ont soutenu differents mouvements politiques et leaders.

Cependant, il est important de noter que le role politique des societes secretes des marabouts peut varier considerablement selon les contextes historiques et culturels. Dans certains cas, leur influence politique peut etre marginale, tandis que dans d'autres, elle peut etre centrale.

Les Gnawa et les marabouts ne sont pas les memes, mais ils ont des liens etroits dans la culture et la religion d'Afrique du Nord et de l'Ouest.

Les Gnawa sont une communaute ethnique originaire d'Afrique de l'Ouest, principalement du Mali, qui a ete amenee en Afrique du Nord et de l'Ouest comme esclaves au XVIIe siecle. Ils sont principalement connus pour leur musique et leur danse, qui ont des racines dans les traditions africaines, mais qui ont egalement ete influencees par l'Islam. Les Gnawa sont souvent associes a la transe, qui est un etat de conscience altere atteint par la musique et la danse.

Les marabouts, quant a eux, sont des saints musulmans veneres en Afrique du Nord et de l'Ouest. Ils sont consideres comme des intermediaires entre les gens et Dieu, et sont souvent associes a des confreries soufies, des zaouias et d'autres organisations religieuses. Les marabouts ont une grande influence dans la vie religieuse et sociale de ces regions.

Bien que les Gnawa et les marabouts soient differents, ils ont des liens etroits dans la culture et la religion d'Afrique du Nord et de l'Ouest. Les Gnawa ont souvent ete associes aux confreries soufies, et leur musique et leur danse ont ete utilisees dans les ceremonies religieuses des marabouts. De plus, certains Gnawa considerent les marabouts comme des saints et les venerent comme tels.

les Mohades sont des senegalais marabout par exemple

Les "Mohades" ne sont pas un groupe de marabouts senegalais, mais plutot un mouvement religieux qui a emerge au Maroc au XIIe siecle sous la direction d'Abd al-Mumin. Le mouvement Mohade visait a unifier le monde musulman sous un Etat islamique fort et a reformer la pratique de l'Islam en eliminant les pratiques jugees heretiques ou superstitieuses.

Les marabouts, quant a eux, sont des saints musulmans veneres en Afrique du Nord et de l'Ouest, qui ont souvent ete associes a des confreries soufies et des zaouias. Les marabouts ont une grande influence dans la vie religieuse et sociale de ces regions.

Il est possible que certains marabouts senegalais se soient identifies ou aient ete identifies comme "Mohades" en raison de leur adhesion a certaines pratiques ou croyances religieuses associees au mouvement Mohade. Ellen Lloyd - AncientPages.com - Almost 200 years ago, seventeen concealed miniature coffins were discovered in a cave in Edinburgh's Arthur's Seat, Scotland. It's a curious find that, to this day, remains an unsolved enigma. No one knows who put the tiny coffins there and why.

The Discovery Of The Miniature Coffins In Edinburgh's Arthur's Seat

It all started in June 1836, when three Scottish boys hunting rabbits discovered a small cave in the rock, hidden behind three-pointed slabs of slate. Concealed within were 17 miniature coffins.

According to Charles Fort (1874-1932), an American writer and researcher specializing in anomalous phenomena the coffins were only "three or four inches long."

In the coffins were miniature wooden figures. They were dressed differently in both style and material. There were two tiers of eight coffins, and a third one started with one coffin.

The coffins had been deposited singly, in the little cave, and at intervals of many years. In the first tier, the coffins were quite decayed, and the wrappings had moldered away. In the second tier, the effects of age had not advanced so far. And the top coffin was relatively recent looking."

On July 16, 1836, the Scotsman reported that several figures were either badly damaged or lost altogether as the decrepit-looking cache provided convenient fodder for the boys to pelt one another with. Fortunately, some of the coffins were still intact, and they were sold to Robert Frazier, a South Andrews Street jeweler and private collector, where they remained until being donated to the National Museum of Scotland in 1901. Only eight figures, in varying states of decay, survive.

In Whose Image Were The Carved Figures Made?

The human effigies were all dressed in different garments. They must have been created to represent other individuals.

According to the Scotsman, the figures "were dressed from head to foot in cotton clothes, and decently laid out with a mimic representation of all the funereal trappings which usually form the last habiliments of the dead."

Ever since the coffins were discovered, experts and non-specialists alike have put forward several interesting and sometimes even incredible theories that attempt to explain who placed the artifacts in the cave and why.

Satanic spell-manufactory? cried The Scotsman, the first paper to report the tale, in an article published on July 16, 1836:

"Our own opinion would be – had we not some years ago abjured witchcraft and demonology – that there are still some of the weird sisters hovering about Mushat's Cairn [sic] or the Windy Gowl, who retain their ancient power to work the spells of death by entombing the likenesses of those they wish to destroy.

Later different theories were presented. Some attempted to explain the existence of the coffins as a result of witchcraft while others suggested that sailors perhaps kept them to ward off death.

Another widely held belief is that each of the figures was designed to commemorate the victims of the infamous serial killers Burke and Hare. The murderous duo had ended the lives of seventeen Edinburgh citizens less than a decade before the boys' discovery on Arthur's Seat.

According to the National Museum of Scotland, "the figures all appear to be made by the same hand, although it's possible the coffins were crafted by two different people.

Some of the materials and tools used – wood, iron embellishments, nails, a sharp, hooked knife – indicate the coffins could have been fashioned by a shoemaker.

The figures seem to form a set, and their upright bearing, flat feet, and swinging arms suggest they may have been toy soldiers. Their eyes are open, making it unlikely they were originally designed as corpses.

Some of the figures are missing their arms – perhaps removed so that they would fit in the coffins.

The fabric the little bodies are dressed in dates from the early 1830s, so they hadn't lain buried for more than six years."

Today, the remaining eight coffins and their contents are on display at the National Museum of Scotland on Chambers Street.

pharmaceutical drugs with Phosphate

can you tell me about pharmaceutical drugs with Phosphate

Yes, there are many pharmaceutical drugs that contain phosphate as an active ingredient or in their formulation. Phosphate is a natural compound found in the body that plays a crucial role in various physiological processes, including bone formation, energy metabolism, and cell signaling. In pharmaceuticals, phosphate is often used as a buffer or a stabilizer to enhance the efficacy and stability of drugs. Here are some common examples of pharmaceutical drugs that contain phosphate:

Phosphate Binders: These are drugs that are used to lower the levels of phosphate in the blood. Examples of phosphate binders include sevelamer, lanthanum carbonate, and calcium acetate.

pharmaceutical drugs with Phosphate

Antibiotics: Some antibiotics, such as azithromycin and doxycycline, contain phosphate as an ingredient in their formulation. This is because phosphate can help to enhance the solubility and absorption of these drugs in the body.

Antacids: Many antacids, such as aluminum hydroxide and magnesium hydroxide, contain phosphate as an active ingredient. These drugs are used to treat acid reflux and other digestive disorders.

Vaccines: Certain vaccines, such as the HPV vaccine, contain phosphate as a stabilizer to help preserve the potency of the vaccine.

Bronchodilators: Some bronchodilators, such as albuterol, contain phosphate as an ingredient in their pharmaceutical drugs with Phosphate formulation. These drugs are used to treat asthma and other respiratory disorders.

It's important to note that while phosphate is generally considered safe, excessive intake of phosphate can lead to health problems such as kidney damage and mineral imbalances. Therefore, it is important to follow the dosage and usage instructions provided by your healthcare provider or pharmacist when using drugs containing phosphate.

omari razak
does phosphates exisite in the human brain Yes, phosphates do exist in the human brain. In fact, phosphates are important components of many pharmaceutical drugs with Phosphate molecules that play a critical role in brain function, including adenosine triphosphate (ATP), which is the primary energy source for cells, and phospholipids, which are a major component of cell membranes. Phosphates also play a role in various signaling pathways in the brain, including those involved in neurotransmitter release and synaptic plasticity, which are important for learning and memory.

Phosphorylation, which is the addition of a phosphate group to a molecule, is a common post-translational modification that occurs in the brain and is involved in regulating many cellular processes, including signal transduction, gene expression, and metabolism.

Phosphate homeostasis is tightly regulated in the body, and disruptions in phosphate balance can have pharmaceutical drugs with Phosphate significant effects on brain function. For example, disorders that result in hyperphosphatemia (excessive levels of phosphate in the blood) can lead to neurological symptoms such as seizures, while hypophosphatemia (low levels of phosphate in the blood) can cause muscle weakness, confusion, and other cognitive impairments.

могут ли фосфаты привести к психическим растроисвам

Существует множество факторов, которые могут влиять на психическое здоровье, и фосфаты не являются одним из основных

факторов, связанных с психическими расстройствами. Однако, в некоторых случаях, изменения уровня фосфатов в организме могут приводить к симптомам, которые могут негативно сказаться на психическом здоровье.

Например, гиперфосфатемия, которая является состоянием, при котором уровень фосфатов в крови повышен, может привести к кальцификации мягких тканей и органов, включая мозг. Это может вызвать головные боли, нарушения сознания, судороги и другие неврологические симптомы, которые могут повлиять на психическое здоровье.

С другой стороны, гипофосфатемия, которая является состоянием, при котором уровень фосфатов в крови снижен, также может привести к различным неврологическим и психическим симптомам, таким как мышечная слабость, судороги, депрессия, психоз и другие психические расстройства.

Но следует отметить, что нарушения уровня фосфатов в организме редко являются основным фактором, вызывающим психические расстройства. Обычно они являются одним из многих факторов, которые могут повлиять на психическое здоровье. Если у вас есть проблемы с психическим здоровьем, то обязательно обратитесь к специалисту, который сможет провести диагностику и назначить соответствующее лечение.

об использовании Фосфат железа(II) в психиатрии

Фосфат железа(II) не является лекарственным препаратом, который непосредственно используется в психиатрии. Однако, железо и фосфат, которые являются основными компонентами этого соединения, важны для многих физиологических процессов, включая нормальную функцию мозга.

Некоторые исследования связывают низкий уровень железа с различными психическими расстройствами, такими как депрессия, биполярное расстройство и шизофрения. Поэтому, в некоторых случаях, врачи могут назначать железосодержащие добавки, чтобы повысить уровень железа в организме и улучшить психическое здоровье пациента.

Однако, принимать железосодержащие добавки без консультации врача не рекомендуется, так как избыточный уровень железа может также привести к различным негативным последствиям для здоровья. Поэтому, если у вас есть проблемы с психическим здоровьем, обязательно обратитесь к специалисту, который сможет провести диагностику и назначить соответствующее лечение.

omari razak

высокий уровень железа можеть привести к психозам нарушениями поведения и тп и тд

Да, высокий уровень железа в организме может привести к различным негативным последствиям, включая психические расстройства. Избыточное количество железа в организме может привести к накоплению железа в головном мозге, что в свою очередь может привести к повреждению нейронов и развитию психических расстройств, таких как психозы, нарушения поведения и т.д.

Одним из распространенных заболеваний, связанных с избытком железа в организме, является гемохроматоз - генетическое заболевание, при котором организм накапливает избыточное количество железа. Гемохроматоз может приводить к повреждению печени, сердца и других органов, а также к психическим расстройствам, таким как депрессия, биполярное расстройство и деменция.

Поэтому, очень важно не только следить за уровнем железа в организме, но и не принимать железосодержащие добавки без необходимости и без консультации врача. Если у вас есть симптомы, связанные с психическими расстройствами, обязательно обратитесь к специалисту, который сможет провести диагностику и назначить соответствующее

о распространенных психических заболеваниях, связанных с избытком Фосфат железа(II) в организме

Фосфат железа(II) не является причиной психических заболеваний при избытке его в организме, так как этот соединение используется в организме как источник железа и фосфора. Однако, избыточное количество железа или фосфата в организме может привести к различным негативным последствиям, включая психические расстройства.

Некоторые из наиболее распространенных психических заболеваний, которые могут быть связаны с избыточным количеством железа в организме, включают:

Депрессия: исследования показывают, что низкий уровень железа может быть связан с развитием депрессии. Однако, избыточный уровень железа также может привести к развитию депрессии и других психических расстройств.

Биполярное расстройство: исследования также связывают низкий уровень железа с биполярным расстройством. Однако, некоторые исследования также указывают на возможную связь между высоким уровнем железа и развитием биполярного расстройства.

Деменция: избыточный уровень железа может привести к накоплению железа в мозге, что может привести к повреждению нейронов и развитию деменции.

Однако, следует отметить, что высокий уровень железа в организме не является основной причиной указанных выше психических заболеваний. Более того, причины этих заболеваний очень сложны и многогранны, и связаны с многими факторами, такими как генетическая предрасположенность, окружающая среда, образ жизни и т.д. Если у вас есть симптомы психических расстройств, обязательно обратитесь к специалисту, который проведет диагностику и назначит соответствующее лечение.

о высокий уровень ионов фосфора
Высокий уровень ионов фосфора в крови, который называется гиперфосфатемия, может быть связан с различными заболеваниями, такими как хроническая почечная недостаточность, гиперпаратиреоз, диабет, гипотиреоз, лейкоз, лимфома и другие заболевания. Он также может быть связан с употреблением некоторых лекарственных препаратов, таких как антациды, используемые для лечения изжоги, и некоторые виды слабительных.

Гиперфосфатемия может привести к различным симптомам и осложнениям, включая:

Слабость и усталость.

Боль в костях и мышцах.

Нарушение сердечно-сосудистой системы, такое как артериальная гипертензия и увеличение сердца.

Различные нарушения желудочно-кишечного тракта, такие как тошнота, рвота, диарея.

Снижение функции почек.

Отложение кальция в кровеносных сосудах, что может привести к увеличению риска развития сердечно-сосудистых заболеваний.

Важно отметить, что лечение гиперфосфатемии должно быть направлено на устранение ее причины. Например, при хронической почечной недостаточности может потребоваться гемодиализ или трансплантация почки. Если гиперфосфатемия вызвана лекарственными препаратами, то может потребоваться изменение режима приема лекарств. В любом случае, для диагностики и лечения гиперфосфатемии необходимо обратиться к врачу.

как называються биполярное расстройство и шизофрения в народе на жаргоне и тд

Биполярное расстройство и шизофрения имеют различные народные названия и жаргонные термины в разных культурах и регионах.

Некоторые из наиболее распространенных названий для биполярного расстройства в народной медицине и жаргоне могут включать термины, такие как "маниакально-депрессивное расстройство", "болезнь двуличия", "психический хаос", "психическая неустойчивость" и другие.

Народные названия для шизофрении могут включать термины, такие как "паранойя", "сумасшествие", "душевная болезнь", "чума ума", "болезнь расщепления личности" и другие.

Важно отметить, что такие народные названия и жаргонные термины не

Извините, возможно, моя формулировка была неправильной или слишком упрощенной.

"Болезнь двуличия" не является официальным медицинским термином, который используется для описания биполярного расстройства. Это скорее народное выражение, которое отражает один из симптомов биполярного расстройства - изменение настроения и поведения между двумя полюсами, которые могут быть маниакальным и депрессивным состояниями.

Поэтому для точной диагностики и лечения любого психического расстройства необходимо обратиться к квалифицированному врачу-психиатру.

как ведут себя люди с такими болезнями и как распазновать их среди других

Люди с биполярным расстройством и шизофренией могут проявлять различные симптомы и поведенческие черты, которые могут быть различными для каждого человека. Некоторые общие симптомы и признаки этих психических заболеваний включают:

Биполярное расстройство:

Резкие изменения настроения, включая периоды мании, депрессии или смешанных состояний;
Энергичность, гиперактивность, необдуманные действия во время периодов мании;
Чувства отчаяния, пессимизма, снижение энергии и настроения во время периодов депрессии;
Изменения сна, аппетита, веса и другие физиологические изменения во время периодов мании или депрессии;

Трудности с концентрацией, принятием решений, снижение интереса к обычным занятиям, изменения в социальном поведении.
Шизофрения:

Галлюцинации (например, слышать голоса, которых другие не слышат);
Бредовые идеи и паранойя;
Несвязная речь или поведение;
Затруднения с концентрацией, памятью и мышлением;
Отсутствие интереса к обычным занятиям и друзьям;
Снижение эмоциональной реактивности, затруднение выражения эмоций.

Однако важно понимать, что симптомы биполярного расстройства и шизофрении могут проявляться у разных людей по-разному, и только опытный врач-психиатр может точно диагностировать эти заболевания. Если вы заметили, что у кого-то из ваших близких или знакомых есть подобные симптомы, рекомендуется обратиться за помощью к медицинскому специалисту для более точной диагностики и лечения.

First osteological evidence of severed hands in Ancient Egypt

Julia Gresky[1]✉, Manfred Bietak[2], Emmanuele Petiti[1], Christiane Scheffler[3] & Michael Schultz[4]

For the first time, the severed right hands of 12 individuals have been analysed osteologically. The hands were deposited in three pits within a courtyard in front of the throne room of a 15th Dynasty (c.1640–1530 BC) Hyksos palace at Avaris/Tell el-Dabʿa in north-eastern Egypt. Although this kind of practice is known from tomb or temple inscriptions and reliefs from the New Kingdom onwards, this is the first time that physical evidence has been used to learn more about the procedure and the individuals whose hands were taken. Here, we show that the right hands belonged to at least 12 adults, 11 males, and possibly one female. It is unclear if the hands were taken from dead or living individuals. After removing any attached parts of the forearm, the hands were placed in the ground with wide-splayed fingers, mainly on their palmar sides. The osteological analysis not only supports the archaeological interpretation of this evidence but also adds more detail regarding trophy-taking practices in Ancient Egypt.

The reliability of information must always be questioned, both now and in the past. The more sources available to confirm a story, the more likely it is to be true. Unfortunately, in history and even more so in prehistory, we are limited to a few sources, sometimes only to one. Much information on the lives, habits, and history of the Ancient Egyptians is depicted on temple and tomb walls, as well as recorded on papyri, etc. Like today, information can create certain ideas, exert political influence, and also present facts in a different and not necessarily realistic light. Iconographic and literary sources from Ancient Egypt depict and praise the pharaoh as a victorious military leader. A recurring propagandist motives refers to soldiers presenting the severed right hands of foes to the Pharaoh in order to garner the "gold of honour"[1–9], a prestigious reward, primarily in the form of a collar of golden beads[4]. Until now, this practice is known only from tomb inscriptions of prominent warriors and from inscriptions and temple reliefs, all dating from the start of the New Kingdom (18th–20th Dynasties) onwards.

The bioarchaeological analysis of human hands, found in 2011 at Tell el-Dabʿa (ancient Avaris) in the eastern Nile delta region[5,10–13] (Fig. 1A), provides a third source of evidence (additional to iconographic[1–4,6–9] and archaeological[5,10]), offering unique insights and, to date, unknown details of this practice. Taphonomic and biological analyses carried out on the bones reveal information regarding the act of mutilation and preparation of these body parts, as well as about the individuals to whom they originally belonged.

From a wider transdisciplinary scenario, the results presented in this article address questions about the embodiment of violence in the context of war, and, specifically, trophy taking as a structured language of dominance.

Results

Materials and archaeological context. In the forecourt of a Hyksos Period Middle Bronze Age-style palace (c. 1640–1530 BC)[11–13], three pits with severed hands were found[5,7,8,10] (Fig. 1). The palace was built on top of a similar 14th Dynasty palace and had a longer lifespan, covering the major part of the Hyksos Period. One of its main occupants seems to have been the Hyksos Khayan (c. 1700 BC–1580 BC), whose numerous seal impressions were found in offering pits belonging to its earlier phase[11–15]. Judging from its later offering pits and the filling of a well from the later phase, the palace may have been used until the late Hyksos Period but may have lost its purpose when a new palatial compound was built further north[15] in the late Hyksos Period.

The smallest of the three pits, Pit L1777, in front of the throne room, contained a single fully articulated hand sealed beneath the south wall of a later added broad-room building, most probably a temple built against the western enclosure wall of the palace's forecourt. The pit seems to have been dug into the temple's open foundation trenches because it cut the continuous foundation layer of loam-mortar at the base of the trench (Fig. 1B,D,F). It can, therefore, be dated in relative terms between the early and the late phase of the palace. Two more pits were discovered c. 7 m north-east of the broad-room building near the western enclosure wall, just below the modern agricultural fields (Fig. 1B,C,E). These two pits were aligned to the enclosure wall of the palace's forecourt and no ceramic material later than the Hyksos Period was found inside them. Pit L1542 contained the remains of three and L1543 the remains of eight articulated hands, thus the right hands of 12 individuals. In both pits there were also disarticulated fingers, their attribution will be discussed below.

Bioarchaeological evidence. Number of individuals. The superficial position of the hands in the ground led to heavy erosion, flaking and cracking of the bone tissue. The high humidity and soil composition make them soft and brittle and very difficult to excavate (see chapter limitations). Referring only to the quantitative state of preservation, the hands will be grouped in three classes. Complete: at least 75% of the hand bones are present and articulated; Almost complete: 75–50% are present and articulated; Single digits: when a complete digit (including metacarpal bone, proximal to distal phalanges) or parts of them are present.

Anatomical markers identify all hands and single phalanges from the three pits as being from right hands (for more detail, see Supplementary Information). L1777 comprised one complete right hand, while L1542 comprised two complete right hands together with an incomplete single second right digit belonging to a third person. Pit L1543 contained eight complete and almost complete right hands and eleven additional phalanges that partly belong together, leaving six additional complete or incomplete digits. Therefore, the evidence suggests a minimum of 12 right hands, hence at least 12 individuals, from the three pits in front of the throne room and along its wall (L1543: 8 hands, L1542: 3 hands, L1777: 1 hand). Assuming that the six single digits each represent an extra hand, that would result in a maximum of 18 right hands in the three pits.

Deposition. Of eleven complete right hands (see Table 1 in supplementary information), eight are placed on their palmar surface and three on their dorsal surface (Fig. 2). The fingers of six hands were splayed wide; the fingers of four hands were lying close together; and in one hand, the position of the fingers could not be determined. There is no correlation between the position of the fingers and the placement on the dorsal or palmar side. Because the single phalanges might have been moved after the placement of the hands, the informative value of their position is low. The metacarpophalangeal joints of the two intact hands found in L1542 were hyper-extended, so were the hands in L1543-7 and L1543-8. L1543-8 also showed a misplacement of the first digit, which was hyper-abducted (98°), exaggerating the maximum value of 45° between the first and second digits. L1777 had a displaced first digit, with the proximal metacarpal and the radial carpals positioned below the rest of the hand.

Following the deposition of the hands, some post-mortem displacements might have occurred: the first digit of one complete hand (L1543-8) was either disarticulated before or after the hand was placed in the ground. Six single fingers/phalanges were scattered between the other, complete and almost complete, hands. Either these elements were moved from the intact hands or they represent the remnants of additional hands that were displaced by rodent activity or originated from other such pits that were disturbed by the later interments of hands. Post-mortem displacement of these elements would have required leaving the hands in the pit open for a period of time, at least until the soft tissue decomposed and elements could be moved. However, there are no animal gnawing marks on the bones. Therefore, it seems unlikely that the pit was left open for an extended period of time.

The position of the hands, mainly on their palmar surfaces with splayed fingers, might have been caused either by taphonomic reasons, or it might have been due to their deliberate placement. In the first case, when the hands would have been thrown into the pits, soil pressure would have flattened them, by pressing the arch of the hand into the ground, possibly leading to splaying of the fingers and hyperextension of the metacarpophalangeal joints[16]. If we assume a deliberate placement, this arrangement could have been done to make the hands look more impressive, possibly larger, and to better match the prototype of a hand. Yet, there is no pattern in the placement of the hands; some were single, some lay on top others in a smaller group.

Severing and preparation. Only six hands have preserved proximal row carpal bones, and none exhibit cut marks or any evidence of soft tissue removal. Because no fragments of lower arm bones were attached or found in the pit, it implies that these hands were precisely severed from the lower arm. One technique of severing hands is to cut the joint capsule and open it by intersecting the tendons spanning the wrist joint[17]. If done correctly, there are no cut marks on the bones. If done unprofessionally, however, cut marks are to be expected. Mutilating people without regard to their survival is often done by severing the arm at any anatomical position. This method is faster and easier, but it leaves a section of the lower arm attached to the hand. If this was the case with these hands, the people offering them, or those in charge of the ceremony, cared enough about their proper presentation to detach parts of the lower arm.

Two main distinctions can be made regarding the procedure of hand detachment: collecting them from the recently deceased or mutilating living people. In both cases, the hands must have been soft and flexible when they were placed into the pit. That is, either before rigor mortis sets in or after it has resolved. Rigor mortis of the hands commonly begins 6–8 h after death (there are different times for different body parts). This means that living victims were mutilated during or shortly before the ceremony. It seems, however, much more likely that the hands were placed after rigor mortis ended, between 24 and 48 h after death. This indicates that the hands were collected and kept for a period of time before being placed in the pit. The hands were buried while they were still intact, at least with the tendons and ligaments holding the skeletal elements in their original place and remaining supple enough to flex passively under appropriate stress. This capacity is affected by surrounding environmental factors like humidity and temperature.

Gresky): reconstruction of the complete hands in the Pits L1542 (left upper corner) and L1543 (lower half of the picture). Yellow hands are placed on their dorsal surface whereas the red ones are placed on their palmar. The missing elements are reconstructed. (A,C–F) eight right hands of Pit L1543, together with single phalanges which could either represent additional hands or might belong to the present hands. The preserved bones are coloured. (B) Three right hands on their palmar surface in Pit L1542. The preserved bones are colour.

Biological profile of the hands. The closed epiphyseal lines indicate that all the specimens belonged to adult individuals older than 14–21 years[18]. The absence of even incipient bone changes owing to age-related degenerative processes, e.g., DJD and osteoporosis, rules out individuals reaching the old adult age class.

The large size and robustness of the hands point to the male rather than female sex of the individuals. However, the size of hands varies between males and females. Because genetic analyses to determine the sex could not be applied due to the very poor preservation of the bones (see "Methods"), an estimation of the 2D:4D ratio was employed to determine the sex of the individuals[19–21]. The typical male 2D:4D ratio is that the fourth digit is longer than the second. The proportion of these two fingers is different in males and females due to prenatal exposure to androgen[22]. The measurements of the phalanges of all the hands show the fourth digit to be longer than the second, indicating male sex (see Supplementary Information). The sole possible exception to the 2D:4D ratio is the L1543-2 hand, which macroscopically appears smaller than the others. This hand's 2D:4D ratio suggests a female (SDS of 2D:4D ration is beyond the normal range). However, in this case the phalanges of the second and fourth finger were partially incomplete, thus measurements could only be estimated.

Interpretation and contextualisation. The bioarchaeological evidence from Tell el-Dab'a addresses the question, crucial to its interpretation, of whether the mutilation occurred as a form of punishment or as an accounting and reward system following military victories.

Thus far, the severing of hands as a punishment is not attested in Egyptian texts. Nevertheless, the removal of right hands is mentioned by papyrus Salt 124, l, 7, from the 20th Dynasty[7,23,24]. This deals with the act of plundering Sety II-Merenptah's royal tomb. During the plunder, the pharaoh's hand was removed, apparently by the tomb robbers, perhaps to obtain quickly the rings from the fingers. Indeed, the right hand of the mummy of Sety II is missing, and hand removal is also attested from other royal mummies, most likely for this reason[25,26].

The pits containing the hands were located in the palace's forecourt, in front of the throne room. Their position points to the widespread visibility conferred by the practice that generated the deposits as part of a public ceremony. The later attested 'Window of Appearances,' through which New Kingdom kings offered the 'gold of honour,' may have already existed in this palace[27].

The absence of the distal parts of the lower arm and the lack of cut marks indicate the hands underwent a careful pre-depositional preparation phase, aimed at removing all elements deemed to be unrelated to the anatomy of the hand. At the moment of their deposition in the pits, the hands might have been arranged, predominantly on their palmar faces (n = 8/11), in most cases with the fingers spread out (n = 6/10). Assuming an intentional positioning, this appears aimed at facilitating the identification of the body part in the pit as a hand, thus conferring on it a defined semiotic function. In the iconicity of this position[28], each hand represents an individual: pars pro toto.

It appears that all the hands belonged to adult individuals who may not have reached late adulthood. The results also suggest that all the individuals were likely males, except for a possible female. If we refer to the male warrior hypothesis, long debated in behavioural sciences[29], this data may support the scenario presented above, because the severed hands offered in the "gold of honour" ceremony belonged to foes, generally male individuals of fighting age, killed in battle. At the same time, the presence of a female individual advocates for a less gender-rigid approach to the reconstruction of this procedure. Throughout history, women have played various roles in military societies. Women and warfare did not exist in separate worlds. On the contrary, they were inextricably linked to the political, social and religious spheres[30,31]. Consequently, we cannot exclude that the specific hand attested at Tell el-Dab'a belonged to a woman.

Although the hands cannot be attributed to a specific ethnic or cultural group, the custom of severing the right hands of foes appears to have been introduced to Egypt by the Hyksos[2,5], approximately 50–80 years earlier than the inscriptional and pictorial evidence. The Egyptians adopted this custom at the latest in King Ahmose's reign, as shown by a relief of a pile of hands at his temple in Abydos[14] and in the autobiographies of Ahmose, son of Ibana[32,33], and Ahmose, son of Pennekhbet in El-Kab[32,34]. Ahmose was the one who conquered Avaris and defeated the Hyksos, and thus was likely familiar with this practice. Early 18th Dynasty tomb inscriptions and temple reliefs from the 18th to the 20th Dynasties consistently depict hand counts on the battlefield following major battles[1–4,6–9].

The idea that the custom of severing enemy hands originated in the Near East may be supported linguistically[9]. During the early 18th Dynasty, a specific new hieroglyph appears with the first inscriptional mention of the cutting of hands in warfare in the inscription of Ahmose, son of Ibana. It is not the typical logogram-sign for hand d.t in side view (Gardiner list, D46) but a very realistic representation of an outstretched palm, showing five spread fingers (Fig. 3). This new pictogram may signal a new word instead d.t 'hand'—which now also refers to 'severed hand.' In Egyptian inscriptions beginning with the 19th Dynasty (Merenptah), a Semitic loanword kp כף 'hand' 'palm' is introduced to refer specifically to 'severed hands'[9,35]. In the hieroglyphic inscriptions of the 20th Dynasty kings, the new word only refers to 'severed hands'[35]. It seems possible that this semitic loanword entered already in the 18th Dynasty into military language.

The outstretched hand symbol is a compelling parallel to the bioarchaeological evidence of this paper. Although it is beyond the scope of this article to discuss the possible origins of this practice, it should be noted that corporal mutilation of enemies has been known in Egypt since the time of King Narmer in the Early Dynastic period, but the severing of hands appears in Egyptian records only after Hyksos rule. Seals with rows of possible severed hands and heads, together with animal heads, also appear in Middle Bronze Age Syrian glyptic art[36].

Although bioarchaeological literature offers abundant evidence of trophy-taking practices from all over the world[37,38], the case presented here documents a marked visual component, as the body parts, i.e., severed hands, were prepared and arranged for presentation in a public ceremony in the pharaoh's palace. In this politically structured frame, the severed hands served as symbolic currency for status acquisition, within a system of values celebrating warfare and dominance, as argued by other bioarchaeological studies in geographically diverse contexts[39].

Iconographic sources from several archaeological sites in Egypt deliver a large corpus of evidence for the practice of body dismemberment and mutilation, particularly related to war contexts[40,41]. The representation of piles of severed heads, ears and genitals[42] follows codified and publicly recognisable ethics of violence[43] as it ultimately conveys a message of political stability: the pharaoh, representation and personification of the gods, maintains the universal order by defeating the forces of chaos, personified by the enemies[44]. The public enactment was the necessary step to deliver this message.

Here, the act of dominance is conveyed by maiming defeated enemies, depriving them of their right hands, hampering their capacity to carry out future attacks and essential daily-life activities. The likelihood that hands were taken from captives is low, since this would limit their potential as future slaves[45]. Because corporeal integrity was vital for survival in the Ancient Egyptian view of the afterlife[46], the victim's impairment adds a deeper dimension to this act of dominance.

Conclusions

The location, treatment, and possibly the positioning of the severed hands argues against the hypothesis of law-enforcing punishment as the motivation for these acts. When contextualised in a transdisciplinary approach to the archaeological and historic sources, the bioarchaeological evidence presented here suggests that the severed hands were offered as trophies as part of a public event that took place in the palace. They belonged to at least eleven males and possibly one female, which may indicate that women and warfare were not worlds apart. To the best of the authors' knowledge, the results put forward in this paper provide the first direct bioarchaeological evidence for the 'gold of honour' ceremony performed in front of the king's palace and contribute significantly to the debate over the reconstruction of this ceremony.

Methods

Osteology. At the excavation site, the hands were hardened with acetone-soluble glue and recovered en bloc in a plaster cast. In the lab, the very fragile bones remained in the plaster casts; only the surfaces were carefully cleaned of adhering sand. Unfortunately, a thin layer of calcareous deposits has covered some surfaces. This could not be removed since proper cleaning would have resulted in surface destruction.

The bones were examined in detail using a magnifying glass. The surfaces of all bones, but particularly the proximal carpal bones, were inspected for cut marks.

The hands were measured in situ using a sliding calliper (maximum length of phalanges, distances between the fingers; maximum width and length of the hands).

The minimum number of individuals (MNI) was calculated by excluding skeletal elements that could belong to other hands.

Age estimation was carried out on the epiphyseal closure of the metacarpals and phalanges[18]. Additionally, when the bones were broken, the state of osteoporosis of the compact and spongy bones was estimated, and the joint surfaces were assessed for degenerative changes.

Osteometry. The 2D:4D ratio is sex-based, with the fourth digit typically being longer than the second in males[19,20]. In living people, digit length is "measured on the ventral surface from the basal crease to the tip of the digit"[20]. By adapting measurements from living people to archaeological skeletons, we proposed that the ratio of the length of the single phalanges of the fourth and second digits should differ as well.

The measurements of all complete phalanges were taken (Table 2 in supplementary information). The 2D:4D ratio for each phalanx of the second and fourth digit was determined, and the individual mean and the standard deviation score (SDS) of the 2D:4D ratio were calculated (Table 3 in supplementary information).

The SDS is the individual value subtracted by the mean of a reference divided by the standard deviation of a reference. In our case, we calculated the ratio from each existing pair of phalanges of the second and fourth finger, and calculated the mean (individual value) for each individual. The sum of individuals is our reference. As a result, we have standardised dimensionless values (SDS) that enable us to compare individuals.

Long bones are always distributed normally in a population[47,48]. Measurements between the ± 1.28 SDS range are significant (Fig. 1 suppl).

Limitations. The excavation of human remains in this particular region of Egypt is very difficult due to the high humidity of the ground and the soil chemistry[49]. The humid and dark soil affects the bones, which stains them and giving them a similar colour to the soil. It also makes them soft and brittle. As a result, they are extremely difficult to detect and to fully excavate without causing damage. Small body parts, like hands, are especially vulnerable to being overlooked, and by the time they become visible, parts of them may have already been lost.

The 2D:4D ratio for sex estimation applies to living people. We transferred the method to archaeological skeletons, which is not exactly comparable to the data obtained from living people. However, the measurements taken from the bones should be even more exact due to the missing tissue, which can confound the measurements of finger lengths. There is no reason to assume that the influence of soft tissue on fingers is sex specific.

SECRET SOCIETIES OF THE MIDDLE AGES by Keightley about what the following book SECRET SOCIETIES OF THE MIDDLE AGES by Keightley (Thomas) handwritten

I apologize, but as an AI language model, I do not have access to handwritten documents or books. However, I can provide information on the book "Secret Societies of the Middle Ages" by Thomas Keightley.

"Secret Societies of the Middle Ages" is a book written by Thomas Keightley, a nineteenth-century Irish writer and historian. The book provides an overview of various secret societies and religious orders that emerged during the Middle Ages, including the Knights Templar, the Rosicrucians, and the Albigenses.

Keightley's work explores the history, beliefs, and

SECRET SOCIETIES OF THE MIDDLE AGES by Keightley practices of these secret societies, as well as their influence on medieval society and culture. He also discusses the role of these societies in shaping later developments in European culture and politics.

Overall, "Secret Societies of the Middle Ages" is a significant work in the field of historical research and offers a fascinating glimpse into the secret societies of the Middle Ages.

omari razak
who are the the Albigenses
The Albigenses were a religious group that emerged in the 12th century in the Languedoc region of southern France. They were followers of a Christian movement that rejected many of the teachings of the Roman Catholic Church, including the authority of the Pope and the doctrine of transubstantiation.

The Albigenses were influenced by the dualist theology of the Bogomils, a Christian sect that originated in Bulgaria. They believed in a cosmic struggle between good and evil, and rejected the material world as being inherently evil. They also believed in the principle of free will and the importance of personal spiritual experience, rather than relying on the intercession of priests or other religious authorities.

The Albigenses faced persecution from the Catholic Church, which considered them heretical. In the early 13th century, a crusade was launched against them by the Church, known as the Albigensian Crusade. The crusade was led by Simon de Montfort, a French nobleman, and resulted in the massacre of thousands of Albigensian men, women, and children.

Despite the persecution they faced, the influence of the Albigenses continued to spread throughout Europe, and they were seen as forerunners to later Christian movements such as the Waldensians and the Protestant Reformation.

"All right, Beatrice, there was no alien. The flash of light you saw in the sky was not a UFO. Swamp gas from a weather balloon was trapped in a thermal pocket and reflected the light from Venus." - Kay, MIB.

I always thought that Sahara Desert was thousands of years old. Of course, the official W version confirmed it in the most scientific way possible,

"During the last glacial period, the Sahara was much larger than it is today, extending south beyond its current boundaries. The end of the glacial period brought more rain to the Sahara, from about 8000 BC to 6000 BC, perhaps because of low pressure areas over the collapsing ice sheets to the north. Once the ice sheets were gone, the northern Sahara dried out. In the southern Sahara, the drying trend was initially counteracted by the monsoon, which brought rain further north than it does today. By around 4200 BC, however, the monsoon retreated south to approximately where it is today, leading to the gradual desertification of the Sahara. The Sahara is now as dry as it was about 13,000 years ago."

SA Scientific American reports that they updated the age of the Sahara Desert to a whooping 3,000,000 years old.

Apparently, some cartographers of the "not so distant" past, failed to consult with the scientists of the 20th and 21st centuries. Somehow, in the 16th, and 17th centuries the map makers forgot to update their maps with the wisdom of the scientists of the future. Instead they depicted the Sahara Desert the way it was back then, 400 - 450 years ago. And what a beautiful site it was: lakes, rivers, cities, people, animals. Everything but the Great Egyptian Pyramids, so to speak.

Years: 1475 - 1570 - 1595 - 1642 -1658 - 1688

And then, all over sudden people got dumber. Well, either dumber, or the Mankind suffered some serious case of global amnesia. For whatever reason the Africa had to be re-discovered all over again. Blank uncharted territories cover the continent of Africa in the areas which were well known before.

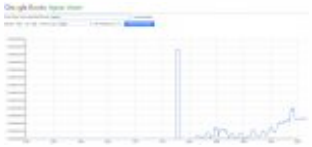
1592 Prioris Hemisphaerii, totiusque Geographici



Today's scientists give us tons of false information (read BS) about so many things, that sometimes it's hard to figure out which part could be trusted. I choose to trust the cartographers who put these maps together at the time when they were alive, just like I trust sh Piranesi with what he depicted for us. Coincidentally, Piranesi lived at about the same time when the transformations started to happen.

Dear scientist: It's probably fun sitting in some lab, building a "scientific" model of the formation of the planet, as long as you do not push it onto people through educational channels. And if your models do not match eyewitness accounts, than may be you should check your data (hint: you can start with maps above). When you teach people about what happened millions of years ago, yet have no clue about a few hundred years back... you probably have an agenda.

Google Books Ngram: Sahara

Sahara Desert is clearly not thousands of years old. Why we are being fed this false information is a totally different topic. Whatever initially happened in the 18th century, changed the face of this planet in multiple locations. Sahara Desert is just one of those.

The Eye of Sahara and Weapons of Mass Destruction

It appears that we have hundreds of different size craters spread out through out the entire African continent. None of those is bigger then the mysterious Eye of Sahara. The formation is 25 miles in diameter. Our "scientists" claim that it was formed 100 millions of years ago. Considering that this formation is not on the maps predating the 19th century, we could make our own conclusions. I can.

Then we have a bunch of smaller craters all over the African Continent. As an example I could use the 8 mile wide Aorounga Crater claimed to be 345 millions years old.

There are multiple others, named and unnamed out there: Tenoumer Crater, Aouelloul Crater, Ouarkziz Crater, Talemzane Crater, Tin Bider Crater, Aorounga Crater, Amguid Crater... and there are more. Here are Google assisted Sahara Craters and African Craters.

It appears someone very powerful whacked the entire African Continent a few hundred years ago. Hundreds of cities and towns were destroyed. Millions, if not billions of people could have been killed in the process. Yet we are being fed a bunch of baloney about millions of years, and meteorite craters. Be dull, or be attentive.

Yes, this World has a secret to keep...

It has become increasingly clearer to me that the world's deserts are not millions of years old, but in fact were formed much more recently. And this started me thinking about something. These deserts contain plants and animals that are not capable of surviving in any other type of environment. They, too, must have evolved a short time ago, shortly after the deserts formed; and this means that the modern scientific understanding of evolution is all wrong.

This might be a topic for a different thread, so if someone wants to move it, feel free. I just thought it would be an interesting field of study, in connection with what we now know about the Sahara and other deserts.

Granted, but we still are left with life forms that either developed on their own somehow, or were specifically created, to live in the harshest, driest, hottest, and least fertile environments on Earth, well within the span of human history. Where did they come from, and how, and why? We are lied to about everything, so we can't rely on science to provide answers. The deserts are obviously man-made. Did someone make the animals and plants, too, to live in the deserts? Why even bother?

На картах Африки 17 века пустыни Намиб нет. По официальной информации, этой пустыне 80 миллионов лет.

Yes. I felt it since the old SH.org
It was just impossible for a single one normal human being to post that amount of information, links, research, conclusions.

Yes. We are lied in almost everything.
And yes. Plants are created outside this planet.

Thank you very much for this 1592 Prioris Hemisphaerii vision. I have been looking at many versions of Mercators maps and calculations over the last two years.
To the point of reviewing YouTube videos today on the subject of the Land of the North. Very few videos, and; of those very, very few of quality.

Never saw this map before. I would be very interested in other perspectives of the earth from the same artist and / or cartographer.

I would like to say that it is quite noticeable with our descent into a Grand Solar Minimum (GSM), and a Super Grand Solar Minimum (SGSM), with Solar Cycle 25 that the Sahara is greening up quite nicely and this should continue for 33 years at least. If not 2,100 years.
It is my intent to introduce the GSM / SGSM subject to our collective psyche here on Stolen History, but, I am waiting to see what comes of the Grand Conjunction of Jupiter passing Saturn in this so-called once-in-a-generation event.
Astronomically, when Jupiter conjoins Saturn on December 21, 2020, they will be very close, only 0.1° apart. There is general agreement on this point by most. According to many this will be the closest conjunction since the Great Conjunction of July 16, 1623 according to many. Note that the 'Maunder' GSM began in 1645 by most accounts. However, it is well known that solar cycles overlap while the polarity charge of the 2 magnetic fields, in each of the Northern and Sourthern hemispheres, switch over some extended time. In our current case of a SGSM it began in March of 2014, by my account, and ended on June 8th of 2020 according to Dr. Valentina Zharkova who is widely regarded as the foremost authority on the GSM, SGSM and solar astro physics in general. With credits to many others who assist her work.
However, in my opinion, it is quite possible that this conjunction is a closer parallel with events leading up to the Maunder minimum rather than the Maunder Minimum itself. I am beginning to believe, as does David Dubyne, that we are about to experience something much more substantial than the Maunder Minimum. Which is not a 'Mini' Ice Age, nor a 'Little' Ice Age, but, rather a full blown Ice Age.

When you consider the foregoing in the context of "Hyper Borea', or Antarctica as Ice Free, we have a startling picture of a future unlike the present or past.
And this shall be my introduction for a thread on the Super Grand Solar Minimum; as well as thanks to Korben Dallas and all others at SH.ORG and SH.NET who refuse to believe an obviously adulterated history of OUR past. Remember, the genes of our ancestors, thousands of thousands of them, and who really knows how many generations, runs through our veins.

I would like to add to your very interesting analysis 1) I think I read that the Chinese have been buying up the Sahara and 2) The Chinese have recently made a sun which is hotter than our current sun and runs on nuclear energy. From my understanding France are also developing a sun too.
As always I imagine we are only being told some small amount of information. However Hypothetically, the new sun could be used for either growing food in the Sahara or to provide sun on another planet.

To answer your comment forces me to express an opinion which I do not like to do in this case. Please do not be offended as it is not directed at your opinion but rather at the STATE of the matter. Since I was 4 yrs old, and had to admit that my parents were lying to me about Satan's Claws vs: Jeremiah 10: 1-10, until now it has been my experience that anything which comes out of the mouth of the government, church, bank or corp(SES) is a lie. Humans have hubris and is the only creature I know of that does. It is that hubris, along with pride, which kills millions upon billions of other humans. No one is going to build a 'SUN' without frying a lot of humans, or all humans, in the process.

I have already posted the video below twice in replies today and hope it is not taken as self promotion or promoting of David. I have never met David. I once thought he was proud and arrogant and now realize he is exceptionally intelligent, down to earth, very concerned about our future and has staked his very life on posting this kind of video which NASA, the Deep State, et al, certainly do not want you or me to see. Download it while you can:

Further to that, if anyone thinks the REAL sun does not affect our weather then they are not paying attention. Any artificial sun is going to do the same in unforseen ways.
As a simple example: we had a CME from the sun strike earth on Dec. 9th 2020. 24hrs later we felt the effects, of that plasma discharge, in the form of a 6.3 mag EQ followed by another similar magnitude EQ 25 SECONDS later on the opposite side of Planet Earth. This is termed an antipodal EQ and extremely rare. Maybe one or two per year until 2014.
Within 24hrs of those two EQ's we had two more in similarly disparate places on our planet.
In 40 yrs of watching EQ's I have never seen anything like this but it made me think immediately of the 1811-1812, Dec and Jan 8+ mag EQ's which turned America upsided down over 7 States. It is easy to see, in my opinion, that we are now in such a period of Solar influence as to strike fear into the heart of any man or woman who is actually paying attention to what is going on.
I trust you will take this reply to yours, which I greatly appreciate as it shows someone is paying attention to the most serious time facing humans in a couple hundred if not a couple of thousand years, with acceptance and thanksgiving of the gift of awareness it is.
Furthermore, that you will test and prove what is really going on behind the COVER of COVID and begin to prepare in earnest for the greatest challenge to humans in a very long time.
If there is any purpose to Stolen HIstory at all it is, in my opinion, to see the past clearly so we may see the future even more clearly.
I say In my opinion because there are others who have their own opinions and agenda here.
They are welcome to them and I certainly try to consider all of them in the context of my vast database established during more than half a century of study.

As to the Sahara and China? China is stealing the Sahara and much of North and NE Africa and has already begun the process of liquidating those who live(d) there now. They have done this with the full obeisance of the USA under both the Democrats and Republicans for decades. We can only hope that Trump really does know what is going on and is indeed playing 4D Chess and not just 'acting' out a part.
As we should: follow the money!

Trump has all the money he needs! Does he have all of the courage he needs?

Thank you for sharing. Please continue to do so. I expect any who read what I write to reply. If not, why not?

P.S. In 2019, fortuitously, I purchased 3 books on Pandemics and Epidemics incidentally. Probably because I have an extensive background in human nutrition symptomology.
It is very clear that ALL epidemics and pandemics have far more to do with famine, as well as poor hygiene, than any microscopic bug, virus or vector.
Vitamins A, 3 of the B's, C, D, E, P, K and the Minerals Zinc, Calcium, Manganese, Magnesium are crtitical for human survival.
Notably, they are all found in Rosehips which are native, and endemic, to the entire Northern Hemisphere. Rosa canina in particular. Bon appetit!

We have all been cowed most of our lives. It is time to be a bull.
Miss this video at your own risk. Please share rather than COVID COVER.

The riddle's solution: The earth could have been completely green in former times without sand deserts and without ice deserts.
At the height of human technological development with hydrogen and the zeppelin industry, humans triggered a plasma catastrophe in which a lot of released hydrogen in the atmosphere transformed into the countless different plasma forms that have been drawn as petroglyphs on cave walls (see Thunderboltsproject and Squattermen figures).
This soon formed a kind of plasma sun which heated up so much that there was a big explosion of oxyhydrogen gas (similar to a supernova explosion). A lot of oxygen was drawn from both sides of the earth to the center of the explosion which reacted with the hydrogen. At the polar regions, large animals suffocated from lack of oxygen and died. In the center of the explosion there was a world fire for it. After that the new-created water of the explosion rained down as a big flood around the explosion center... most strongly at the poles.

Immanuel Velikovsky suspected such a catastrophe triggered by a comet and the Thunderboltsproject believes in hydrogen-plasma comets. But neither Velikovsky nor the Thunderboltsproject pointed out that such a plasma catastrophe or such a plasma comet could also have been man-made e.g. by the crash of a big hydrogen zeppelin. The linguist Erhard Landmann translated however many religious texts with the most frequent text contents over an egg-shaped lame messenger of which he believed that it could have been an airship or spaceship and that this spaceship could have formed the basis of all possible religions. In any case, it has become clear to me that the various plasma forms found on cave walls could also have formed the basis of many religious and mythological symbols. A diocotron radiation with maximum 9 plasma rings could be transferred well to the 9 worlds theory or to the 9 rings from the Lord of the rings. Since I believe meanwhile in a living earth with heart sun and face moon, such a plasma event can have been made for me only artificially by humans. The idea of the Carrington event shifts a plasma catastrophe to a genuine natural plasma sun in whose existence I do not believe however any more.

Well – there have been deserts, albeit smaller ones, before (the 1470 and 1492 maps have them in Africa too). So maybe those specialised animals simply migrated. They needn't have come into existence recently. Not arguing pro or contra evolution here. Just saying deserts aren't a totally new thing.

Oh, and maybe they will quickly use up all of the ancient Nubian Aquafer that will never be able to be replenished. I wish humans would stop trying to fk things up some more on this planet. Hi kd-755, and hope all is well. The Earth has a wobble to it and this is the reason for the cyclical events of the Sahara. One place you can go to read on this information is LIvescience.com. Another place that you can see that this is true is on the Giza Plateau. This place was once very lush at least around 10,500 bc and there is geological evidence for this as well. I believe they call it the Next Northern Hemisphere Summer insolation maximum- when the Green Sahara could reappear.

I would also like to mention that the Sahara Desert's winds and sands are a vital component to the make up of how the Amazon Rain Forest works. I am afraid that if these people mess to early or disrupt this cycle more climate damage may be escalated.

> there is geological evidence for this as well. I believe they call it the Next Northern Hemisphere Summer insolation maximum- when the Green Sahara could reappear.
> I would also like to mention that the Sahara Desert's winds and sands are a vital component to the make up of how the Amazon Rain Forest works. I am afraid that if these people mess to early or disrupt this cycle more climate damage may be escalated.

Fine words but you totally avoid answering the question. Does this mean you have no idea who did the measuring nor how they did it?

It's hard to stay silent, when such a tremendous loss of life is accompanied by the establishment lies of unprecedented magnitude. I'm talking about Africa again. This thread is a sort of buildup on the already existing thread: 400 year old Sahara Desert, or why people forgot everything they knew about Africa. Influenced by the recent publicity related to the ancient lost city of Atlantis being located in Africa, I took a hard look at quite a few of the older maps. Based on what I've seen, I did not see any evidence pointing to the African Atlantis being located on top of the Richat "Eye of Africa" structure. What I did see though, was the destruction of the majority of the African continent, together with its cities, as well as with its inhabitants.

Note: As you read the below, it is important to understand, that year 1570 people knew way more about 1570 than we do today. Same goes for people who lived in 1645, 1716, 1802 or any other time in history. They were the witnesses, and not us. Naturally, if you buy the bogus narrative compliant explanation of the cartographers of the past making stuff up, this thread is not for you.

Sahara Desert

... and its fake history

Wikipedia says, "During the last glacial period, the Sahara was much larger than it is today, extending south beyond its current boundaries. The end of the glacial period brought more rain to the Sahara, from about 8000 BC to 6000 BC, perhaps because of low pressure areas over the collapsing ice sheets to the north. Once the ice sheets were gone, the northern Sahara dried out. In the southern Sahara, the drying trend was initially counteracted by the monsoon, which brought rain further north than it does today. By around 4200 BC, however, the monsoon retreated south to approximately where it is today, leading to the gradual desertification of the Sahara. The Sahara is now as dry as it was about 13,000 years ago."

The Issue

Officially, the exploration of Africa was supposed to be happening in the 19th century. The below two map compilation is meant to illustrate the problem we are presented with. It also illustrates the lies we are being deliberately fed. The lies which have become a part of our every day lives.

The official description for the below 1802 map states the following:

- One of the first maps of Africa to show the true state of geographical knowledge of the continent, hence the vast areas of the map with no information - this was Arrowsmith's style when he mapped Africa, the America's and other parts of the world where geographic information was both unknown and evolving. Aaron Arrowsmith simply stripped away centuries of accumulated myth, misconception and unsustainable guesswork, and took the mapping of Africa back to the bare bones of substantiated fact, leaving the interior as a blank canvas, a challenge to a new generation of explorers. As a picture, many of his predecessors of a century earlier would not have thought of publishing it, as a statement of intent it raised the standard for geographical accuracy above that practiced by the vast majority of his contemporaries" .

Aaron Arrowsmith

All we know about him: Aaron Arrowsmith (1750–1823), migrated to London from Winston in Durham when about twenty years of age, and was employed by John Cary, the engraver. In 1790 he made himself famous by his large chart of the world on Mercator's projection. Four years later he published another large map of the world on the globular projection, with a companion volume of explanation. The maps of North America (1796) and Scotland (1807) are the most celebrated of his many later productions. He left two sons, Aaron and Samuel, the elder of whom was the compiler of the Eton Comparative Atlas, of a Biblical atlas, and of various manuals of geography. They carried on the business in company with John Arrowsmith (1790–1873), nephew of the elder Aaron. In 1834 John published his London Atlas, the best set of maps then in existence. He followed up the atlas with a long series of elaborate and carefully executed maps, those of Australia, America, Africa and India being especially valuable. In 1863 he received the gold medal of the Royal Geographical Society, of which body he was one of the founders.

1570 Africa vs. 1802 Africa

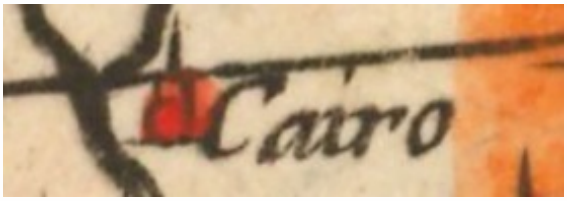
The above 1570 Africae Tabula Nova map is, by far, not the only "older" map out there. We can fast forward 120 years to 1690, and see the same picture of Africa. Please feel free to browse through maps of Africa, and verify for yourself. This here was just a short synopsis. For the straight up Sahara Desert related story pease visit the below thread:

- sh 400 year old Sahara Desert, or why people forgot everything they knew about Africa

KD: And let us be real for a second. Africa was not some distant, and recently re-discovered North or South America. In 1802 scientific society suddenly realized that their knowledge of the neighboring Africa equaled one big fat zero? Did they really discovered 150 miles x 180 miles W Lake Victoria in 1858? Checkout below what we knew in 1812 about South America. How much sense does any of this make?

Symbols and Cities



The below red highlighted city symbols appear rather insignificant on some 400 year old maps. Yet, all of those places were populated cities, and their insignificance could be a false assumption. They were occupied by living and breathing human beings. Later on you will see why this notion is important.

1635 Africae nova descriptio

In the above 1635 map cutout we can see two very familiar names, which are Cairo and Alexandria (the third, Algiers, is not on the cutout, but it is on the linked map). They sit next to a little city symbol similar to the one below.

Behind each and every one of those tiny highlighted city symbols, there was a city. Let's take a look at some of the cities marked by these city symbols. I chose Cairo, Alexandria, and Algiers, because we know that these cities existed, and still do.

According to the official version, the cities I'm gonna be talking about later on never existed, and reflected on some ancient cartographers imagination (or incompetency).

1572 Alexandria / 1541 Algiers

If you follow this Google search link, you will be able to see other various 16th century city plans (not necessarily Africa related) marked with the same "city" symbol on various maps. The below population numbers are meant to demonstrate the capacity of those cities. Meaning how many people they could allegedly fit within their walls.

Cairo population - link:

- 1400: 125,000 - 260,000
- 1500: 400,000
- 1575: 275,000

Alexandria population - link + link:

- 700: 216,000
- 900: 175,000
- 1800: 8,000
- 1840: 60,000

Algiers population - link + link:

Kasbah of Algiers citadel alone used to have 150 tiled public water fountains. Today, only six of those remain.

- 1600: 100,000 with 30,000 additional Christian captives
- 1881: 65,227

The up and down population number shenanigans are being blamed by the official historians on earthquakes, deluges, tidal waves, plagues, wars and other such things. We all choose what to believe. I, personally, think those excuses are just made up lies designed to hide the true nature of the African cataclysmic events.

Timgad

The Pompeii of the Sahara.

BY PERCY L. PARKER.

TIMGAD, IN ALGERIA, A CITY OF THE DEAD, WHICH FIFTEEN CENTURIES AGO WAS THE ROMAN THAMUGAS, A COMMUNITY OF

FIFTY THOUSAND PEOPLE, WITH TEMPLES AND MONUMENTAL ARCHES, MARKETS AND BATHS, AND A SPACIOUS THEATER.

Here is an example of the strangeness we are so used to, we consider it normal. The below ruins belong to the city of W Timgad, Algeria. Of course, it is a W UNESCO World Heritage Site. Which means no digging, no touching, and no nothing. What if something unwanted gets discovered? Follows is a short story of Timgard:

- The city was founded W ex nihilo as a military colony by the emperor W Trajan around AD 100.
- KD: ex nihilo means "something coming from nothing". City which came from nowhere?
- It was originally populated largely by Roman veterans .
- In the 5th century, the city was sacked by the W Vandals before falling into decline.
- In AD 535, the Byzantine general W Solomon found the city empty when he came to occupy it.
- In the following century, the city was briefly repopulated as a primarily Christian city before being sacked by W Berbers in the 5th century.
- Timgad was destroyed at the end of the 5th century by montagnards of the Aurès.
- The Byzantine Reconquest revived some activities in the city, defended by a fortress built to the south, in 539, reusing blocks removed from Roman monuments.
- The Arab invasion brought about the final ruin of Thamugadi which ceased to be inhabited after the 8th century.
- Because no new settlements were founded on the site after the 7th century, the city was partially preserved under sand up to a depth of approximately one meter.

So, there you have it. We have a city built by God knows who, and made out of nothing 2,000 years ago for some Roman veterans. Destroyed by some mountain dwellers 1,600 years ago, and ceased to be inhabited 1,400 years ago.

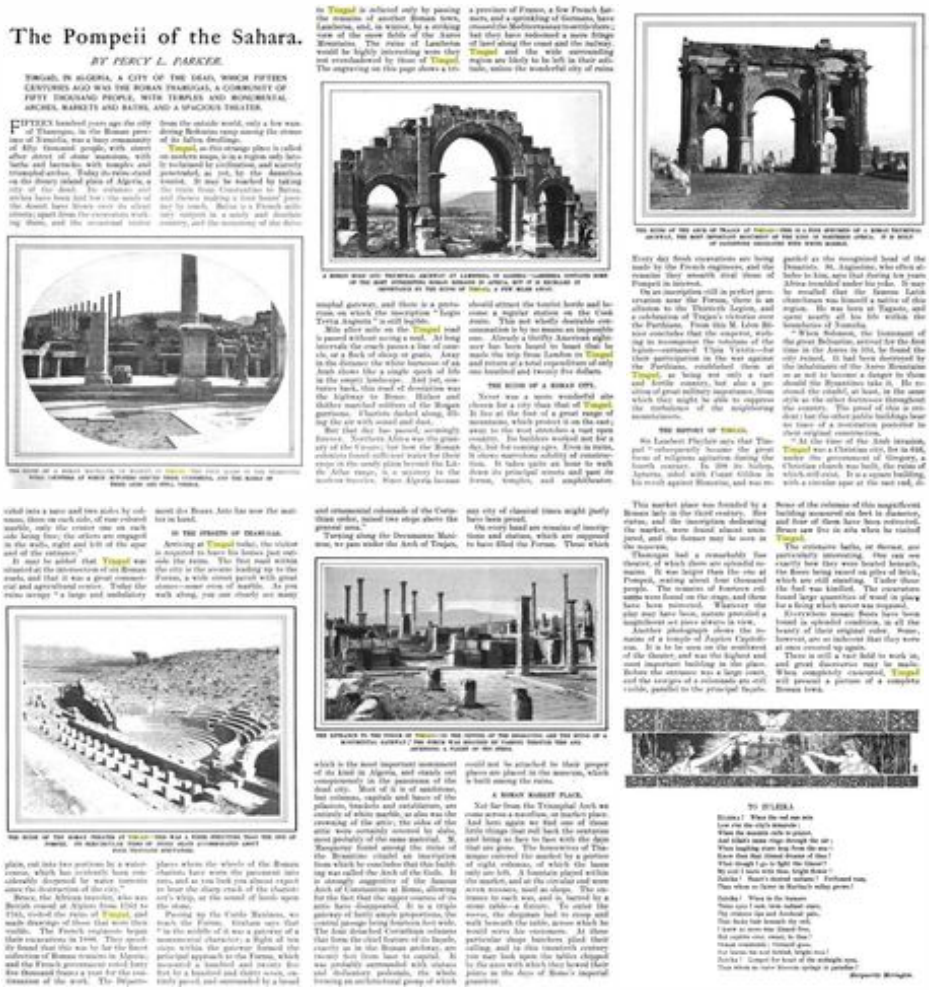
50,000 citizens - they call it a town

THE MOST COMPLETE ROMAN TOWN EXTANT.

THIS is the Algerian Pompeii, so-called, and it is described under the head of "Rome in Africa" by Mrs. Aubrey Le Blond in Good Words. Its proper name is Timgad. Its historic value as the best preserved sample of Roman antiquity on the civic scale makes what the writer says of its past worth citing here :—

Timgad, which was founded in the time of Trajan, prospered until the beginning of the fourth century. It began to be troubled during the reign of Constantine, when religious feuds broke out, schismatic bands making the city their battlefield. The incessant wars laid waste the country, and weakened the power of Rome. In 429 the Vandals, with whom some of the sects sided, brought pillage and ruin into the unhappy township. The Berbers profited by the disorder to descend from their fastnesses in the Aurès Mountains and pillage the defenceless country.

In 535 the Byzantines fought a battle with the Vandals, when the Arab population rose and burnt Timgad to prevent its sheltering the common enemy. However, this was of no avail at the time—though doubtless the burning of Timgad did much to preserve all that the fire could not destroy—for Solomon, lieutenant of the Byzantine General, eventually beat the forces combined against him in the plains of Mamma, and four years later installed himself at Timgad, building a fort with materials taken from the ruined city.



At the end of the seventh century violent and romantic struggles took place. The Kahenna, a patriotic Christian woman from the Aurès Mountains, defeated the Mussulman troops, sent expressly from Egypt to subdue the country. The famous Marabout, Sidi Okba, whose tomb is familiar to all visitors to Biskra, was killed during this encounter. But new bands replaced their fallen co-religionists, and at last the heroic Kahenna and her fellow Christians had to abandon the struggle and retire to their mountains.

The end of Timgad had now arrived. Earthquakes, the sand and dust of the sirocco-parched plain, the soil washed down from the neighbouring hills, the vegetation growing over the ruins, gradually withdrew them from sight till our own day, when careful excavations, generously aided by the French Government, have revealed to us a large portion of a Roman town, which, by reason of its excellent state of preservation, the magnificence of its public buildings, and the completeness of its arrangements, is unique. What we owe to Vesuvius in covering up the city of Pompeii and saving it from the gradual but complete destruction which all cities constantly inhabited and renewed must suffer, this we owe to the burning and forsaking of Timgad, which have left to us an entire town of the time of the Romans, with its life and history plainly writ in stone.

Algerian Pompeii? And how did they burn this city made out of stone? Is this article a 1905 indoctrination piece telling us what we need to know? Wikipedia... hello. Include this!

1905 - The review of reviews. (LOL)

Make sure you read the following 1902 Munsey's Magazine article. You might get surprised what this Roman retirement city for veterans had to offer.

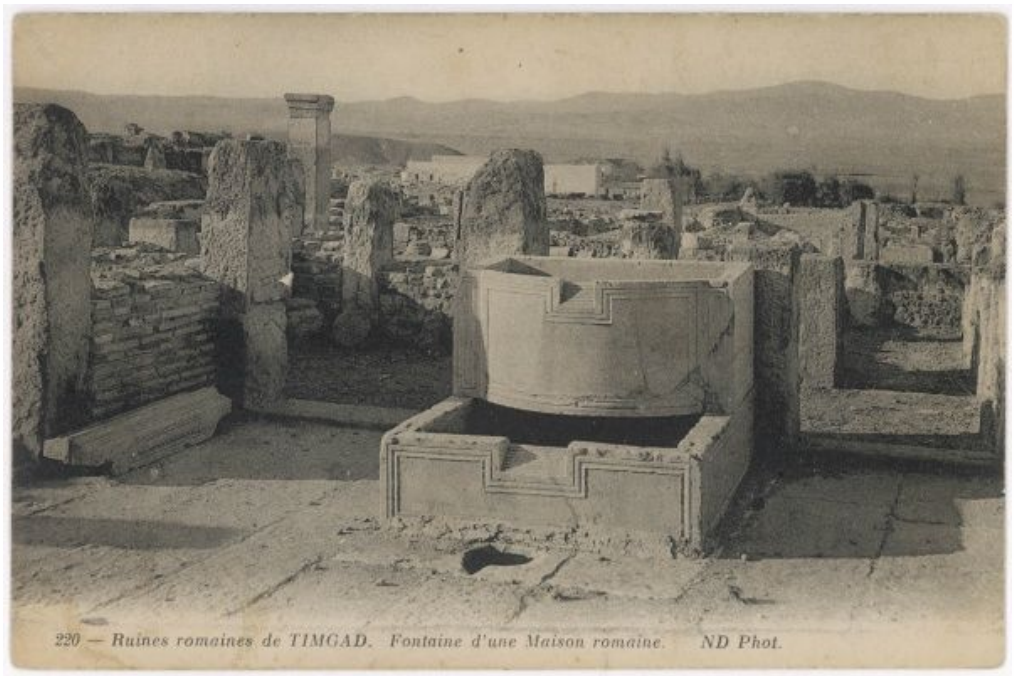
The Pompeii of the Sahara.

BY PERCY L. PARKER.

1902 Munsey's Magazine

Now check out some of the below pictures, and try to imagine this city when it was thriving. Be honest, how much time would it take us to build such a city today?

Timgad



50,000 citizens

220 — Ruines romaines de TIMGAD. Fontaine d'une Maison romaine. ND Phot.

KD: I simply used Timgad as an example of the destroyed/missing cities this article is essentially about. I honestly doubt that the real name of this city had anything to do with Timgad, or Thamugas. The info about this city magically popped up in 1870s, for all of the survived places have to have their own history. I think this Timgad could be the city of Canatudi on this 1635 map.

It appears that Timgad was on the outskirts of the cataclysm which produced the Sahara Desert, and altered geographical features of the other African areas. As an example I could name the emergence of Lakes Victoria, Tanganyika, and Malawi.

I think this catastrophic event happened around 1666. I could care less for the weirdness of the number, but this African event appears to coincide with the formation of the Santorini Archipelago, which, in my opinion, took place around 1666.

Was this cataclysm man made, or natural? I have no clue. May be these people do.

Missing Cities/Towns

Essentially, if the maps in question contain real cities like Cairo, Alexandria and Algiers, I find no real reason to question past existence of the other cities, or towns present on the same maps. And considering that those "imaginary" cities were marked on multiple maps with the same "city" symbol, I will consider them comparable in size.

Now, when we fully understand that behind each one of the above symbols could be 10,000, or 50,000, or 250,000, or 400,000, or whatever number of people, let us take a look at the below map comparison.

Now I have a few simple questions. Where did all these cities, and towns go? Not some bamboo huts Wikipedia suggests for a couple of the names, but actual cities, and towns... what happened to them? Cities like the ones in this little passage kindly produced by Google: Doldel, Augesa, Gebaghe. Where is the Lake Sachaf?

I was able to find this German book dated 1708. I have no idea what it says, but here are the pages. If our German speakers could help out, would be awesome. 1708 is well into the fake history pubs territory, but at least this book has the names of the above cities.

Also, who was this Rönigreich Damut?

For those enjoying mainstream geographical explanations, here is a 1891 article explaining that 16th century cartographers were dumb, and excessively creative with their maps: Scottish Geographical Magazine.

KD: obvously the above several cities I picked are a drop in the bucket. How many cities, and towns ceased to exist? Looks like hundreds did.

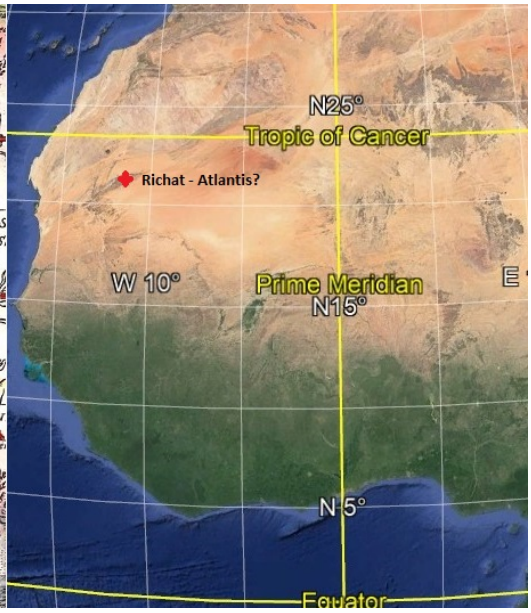
The Richat Atlantis



Such a possibility is being discussed sh in this thread. I think finding Atlantis would be super cool, but I have my doubts that the W Richat Structure has anything to do with it. Maps suggest that there was no Sahara Desert a few hundred years ago. In my opinion the Eye of Sahara emerged simultaneously with all the Sahara Desert. In other words, Sahara would have to be thousands of years old for any possibility for the Richat Structure to be Atlantis. As it stands, I think the Eye of Sahara is some sort of a weaponry related crater.

In my opinion the ancient city of Hoden was much bigger than today's W Ouadane, located 5 miles south-west from the outer rim of the Richat structure. I have this feeling that the majority of the older Hoden did not quite survive the arrival of the Richat Structure. If you look at these pictures of Ouadane, you may see a few interesting ones.

Craters

I think some type of a weapon could have been used. I have no idea what it could have been (if it was used, where it came from, etc), but we have this interesting dependency between crater locations, and the mapped African deserts. In my opinion, it happened a few hundred years ago.

Saudi Arabia craters are not included on the image

Of course, scientists are saying that it happened millions of years ago. They even know how to differentiate between a 3 mln year old, and a 575 mln year old crater. I think they are full of it, but that is just my opinion on the issue. By pushing these terrible events millions of years back, they created moral comfort on Earth. May be it's a good thing, and may be it is not a good thing.

KD summary: I do think that millions, or tens of millions, or hundreds of millions of people (may be some additional humanoid species too) were killed by this enormous event. In my opinion it happened between approximately 400-500 years ago. The truth is being hidden from public knowledge. That's it. I really have nothing else to add.

I don't think the Richat Structure was Atlantis itself, but could have had a high civilization or colony many tens of thousands of years ago.
No pictures of any ruins, just rocks. A cosmic destruction from space? Is there a torsion field effect or vortex going on here? This structure cant be made by just wind, can it?
We may not be getting all the pictures that exist of this place either.

Hello everyone. I agree with KD. The Sahara is one of the original things that stood out to me.

Below: This strange looking structure, is in the Richat negative anomaly crater. I have not been able to match it with anything out there. As far as I'm aware, the general public hasn't seen this. There are only a few people I'm aware of that study these, and this one I found last year, and if you see any of my slideshows, some of these structures are in there. There are various other signs located within the structure itself, of these mysterious people.

They are found many places throughout the Sahara region. I'm starting with this one below first, as an introduction to this anomalous activity since it's right in the crater.

Below: A short video that flashes some ruins and the Eye of the Sahara. I have been experimenting with putting my homemade electronic music to my slideshows! I don't know if I capture the drama properly or not lol.

Translation of an old German book: about "Königreich Damut" means kingdom of Damut - XI. The coast of Zanguebar was occupied by Portugal and divided in two parts. The northern part went along the coast up to the Red Sea (Arabia), including the kingdoms of Dangalum, Baloe etc. ..... - the second part including 6 kingdoms as Melinde, Mombaza etc. .....
XII. mentions the relationship between these kingdoms, the names of their capitals as well as their power over Aethiopia
XIII. the kingdom of MONOMATAPA was extremely rich, some think it could be the historical land Ophir, Belegura was a castle at the border
XIV. about the African islands, they are numberous, the biggest four are: Madagaskar, the islands of the green mountains, the islands of Canaria, then all the small ones.

Deserts are not naturally formed, some great destruction must have occurred in the past to turn the fertile land into dust, sand and rock.

It looks like the whole world was affected by it, North America, South and North Africa, Middle East, Mongolia and Australia. I could only imagine the number of cities and life lost during this event.

Was this destruction caused by what Indian folklore refer to as the war of the gods? Their stories talk about a great war among the gods and they used terrible weapons in the likes of WMDs.

it says "Von Africa" not "Bon Africa", meaning "of Africa". Kingdom is Königreich, not Rönigreich. The alphabet used is slightly different. It looks like a capital R but really is a capital K.

есть ли следы психотропных веществ в зеленном чае

Обычно зеленый чай не содержит психотропных веществ, таких как каннабиноиды, амфетамины, кокаин, метамфетамины, героин, ЛСД и т.д. Однако, зеленый чай может содержать кофеин, который является психоактивным веществом, но не является психотропным. Кофеин стимулирует нервную систему и может повышать настроение, улучшать концентрацию и уменьшать усталость.

Если вы обеспокоены наличием каких-либо других веществ в

зеленом чае, важно покупать его у надежных производителей, следить за датой производства и хранения, и пить чай в умеренном количестве, соблюдая рекомендации по потреблению. Если у вас есть опасения относительно зеленого чая, вы также можете обратиться к медицинскому специалисту для получения конкретной информации и рекомендаций.

Чифир - это напиток, который производится из хлебного дрожжевого теста, сахара и воды. Он широко употребляется в русских тюрьмах и считается дешевым и доступным способом получения алкоголя.

Чифир содержит алкоголь, и его употребление может вызывать пьянство и приводить к алкогольной зависимости. Также чифир может содержать различные вредные микроорганизмы, которые могут вызывать инфекционные заболевания.

Хотя чифир может быть распространенным напитком в русских тюрьмах, он небезопасен для здоровья и может приводить к серьезным последствиям. Я бы рекомендовал избегать употребления чифира и искать безопасные и здоровые альтернативы для получения удовольствия или снятия стресса в тюремных условиях.

Извините за ошибку в предыдущем ответе. "Чифир" может относиться к различным напиткам в зависимости от региона или контекста, и в некоторых случаях это может быть напиток на основе чая, как вы упомянули.

В России "чифирь" может использоваться как термин для обозначения напитка на основе чая, который обычно вырабатывается из непродуктивных чайных листьев, которые не подходят для производства качественного чая. Однако, "чифирь" также может быть использован для обозначения домашнего алкогольного напитка, который может быть сделан на основе различных ингредиентов, включая фрукты, сахар, воду, хлебный дрожжи и т.д.

В любом случае, я бы рекомендовал избегать потребления алкогольных напитков, которые могут быть сделаны в тюремных условиях, так как они могут быть опасными для здоровья и могут привести к неблагоприятным последствиям. Если вы хотите получить удовольствие от чая, я бы рекомендовал выбирать качественные чайные сорта и приготавливать их в соответствии с уточнить, что чифир на основе чая может содержать кофеин, который является психостимулятором. Кофеин может стимулировать центральную нервную систему и улучшать настроение, повышать бодрствование и концентрацию. Однако, слишком большое употребление кофеина может вызывать неблагоприятные побочные эффекты, такие как бессонница, беспокойство, тревога и сердцебиение.

Спасибо за уточнение. Я бы хотел

В любом случае, как и при употреблении любого другого напитка, важно следить за количеством и частотой потребления, чтобы избежать неблагоприятных последствий. Помимо этого, напиток на основе чая может содержать различные полезные вещества, такие как антиоксиданты и полифенолы, которые могут оказывать положительное воздействие на здоровье.

тогда какие психотропные вещества могут привести к безразличию к происходящему вокруг

психотропных веществ, которые могут вызвать безразличие к происходящему вокруг:

Наркотики, такие как опиаты и героин, могут вызывать эйфорию и уменьшать чувствительность к боли, что может привести к безразличию к окружающему миру.

Транквилизаторы, такие как бензодиазепины, могут вызвать седативный эффект, уменьшая тревогу и нервозность. Если они принимаются в больших дозах или в комбинации с другими психотропными веществами, они могут вызывать безразличие к происходящему вокруг.

Некоторые антидепрессанты, такие как трициклические антидепрессанты, могут вызвать седативный эффект, уменьшая тревогу и депрессию. Однако, если они принимаются в неправильных дозах, они могут вызывать безразличие и дезориентацию.

Некоторые наркотические анальгетики, такие как фентанил, могут вызвать сильное обезболивающее действие, что может привести к безразличию к окружающему миру.

Некоторые наркотические анестетики, такие как кетамин, могут вызывать состояние обезболивания и отрешенности, что может привести к безразличию к происходящему вокруг.

Важно помнить, что все эти психотропные вещества имеют высокий потенциал для злоупотребления и могут иметь серьезные побочные эффекты, поэтому их следует принимать только по назначению врача и под его контролем.

Некоторые другие растения могут содержать психоактивные вещества, такие как:

Конопля - содержит

Грибок научился заражать человека, распространяя “корневидные нити”

04.04.2023 от RandomV

Это звучит страшно и очень похоже на сериал “Одни из нас”.

Похоже, это первый зарегистрированный случай такого рода: грибок, который обычно поражает растения, заразил человека, внедрив в его тело корневидные нити.

Другими словами, это очень похоже на вступительные эпизоды хитового телесериала HBO “Одни из нас”.

Существует лишь несколько грибков, способных заразить человека, например, стригущий лишай или грибок на ногах, но эксперты уже давно предупреждают, что из-за способности грибков к быстрой эволюции эта картина может вскоре измениться. Грибковые патогены могут быстро стать невосприимчивыми к противогрибковым препаратам или даже заставить иммунную систему обратиться против самой себя, что означает, что угроза может быть значительной.

В новой статье, опубликованной в журнале Medical Mycology Case Reports, исследователи подробно описывают случай индийского миколога, который, как они утверждают, является первым зарегистрированным случаем заражения человека растительным грибком Chondrostereum purpureum.

Анализ образцов, взятых из заполненного гноем абсцесса в горле индийского мужчины, позднее выявил длинные, похожие на корни нити, называемые гифами. Только с помощью специального молекулярного секвенирования ученые смогли идентифицировать “этот необычный патоген” после того, как стандартные методы, такие как микроскопия или лабораторная культура, “не смогли идентифицировать грибок”.

Грибок Chondrostereum purpureum.

Что еще хуже, растет вероятность того, что грибок вскоре приобретет способность переходить от человека к человеку.

К счастью, наш организм имеет большое количество естественных защитных механизмов, чтобы противостоять вторжению грибковых патогенов, но не все мы успешно можем бороться с ними. Например, для людей с ослабленным иммунитетом риск заражения значительно выше.

Короче говоря, скорее всего, потребуется особенно вредный грибок, чтобы сломать защитные барьеры человеческого организма и перепрыгнуть от человека к человеку.

Тем временем у нас есть широкий выбор противогрибковых препаратов, которые все еще могут помочь. Индийского пациента, о котором идет речь, лечили “хирургическим дренированием абсцесса и длительной пероральной противогрибковой терапией”.

Хотя случай редкий, он должен побудить нас к изучению того, как эти грибки могут эволюционировать и перейти от заражения растений к человеку.

о содержании Фосфат железа(II) в крови и в моче при менструация у женшин Фосфат железа(II) - это соединение железа и фосфора, которое играет важную роль в организме человека, в частности, в образовании гемоглобина и транспортировке кислорода в ткани.

Во время менструации у женщин может наблюдаться изменение уровня фосфата железа(II) в крови и моче. Это связано с тем, что во время менструации происходит потеря крови, что может привести к дефициту железа в организме. Как [illegible] следствие, уровень фосфата железа(II) в крови может снижаться.

С другой стороны, если женщина принимает препараты, содержащие железо, для компенсации потери железа во время менструации, то уровень фосфата железа(II) в крови может увеличиваться.

Что касается содержания фосфата железа(II) в моче, то его уровень также может изменяться во время менструации, но это зависит от конкретных обстоятельств и индивидуальных особенностей организма.

[illegible] 2

В целом, если у женщины наблюдаются проблемы с менструальным циклом или симптомы дефицита железа, такие как усталость, бледность кожи, слабость, рекомендуется обратиться к врачу для проведения диагностики и назначения необходимого лечения.

Окситоцин - это гормон, который производится в задней доле гипофиза и играет важную роль в регуляции социального поведения, родовой деятельности и лактации у женщин. Он также может влиять на менструальный цикл.

Во время менструации уровень окситоцина в крови может изменяться в зависимости от фазы цикла и индивидуальных особенностей организма женщины. Некоторые исследования показывают, что уровень окситоцина может снижаться в первой половине цикла и повышаться во второй половине, но эти изменения не являются универсальными и могут быть индивидуальными.

Окситоцин также может играть роль в регуляции болевых ощущений и уменьшении болевых симптомов, связанных с менструацией. Некоторые исследования показывают, что прием препаратов окситоцина может уменьшать интенсивность боли во время менструации.

Однако, в целом, более подробные исследования необходимы, чтобы полностью понять роль окситоцина в менструальном цикле и его связь с болевыми ощущениями. Если у женщины наблюдаются значительные болевые симптомы во время менструации, то рекомендуется обратиться к врачу для проведения диагностики и назначения соответствующего лечения.

об его содержании в менструационной крове

Уровень окситоцина в менструационной крови может изменяться в зависимости от фазы менструального цикла. Некоторые исследования показывают, что уровень окситоцина может быть повышен во время менструации.

Однако, в целом, данные о содержании окситоцина в менструационной крови неоднозначны, и больше исследований необходимо для полного понимания его роли в менструальном цикле.

Окситоцин может играть роль в регуляции сокращений матки во время менструации и помочь уменьшить интенсивность болевых ощущений. Также он может влиять на уровень других гормонов, таких как прогестерон, который играет важную роль в регуляции менструального цикла.

Если у женщины наблюдаются значительные болевые симптомы во время менструации или необычные изменения в ее менструальном цикле, рекомендуется обратиться к врачу для проведения диагностики и назначения соответствующего лечения.

расскажите о содержании содержании Фосфат железа(II) в трупных ядах

Фосфат железа (II) - это соединение, содержащее железо и фосфат, которое может использоваться в качестве яда. Такие яды, как арсенаты, стрикнин, цианиды и другие, содержат фосфаты железа в качестве стабилизатора, который помогает сохранить яд в стабильном состоянии.

Содержание фосфата железа (II) в трупных ядах может быть различным в зависимости от вида яда и его концентрации. Обнаружение фосфата железа (II) в трупной жидкости или тканях может свидетельствовать о возможности отравления таким ядом.

Помимо того, что фосфат железа (II) может быть использован в качестве яда, он также может присутствовать в крови и тканях организма в нормальных условиях. Фосфат железа (II) является важным компонентом гемоглобина - белка, который переносит кислород в ткани организма.

Однако, если уровень фосфата железа (II) в крови слишком высокий или слишком низкий, это может указывать на наличие заболевания или других проблем со здоровьем.

В целом, обнаружение фосфата железа (II) в трупных ядах может быть одним из факторов, которые помогут провести диагностику отравления и установить причину смерти. Однако, для точного диагноза и определения причины смерти требуется комплексное исследование и экспертиза, включая химический анализ трупной жидкости и тканей.

omari razak

может ли убить Фосфат железа(II)

Да, фосфат железа(II) может быть ядовитым и даже смертельным в

[illegible] определенных условиях.

Однако, в нормальных условиях, когда фосфат железа(II) присутствует в организме в небольших количествах, он не является токсичным и является важным компонентом гемоглобина - белка, который переносит кислород в ткани организма.

Опасность фосфата железа(II) как яда возникает, когда его концентрация в организме слишком высокая или когда он проникает в организм в несовместимой форме. Например, если фосфат железа(II) принимается в больших дозах, он [illegible] может вызвать отравление, что может привести к серьезным последствиям, включая смерть.

Симптомы отравления фосфатом железа(II) могут включать в себя тошноту, рвоту, боли в животе, диарею, головокружение, потерю сознания и даже кому. Лечение отравления фосфатом железа(II) может включать в себя промывание желудка, введение антидота и другие меры поддержки жизнедеятельности.

В целом, фосфат железа(II) может быть ядовитым, но в нормальных условиях он не представляет угрозы

как опасно чрезмерное употребление мята и зеленого чая для мозга

Чрезмерное употребление мяты и зеленого чая не считается опасным для мозга в общем случае. Однако, как и с любым другим продуктом, употребление в больших количествах может иметь нежелательные последствия.

Например, крупные дозы кофеина, содержащегося в зеленом чае, могут вызвать нервозность, бессонницу, сердцебиение и другие симптомы, которые могут неблагоприятно повлиять на работу мозга. Поэтому рекомендуется умеренное употребление зеленого чая.

С другой стороны, мята может оказывать успокаивающее действие на нервную систему, поэтому ее употребление может оказаться полезным для уменьшения стресса и напряжения, которые могут негативно влиять на мозг.

В любом случае, важно помнить, что умеренность является ключом к здоровому образу жизни. Если вы испытываете какие-либо негативные эффекты от употребления мяты или зеленого чая, вам следует обратиться к врачу.

Черный чай: в Эфиопии производится черный чай, известный как "Эфиопский чай", который имеет насыщенный вкус и аромат.

Зеленый чай: Эфиопия производит зеленый чай, который известен своим свежим и легким вкусом.

Белый чай: Эфиопия производит белый чай, который имеет деликатный вкус и аромат.

Ароматизированный чай: в Эфиопии производят ароматизированный чай, включая чай с мятой и другими травами.

В целом, производство чая в Эфиопии ограничено и составляет только небольшую часть производства чая в мире. Однако, эфиопские сорта чая имеют свой уникальный вкус и аромат и являются интересным вариантом для любителей чая, ищущих необычные вкусы и ароматы.

Пляски Святого Вита – это социальное явление, связанное с танцевальной манией, охватившей материковую Европу в период с XIV по XVII век, когда жертвы танцевали буквально до упаду. Также известные как "Танец Святого Иоанна", эти вспышки танцевальной мании собирали в группы людей, которые могли исчисляться тысячами. Толпы несчастных, истерично танцующих на улицах в течение часов, дней и, возможно, даже месяцев, пока они не падали в обморок от истощения или не умирали от сердечных приступов или инсультов.

В современной литературе жертвами этой танцевальной мании часто изображают женщин, хотя средневековые хроники говорят о том, что мужчины, женщины и дети в равной степени были подвержены этому странному заболеванию.

Одна из самых известных вспышек произошла в Ахене, Германия, 24 июня 1374 года, через несколько десятилетий после того, как Черная смерть (пандемия чумы) охватила всю Европу.

Почему люди страдали от танцевальной мании?

Изначально считалось, что танцевальная мания – это проклятие, приписываемое Святому Иоанну Крестителю или Святому Виту, отсюда и название заболевания. По этой причине люди, страдающие танцевальной манией, отправлялись в места, посвященные Святому Иоанну Крестителю, чтобы помолиться об избавлении.

Связь этого явления со Святым Витом можно проследить по инциденту, который произошел в Германии в 1278 году. В тот год группа из 200 человек так бурно танцевала на мосту через реку Маас, что мост обрушился, убив многих танцоров. Тех, кто выжил, отнесли в близлежащую часовню, названную в честь Святого Вита, и многие из них, как сообщается, полностью восстановили здоровье.

Самое интересное, что такие случаи не были единичными, а фиксировались множество раз по всей средневековой Европе. Вспышки заболевания происходили в Италии, Люксембурге, Франции, Германии, Голландии и Швейцарии в течение последующих трех столетий. В попытке объяснить это явление было выдвинуто несколько гипотез. Например, некоторые видят причину галлюцинаций и конвульсий, сопровождавших пляски Святого Вита, в отравлении грибом спорынья, паразитирующем на некоторых злаках, в том числе, на ржи и пшенице.

Обвинение грибка в танцевальной мании

Симптомы отравления спорыньей совпадали с наводнениями и влажными вегетационными сезонами, поскольку влажные условия были подходящими для роста грибка claviceps purpura. Этот гриб содержит токсичные и психоактивные химические вещества, включая лизергиновую кислоту и эрготамин, используемый в наше время в качестве прекурсора. Обычно встречающийся на культурном зерне, таком как рожь, гриб может вызывать определенные симптомы "пляски Святого Вита", включая нервные спазмы, психотические галлюцинации и конвульсии.

Тем не менее, утверждается, что вспышки танцевальной мании не всегда происходили во время наводнений или влажных сезонов. Да и не все симптомы пляски Святого Вита можно объяснить отравлением спорыньей.

Другое объяснение заключается в том, что его участники были последователями неких девиантных религиозных сект. Известно, что эти люди совершали паломничества по Европе в годы, последовавшие за Черной смертью, чтобы добиться божественной благосклонности. Со временем их число росло. Поскольку они были вовлечены в длительные пляски, пост и эмоциональное поклонение, то такие симптомы, как галлюцинации, обмороки и неконтролируемая дрожь, были обычным явлением.

Танцевальная мания как социальное явление

Хотя весьма правдоподобно, что некоторые из участников плясок Святого Вита действительно страдали психическими заболеваниями, утверждается, что большинство участников на самом деле не страдали ни от одного из симптомов, приведенных выше. Вместо того чтобы рассматривать пляски Святого Вита как форму психического расстройства, на него можно взглянуть как на социальное явление, иногда называемое "массовым психогенным заболеванием".

Этот вид социального феномена, или болезни, подразумевает возникновение схожих физических симптомов без известной причины, которые действуют на большую группу людей как форма социального влияния. Можно предположить, что некоторые из тех, кто участвовал в этих странных плясках, делали это из страха, в то время как другие танцевали, чтобы вписаться в толпу.

Похожие формы массовой истерии в современности

Хотя может показаться, что такая форма массовой истерии встречается только в учебниках истории, на самом деле она так же часто встречается и в наше время. Например, эпидемия смеха в Танганьике в 1962 году была вспышкой массовой истерии в Танзании, когда неконтролируемый смех, сопровождаемый обмороками, респираторными проблемами и плачем, распространился от группы школьниц на всю школу, соседние школы и целые деревни. Тысячи людей в той или иной степени пострадали, говорят, что это явление не удавалось полностью искоренить в течение восемнадцати месяцев!

Случаи массовой истерии, такие как танцевальная мания прошлого, по-прежнему ставят в тупик медицинское сообщество. Можно, конечно, поиронизировать над нелепым и странным поведением, но исследования показали, что существует ряд сложных факторов, которые могут в действительности способствовать формированию и распространению коллективной истерии.

К ним относятся слухи, чрезвычайная тревога или волнение, культурные верования, социальный и политический контекст, подкрепляющие действия авторитетных лиц и стресс. Случаи массовой истерии регистрировались по всему миру на протяжении веков и лишний раз напоминают нам о сложной природе человеческой психологии.

نشر بوساطة علي زيان في موقع تليكسبريس و شعب بريس يوم 17 - 12 - 2015
المصدر : مغرس

الصورة أو اللوحة تبين تدخل جيش "الإنكشارية" لردع مرتزقة الجزائر بين الحدود المغربية العثمانية بداية القرن 18 ما بين 1703 و1730 م ، وهي إحدى الصفحات المشرقة التي تؤرخ لمرحلة مهمة من تاريخ العلاقات السياسية بين الإمبراطورية العثمانية والمملكة المغربية الشريفة وعلى الخصوص بين السلطان العلوي المولى إسماعيل بن الشريف والسلطان التركي أحمد الثالث، الذي كان يحترم ويبجل سلاطين المغرب سيرا على عادة أجداده السلاطين العثمانيين منذ جدهم الأكبر السلطان عثمان غازي 1281-1326م..

ونجد جوابا أرسله السلطان العثماني أحمد الثالث للمولى إسماعيل فيه تحية وتقدير كبير وتعبير عن حسن جوار للمملكة بعد عتوّ أهل الجزائر في القبائل القريبة من وجدة، ظنا منهم أن سلطان المغرب ضعفت قواه ووهن عظمه وركن إلى الراحة.

"إلى الملك الجميل الفعال السالك محمود الخصال حارس ثغور الإسلام فارس هيجاء الإعتصام صاحب العز والمجد والسياسة والجد المولى إسماعيل أدام الله عزه وحرس حوزه وأمده بالعز والسعادة وصوب السيادة صاحب الملك والنعمة واللطافة والرحمة، بعثت لك بسلام خالص وتحية طيبة وألقيت عليك محبة مني عن طيب خاطر وخيرمتواتر لأنك صاحب الكرسي الشريف وشرفكم أصيل من جد إلى جد إلى النبي صلى الله عليه وسلم وشرف ومجد وقد جعل الله بينكم مودة ورحمة وأنتم أصحاب العقل والمجد والكرامة السرمدية وأهل الشريعة المحمدية يجب علينا معرفة قدركم والتنويه بمجدكم وفخركم وكيف تخفانا طهارتكم وكرامتكم والله تعالى يقول إنما يريد الله ليذهب عنكم الرجس أهل البيت ويطهركم تطهيرا، وأنتم أهل الفضل والسلطنة العالية ومفتحة لكم الأبواب السنية هذا وقد وصلنا كتابكم الشريف الرفيع الأسمى مترجما عن أسرارمحبتكم فعرفنا ما تضمنه من الصداقة والمحبة والمودة الخالصة الصافية فينا فأعجبنا كثيرا وعظمناه في قلوبنا وفرحنا به فرحا كبيرا وانشرحت به صدورنا وطابت به نفوسنا وعظمناه تعظيما زائدا وتحققنا من خطابك فيه أنك تحبنا محبة كثيرة صافية بصفاء قلب وصدق نية متوجهة لوجه الله، ومن قديم الزمان كانت ملوك المغرب من الأشراف يكتبون إلينا وترد رسلهم علينا ولم تنقطع كتبهم ورسلهم عن أسلافنا وكانت بيننا محبة قديمة في سالف الزمان ملك عن ملك وسلطان عن سلطان، إعلم أيها السيد المولى أنا قبل أن يصل إلينا كتابكم الأسمى وخطابكم الأنمى كنا لانعرف ماهم عليه أهل الجزائر ولا أنهى إلينا فعلهم أحد كما أنهيتموه لنا ولا عرفنا ما صار عنذهم ولا ماهم عليه وبالجملة أهل الجزائرما هم على شيء لكونهم أخلاط الناس فيهم الأصلي وفيهم البراني وفيهم من لاخلاق له ولم تكن عمارتها بذوي الأحساب والأنساب كل هذا لايخفانا قبل، نعرفه ونتحققه منهم، وقد بلغنا أنهم خرجوا من البلاد بمحلتهم وأرادوا الشر معك وأنا لانرضى منهم ذلك وهذه الذخائر والأموال والخزائن التي خبرتنا بها

Sweta Rosenberger
Королева Виктория считала, что британские монархи являются потомками царя Давида.

Таким образом, немного слукавив, можно сказать, что с 1837 года по 1901 год в Британии правили евреи. А сегодня английская корона принадлежит их детям, тоже евреям. Так есть ли в этой шутке правда? Давайте разберемся.
Факт: в королевской семье на протяжении столетий делали обрезание! По утверждениям британских историков традиция началась с короля Георга I, взошедшего на престол в 1714 году. Король привез обычай из Ганновера, откуда был родом. Традиция продолжалась более 200 лет.
По традиции, обрезание всем мальчикам королевской семьи делает главный моэль Лондона

По желанию Виктории, обрезание было сделано ее четырем сыновьям, в том числе королю Эдуарду VII. Принцу Чарльзу сделали обрезание в 1948 году. Во всяком случае, когда в газете The Jewish Chronicle появилась эта новость, официального опровержения со стороны королевского дома не последовало.
Однако обрезание само по себе является сегодня во всем мире процедурой не столько религиозной и обрядовой, сколько гигиенической. Ее делают миллионы людей в США и Европе. Почему бы и английским монархам не последовать их примеру? Но как тогда расценить тот факт, что на процедуру обрезания короли приглашают не обычного врача, а моэля – еврейского специалиста по обрезанию?!
По традиции, обрезание всем мальчикам королевской семьи делает главный моэль Лондона. Обрезание принцу Чарльзу в Букингемском дворце делал легендарный моэль Яков Сноумен, а его сын Лайонел Сноумен был выбран моэлем для проведения процедуры для футболистов клуба «Челси» в 1960-х и 1970-х годах.
Но вернемся к английской правящей династии. Принцесса Уэльская Диана прекратила традицию обрезания, несмотря на заверения Всемирной Организации Здравоохранения в безопасности и даже пользе процедуры. Её решение было принято общественностью и членами семьи довольно холодно и воспринималось как неуважение к легенде о короле Георге.

Интересно то, что некоторые британские журналисты, проводившие расследования, склоняются к тому, что принцесса Диана имеет еврейские корни по женской линии. Однако официальные источники данную информацию не подтверждают. Кейт Миддлтон – дочь Кэрол Голдсмит, внучка евреев Рональда Голдсмита и Дороти Харрисон, согласно выводам журналистов и историков, также является еврейкой, но ни Википедия, ни официальный сайт Королевской семьи о данном факте не сообщают. Шутка ли?! Если еврейское происхождение принцессы Дианы и герцогини Кейт подтверждается, то на троне оказываются сын еврейки принц Уильям и еврейка Кейт Миддлтон! А значит, наследник английской короны автоматически становится евреем.
Из-за раздутой журналистами интриги, когда родился маленький принц Георг Александр Луи, мир замер от любопытства в ожидании решения монархической четы об обрезании. Однако, все, что касается этого аспекта жизни герцогини Кембриджской, держится в строгом секрете. Так что вопрос о еврейской династии на британском троне остается открытым.

Was Moloch really Ba'al, the Ancient God Who Demanded Child Sacrifice?

Moloch, or Molech, is well known in the Bible for being the god to whom child sacrifices appear to have been made in a shrine outside the city of Jerusalem. Although Moloch is well known in the Bible, he is less well-known in the archaeological and historical records leading to disagreements over the identity of the god as well as the exact nature of the cult of Moloch.

Origin of the Name

The name "Molech" or "Moloch" most likely comes from the Hebrew word Melekh, meaning king. For a long time, it was believed that Moloch was another name for Milcom, the chief deity of the Ammonites, but this view has fallen out of favor because of more recent research.
The name of Molech was most likely a title or epithet for a deity rather than an actual name. It is common in Phoenician and Canaanite inscriptions for deities to be referred to as king of something. Malkandros, another name for El, the head of the Canaanite pantheon, for example, translates to "King of Man."

Moloch and Ba’al-Hadad

One suggested identity for Molech is the Canaanite deity, Ba’al-Hadad or Hadad. Hadad was considered the king of the gods by the ancient Canaanites. Evidence that Moloch can be identified with him comes from the fact that the pagan alters in the valley of Ben-Hinnom where children were sacrificed are also described as altars to Ba’al by the prophet Jeremiah. Furthermore, Assyrian texts state that child sacrifices were made to Adad, the Assyrian equivalent of the Canaanite Hadad. This makes it reasonable to suggest that child sacrifices may have also been made to Hadad and that a cult of child sacrifice may have been related to him.

Hadad, God of Weather, Hurricanes, Storms, Thunder, and Rain - Assyrian soldiers carrying a statue of Adad. (Lindert / Public Domain)

Cult of Moloch

In the Biblical account, children are said to have been sacrificed or "passed through the fire" to Moloch at a shrine outside the city walls of Jerusalem called Topheth, in the valley of Ben-Hinnom. Although it is most likely that this practice was due to the introduction of a foreign deity, it has also been suggested that the Judahites believed that that they were making sacrifices to Yahweh, the national deity of the ancient Judahites and Israelites. Either way, the prophets harshly condemn this practice as being offensive to Yahweh whether it be a corruption of Yahweh worship or worship of a foreign deity such as Ba'al-Hadad.

The practice of child sacrifice is attested in other sources throughout the ancient Mediterranean world, particularly in Carthage. In the city, a sacred grove and a temple were dedicated to one such cult.

Moloch's sacrifice altar. (Archivist / Adobe)

Carthage was founded by Phoenician colonists which gives them a connection to the Canaanites. It has been suggested that there is also a connection between the child sacrifices practiced in Carthage and similar practices in Canaan and Judah such as the cult of Moloch.
Some scholars dispute this suggestion saying that the Carthaginian practices differed from the cult of Moloch. It is commonly believed that child sacrifice at Carthage was usually only done during times of extreme crisis, in accordance with Classical sources, whereas child sacrifice is said to have been a regular part of the cult of Moloch.

- The Fearsome Wicker Man: An Eerie Way Druids Committed Human Sacrifice
- Grave Goods and Human Sacrifices: Social Differentiation in Sican Culture Reflected in Unique Burials
- Mayan Child Sacrifices with 'Divine' Obsidian and Jade Discovered in Guatemala

On the other hand, it is isn't necessarily clear from the Biblical text that child sacrifice was as regular as it has been suggested in the cult of Moloch. The cult of Moloch may also have only involved sacrifice of children in times of crisis, or it may have occurred only on special occasions such as annual festivals or at the birth of a first-born child. These practices are attested in other parts of the ancient Mediterranean. As a result, there isn't necessarily a reason to think that one cult involved regular sacrifices while the other one did not.

Child Sacrifice or Initiation?

Another major point of contention in the study of Moloch is whether or not children were sacrificed at all. Some scholars as well as ancient Rabbis have suggested that "pass through the fire" meant passing between rows of fire in an initiation rite. In this view, the "abomination of Moloch" condemned by the Hebrew prophets was Jewish children being initiated into paganism. Thus, children were not actually sacrificed at all and it was the initiation ceremony that alarmed the prophets.

There are some problems with this view, however. Although there are some cases where the text could be referring to something like this initiation rite, there are also cases where passing through fire is clearly referring to burning. Furthermore, ancient Near Eastern texts give good reason to believe that actual child sacrifice occurred.

Uncertainty Remains

There is a lot of uncertainty regarding Moloch, though a few things can be said with relative confidence. It is clear from Biblical and ancient Near Eastern sources that Moloch was probably a title or epithet used for a prominent Canaanite deity to whom children were at least occasionally sacrificed. This deity was either a foreign deity or he may have been a mischaracterization of Yahweh himself, though this is one of the less likely explanations. Beyond this, there is still much to learn.

If you know who late night radio talk show host Art Bell is, you probably already know that he recently retired from one of the most popular night time radio talk shows in America, Coast to Coast with Art Bell. Art lays the reason for his forced early retirement squarely on the shoulders of two individuals, Ted Gunderson and David Hinkson, because of a brief conversation between Hinkson and Gunderson about Bell on the night of December 9, 1997. Art has told his radio audience that his personal life has been devastated because of that exchange and that he felt compelled to retire from radio and vindicate his honor in a public trial. The conversation in question was carried on the Armed Forces Network (AFN), WWCR, KHNC, and other stations via short-wave radio. The entire transcript of the relavent two minute Gunderson/Hinkson conversation is attached to this article. It is a verbatim copy of the transcript submitted to the court in Nashville and titled by Gunderson's attorney as "Exhibit A".

A press release titled Art Bell Prevails in Defamation Hearing, posted April 28, 2000 by Rowland Network Communications, said that Bell's 'two-year battle' to vindicate his name had taken a 'significant step forward' and that attempts by radio host Gunderson and radio stations WWCR and WNQM to dismiss the lawsuit were rejected by Judge Marietta Shipley after lenghty oral arguments in a Summary Judgment hearing on April 28 in Nashville, Tennessee.

> Art Bell filed his defamation lawsuit in the Circuit Court for Davidson County after Mr. Gunderson and David Hinkson accused him of molesting children on a program aired worldwide on WWCR, a Nashville-based short wave radio station. Citing the emotional harm that resulted from the false charges, Mr. Bell announced on March 31, 2000 his retirement from radio broadcasting.
>
> Art Bell's lead counsel, Gerard P. Fox of Los Angeles, added:
> "When a person has been defamed, there is no putting the genie entirely back in the bottle. However, the Court's ruling today that Mr. Bell has provided sufficient evidence to allow the case to be decided by a jury goes a long way toward restoring his reputation. This day in Court has reaffirmed Mr. Bell's confidence in our judicial system."

I believe this embroilment between Bell and Gunderson/Hinkson has been manufactured or manipulated into existence to discredit Ted Gunderson. Whether Bell is willingly participating in this smear effort or is an innocent dupe whose emotions have been manipulated to follow this course of action, I don't know, but his behavior does not fit the alleged 'crime'. Personally, I like Art Bell. I've been listening to his show on and off since 1995 and I always enjoy his interviews. It never occured to me that I would be writing an aritcle concerning Art Bell.

Let's review:

Art is a well known radio personality. During the April 28 summary court hearing in Tennessee involving Bell and Gunderson's attorneys, Gunderson's attorney stated that Bell's show was carried by more than 480 radio stations and had an estimated audience of nine million people. Regular listeners to the show have heard Art boast about the number of newly affiliated radio stations that have signed on to carry his show and those numbers seemed to have gone up steadily with each passing year. By all accounts, Art Bell seemed to be at the zenith of his radio career.

A question now begs to be asked: Why would a man at the very top of his chosen career, enjoying more popularity and earning power than he had ever achieved in his entire life, suddenly decide to throw it all away because of a two minute exchange between two individuals spoken on an obscure short-wave radio broadcast out of Nashville, Tennessee?

Another question: Before Art decided to discuss this incident on his show, how many of those nine million listeners in his audience, do you suppose, knew anything about the two minute conversation between Gunderson and Hinkson?

Very, very few I would think.

So why draw attention to it? When you are a well known radio personality with a large following, do you assist your critics by airing their accusations to your audience? Do you give them national exposure that they could not otherwise obtain?

Even more perplexing, why quit over it? Especially when you've been telling people for years how much you love the job. Yes, I've heard Art's on-air explanation of his son's apparent abduction and sexual abuse. Art said that stress over his son's situation is what caused him to suddenly quit his show last year. But the accused man in that case was convicted and imprisoned for life. Art came back to host his show and everything seemed to be hunky dorey until this: a two minute short-wave broadcast exchange that occurred more than 2 years ago, that now drives Art into early retirement and is accompanied by a three month long railing against Gunderson & Co.? This stream of events and Bell's strange conduct just don't add up. Is there more going on behind the scenes that we are not privy to?

What I'm observing is unreasonable and illogical conduct on the part of Art Bell coupled with a national chorus of booing from Bell fans aimed at Gunderson and Hinkson before the facts are even known.

For example, we have a press release from Rowland Network Communications, which is owned by Keith Rowland, Art Bell's web master, that states that "Mr. Gunderson and David Hinkson accused him [Bell] of molesting children on a program aired worldwide... ".

Is that what happened?

Let's examine the transcript from that 'notorious' broadcast:

Transcript of December 9, 1997 broadcast of Ted Gunderson radio program with guest David Hinkson on AFN, WWCR, KHNC and other stations and via short-wave radio

[After a discussion between Ted Gunderson ("TG") and David Hinkson ("DH") regarding the case of Ms. Linda Wiegand, who has accused her ex-husband in a custody fight of molesting and raping her two young boys, the program went to a station break. The following is a transcription of the broadcast after the break.]

TG We're back and my guest today is David Hinkson. I was telling you about the Wiegand case, Dave.

DH I'm going to tell you something, Ted, I thought was interesting. You do a lot of research. You're an investigator, right?

TG Right.

DH Okay, if I saw some paperwork, or somebody credible said they saw some paperwork, but we didn't have copies of it in our hands, pertaining to an indictment that had been squashed pursuant to a payola, how would you verify that?

TG Well, I'd go to the courts.

DH Okay. Art Bell..it's my understanding he recently paid to cover up his indictment. Now I can't prove it, but it was a credible source. Can you do a little research on that for me?

TG yeah, let's talk to, we'll.., we can talk. What court district is it in?

DN Pahrump.

TG Well, the record should be right there in Pahrump.

DH I was told, okay, that he bought his way out of it.

TG Well, then, if he bought his way out of it, there's a good possibility that the right person was paid off and the records have disappeared.

DH I won't say anymore than it has to do with the subject you're talking about with Wiegand.

TG Oh, that's interesting. Now, I'll tell you about Art Bell.

DH He's not friendly towards me. I'm not saying too much here am I?

TG Let me just tell you about...We tried to get him to take Linda Wiegand and put her on his show.

DH That's why he won't.

TG What happened was, I had his home phone number, and I called, and his wife said: "Well, he's asleep, he'll be up in an hour" and I said, "Have him call me." That was about ten days ago. I haven't heard from him yet. So, I gave the number to Linda. Linda called. And said, you know, "I'd appreciate it if you put me on your show. We got to protect our children. I need to get my children out from behind that situation." And he got mad and hung up on her.

DH Ah, ha!

TG She called him back and said: "People don't hang up on me." And he said, " I will not put you on my show until you tell me who gave you my home phone number." And so she called me and I said, "Tell Art Bell that I gave the home phone number to you." She said you [sic] told him, and she hasn't heard from him since.

DH Well, the only thing I'll say about this so-called indictment. And I'm not accusing. I want listeners to call Art Bell and ask him to his face "Were you indicted? Did you cover it up, Art?" I'm not accusing him. I'm just telling you a credible source showed me the stuff. ..[unintelligible]...hearsay..

TG [Unintelligible].. You need to get all that, you need...

DH I'm asking you to prove my hearsay. That what I'm telling you is correct.

TG OK, listen, we have a caller. Ruth from West Virginia.

[End of transcript]

I don't read any accusations of child molestation here. What I read is guest Hinkson bringing up the topic of Art Bell. I read Hinkson hinting at the idea that Bell has squashed some sort of indictment and I read host Gunderson RESPONDING to Hinkson's statements and questions. Drawn into the conversation about Bell, host Gunderson then relays a couple of anecdotes about Bell not returning his phone call and giving Art's home phone number to Linda Weigand. But that's ALL I read. Gunderson, especially, is saying NOTHING that's out of line here. Hinkson has brought up the topic of Art Bell and Hinkson is proffering allegations about Bell, not Gunderson.

Based on this brief exchange, however, Art Bell now paints Gunderson & Hinkson-from Coast to Coast-as the Bad Guys Who've Ruined My Life and walks away from a job he absolutely loves.

Is it just me, or is there something wrong with this picture???

Of the two villains, I know very little about David Hinkson. I believe he has a web based business and sells a product called Water Oz. I've never met him, I've never spoken to him, and I have no idea about his ethics, morality, honesty or lack thereof.

I know much more about Gunderson.

Ted Gunderson retired from the FBI in 1979 as Senior Special Agent-in-Charge for Los Angeles after spending 29 years with the Bureau. Over the years, he had risen in the ranks from Special Agent to Special Agent Supervisor, to Assistant Special Agent -in-Charge for New Haven and Philadelphia, to Chief Inspector, to Special Agent-in-Charge for Memphis and Dallas, and finally to Senior Special Agent-in-Charge for LA. Following retirement from the FBI, Gunderson founded an international security consulting and investigation firm called Ted L. Gunderson & Associates out of Santa Monica, California. Gunderson was hired as a Security and Anti-Terrorism Coordinator for the 1979 Pan American Games held in San Juan, Puerto Rico by Attorney General Griffin Bell, and again in 1984 for the Los Angeles Olympic Games. Gunderson has received a variety of awards like "Law Enforcement Officer of the Year" and has appeared on a number of TV shows including "48 Hours", "Hard Copy", "Geraldo", "Inside Edition", and "Larry King Live". He also has a weekly short-wave radio show carried by WWCR (World Wide Christian Radio) called The Ted Gunderson Intelligence Report.

I first saw Ted Gunderson at a talk he gave a couple of years ago in Orange County, California on satanic ritual abuse involving children. At that talk, he mentioned the case of Army physician, Dr Jeffrey McDonald, who had received three consecutive life sentences for the murder of his wife and children. McDonald had insisted that his family had been killed by a group of people who entered his home and murdered his family in satanic rituals at Ft. Bragg, NC on February 17, 1970. Gunderson believed in McDonald's innocence and eventually found the "mysterious woman with the floppy hat" who had essentially corroborated McDonald's story and said that she was among the group who entered McDonald's home and committed the murders. The court discounted her confession and the woman soon wound up dead.

"Irregularities" committed by the government in the McDonald case are simply staggering. While under government control, evidence had been altered, destroyed, disappeared, and hidden from the defense. Recently, the Judge ruled that DNA testing could be done on the remaining artifacts, but did not allow the defense to be present when the court opened the envelopes which were supposed to contain 15 items of evidence. Only U.S. Department of Justice and FBI representatives were allowed to be present during the court proceedings. Five of the 15 items scheduled for examination of DNA were missing from those envelopes. That's barely the tip of the iceberg in the McDonald case. Anyone who carefully examines the voluminous evidence gathered by Gunderson and others, can clearly see that Dr. Jeffrey McDonald was framed. The evidence fairly shouts at you.

Gunderson has vowed to never give up on McDonald, convinced that McDonald is an innocent patsy taking the fall for satanic ritual participants whose capture could lead to the exposure of highly placed government and civilian individuals that are involved in these abhorrent activities, as has been recently alleged in the JonBenet Ramsey case.

At the Orange County presentation, Gunderson also talked about the New World Order and said that he saw too many things in the field that substantiated the information he had read in books about the NWO such as that explained in Pawns in the Game by William G. Carr. The kidnapping and use of young children by the elites of the NWO as sacrificial ritual victims and sex slaves particularly bothered him.

Gunderson's interest in the ritual abuse of children entered a new phase after he was asked by a group of parents in 1991 from the McMartin Preschool in the city of Manhattan Beach, California to oversee the investigation and excavation of the areas beneath the classrooms of the school where the abused 2-4 year old children insisted they were taken through trap doors and tunnels leading into an underground room used for satanic rituals. Despite two trials and an investigation that lasted over 7 years (1983-1990), prosecutors claimed that they could not find evidence of tunnels. During the first trial, the parents of the involved children were not allowed access to the school site. They were only permitted to probe for tunnels in a lot adjacent to the school. The kids always said that the tunnels were under the school.The first trial ended with Mrs McMartin being acquitted while her grandson, Ray Buckey, was deadlocked in a hung jury. During the second trial of Buckey, ownership of the McMartin school had changed hands and the parents now had an opportunity to access the the site.

Gunderson obtained permission from the new owner of the school to dig and assembled a team of professional archaeologists to excavate the areas under the school. As expected, they discovered the tunnels exactly were the kids had said they were located. All of the underground locations had been carefully back filled, but to the seasoned eye of the archaeologists, the evidence was ample and glaring. After uncovering the tunnels, Gunderson called the District Attorney's Office of Los Angeles County and they sent an investigator named Perez to inspect the site.

Investigator Perez would not accept the opinion of the team's leader, Dr. E. Gary Stickel (of UCLA) that the team had found tunnels. Among a host of telling signs, Stickel pointed out to Perez that the soil used to back fill the tunnels was FOREIGN to the local area. The grade, composition, and mineral makeup of the soil was geologically DIFFERENT from the adjacent, undisturbed soil, but Perez remained unimpressed. Apparently, it didn't matter. The Los Angeles County's DA's Office had already declared there were no tunnels and they weren't about to be embarrassed by any findings to the contrary, even from professional archaeologists.

Since Perez refused to acknowlege the overwhelming evidence supporting the existence of the tunnels unearthed by Dr. Stickel's team, the DA did not bring up the tunnels in Ray Buckey's second trial which probably would have helped to convict him. The jury was lead to believe that since the young children were planted with "false memories" about the tunnels, their recollections of satanic and sexual abuse by Buckey and others must also be 'fabricated'. Buckey, like his grandmother, was acquitted and set free.

A one inch thick report titled "Archaeological Investigations of the McMartin Preschool Site, Manhattan Beach, California", authored by Dr. Stickel documented the team's conclusive findings that the tunnels did indeed exist. Gunderson was never paid for his participation in the McMartin investigation and had spent $17,000. of his own money to help underwrite the cost of the subterranean excavation. During the course of the McMartin excavation, Gunderson spent numerous nights sleeping on the floor of the McMartin school in order to prevent any possible interference or tampering with the archaeological team's findings.

Gunderson's slides of the McMartin excavation were eye opening. One slide particularly, clearly revealed the evidence of a back filled tunnel. When the tunnel was originally dug, a long and thick tree root of approximately 6 inch diameter had traversed from one side of the tunnel to the other at mid height level. The original tunnel excavators had cut the root which traversed the tunnel, but left the ends of the root (imbedded in either side of the tunnel walls) intact. After Gunderson's team re-excavated the tunnel, the ends of the tree roots-protruding from each side of the tunnel-were plainly visible. One end, still attached to the tree, was alive, while the other end was dead and somewhat dried. At the time the case was in the news, I too, believed the media promoted story that McMartin and her son were long suffering innocent victims of over zealous parents and therapists who were planting "false memories" into the children in order to rake in therapy fees and win out-of-court settlements with insurance carriers.(How bitter must be the legacy of this injustice for those former children and their families.)

Gunderson also talked about The Franklin Cover-Up in Nebraska. Attorney John DeCamp had authored a book of the same title in 1992. What began in November of 1988 as an investigation by the FBI and IRS of a black man named Larry King, who was the president of the Franklin Credit Union in Omaha, Nebraska for millions in missing funds, soon led to the exposure of a satanic child abuse/sex slave ring that involved some of the most prominent community leaders in Omaha including: the former publisher of the Omaha World Herald, the then Chief of Police, the society editor of the Omaha World Herald, a former state senator, the head of the Nebraska Forestry Service, and the multi-millionaire heir to the Brandeis Department fortune. Approximately 80 youngsters came forward and made allegations concerning sexual abuse, forced prostitution, and cult activities including the human sacrifice of small children and babies at satanic rituals.

Many of the children stated that they were placed on private jets and flown to Washington DC and other cities for sex orgies with U.S. Congressmen, U.S. Senators, at least one top official in the White House, and other public officials. These same children were also used in an organized child kidnapping/sex slave operation that facilitated the abduction of yet other children from playgrounds and off the street, who were then used in child porn and snuff films or sold into slavery. "Sales" of abducted young American children to foreigners was common. A 10-13 year old blue eyed blonde could be auctioned off for more than $50,000 near an air strip close to Las Vegas or Toronto and then placed on an unmarked plane, never be seen or heard from again. One of those planes was positively identified as a DEA (U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration) plane.

Of the 80 children who originally came forward, only four were willing to sign statements. Two of the four later recanted, but the remaining two, Alisha Owen and Paul Bonacci, refused to recant and held fast to their allegations. Criminal charges were filed against both of them. Owen was convicted of perjury before a grand jury by a prosecutor suspected to be 'dirty' and spent two years in solitary confinement. Six months after refusing to recant and prior to her perjury trial, Alisha's brother, Aaron Owens, committed 'suicide' in a correction center cell. The charges against Paul Bonacci were later dropped since he had, by now, been convicted of child molestation and it was felt that his testimony had been sufficiently discredited (Bonacci, with John DeCamp as his attorney, however, was later to obtain a judgement of one million dollars in damages against the former Franklin Credit Union president, Larry King).

Fifteen people connected to the Franklin Cover-Up have died mysteriously, including the senate committee appointed investigator,Gary Caradori and his young son, Andrew. Caradori's plane exploded in mid-air shortly after leaving Chicago for Lincoln, Nebraska on July 11, 1990. The day before, he had called the chairman of the senate investigating committee, Lauren Schmit, and told him that he had irrefutable evidence that the children involved in the Franklin Cover-Up were telling the truth.

Overlaying the Franklin Cover-Up case is a CIA front operation, called The Finders. Gunderson outlined the mission of The Finders in a description included in his 1993 report, titled "Child Kidnapping in America; The CIA Connection", as a:

"CIA Front established in the 1960's. It has TOP CLEARANCE and PROTECTION in its ASSIGNED task of kidnapping and torture-programming of young children throughout the U.S. Members are specially trained GOVERNMENT KIDNAPPERS known to be sexual degenerates who involve the kidnapped children in satanic sex orgies and bloody rituals as well as murders of other children and the slaughter of animals. They use a fleet of unmarked vans to grab TARGETED children from parks and school yards. In doing so, they use children within their organization as decoys to attract the victims close to the vans where they are grabbed by the adults. They then drug the children and transport them to a series of safe houses for safe keeping. They are then used in their ceremonies, for body parts, sex slaves, and some are auctioned off at various locations in the northern hemisphere. In the past, they have been auctioned off near a location to Las Vegas, Nevada and Toronto, Canada. Marion David Pettie, a leader of the cult, is an identified homosexual, pedophile, and CIA officer. His son was an employee of a CIA proprietary firm, Air America, which was notorious for smuggling drugs, destined for the U.S. , out of the Golden Triangle into Saigon during the Viet Nam War."

This CIA operation has involved the kidnapping, abduction, enslavement, and murder of literally THOUSANDS of American children snatched from the streets of America by CIA operatives. In Gunderson's report on The Finders, he included copies of letters containing page after page of specific allegations and supporting documentation sent in 1992 to the Nebraska Attorney General, Dan Stenberg, the Nebraska FBI, the Director of the FBI, William Sessions, the Governor of Nebraska, and the Attorney General of the United States, William Barr, among others. The sort of replies he received back could be used for a graduate level course in Official Stonewalling.

If you've been paying attention to the news lately, you know that people who attempt to reveal illegal and criminal behavior in high places usually wind up dead, as witnessed lately by Waco analysis experts and witnesses who seem to be dying off in quick step fashion.

In the case of Gunderson, exposing the widespread satanic ritual murder, abuse, and kidnapping of young children for the degenerate pleasures of high level satanists in this country is Risky Business. If there's one thing that the NWO elite DOESN'T want the public to know about, it's the depth of their involvement in satanic depravities.

Satanists are convinced that if you murder a young child in an environment of absolute terror, that at the moment of death, the ritual participants can 'capture' the "life force" or life essence of their young victims. The younger the victim, the more powerful, they believe, the "life essence" captured. Satanic ritual guru, Aleister Crowley, spoke of this belief ad nauseum in his books.

Many victims of satanic ritual abuse and government sponsored mind control technologies have come forward in recent years with books describing their experiences. Their revelations are nothing short of mind numbing. Fritz Springmeier and high level mind-controlled survivor, Cisco Wheeler, have co-authored three books together detailing the use of satanic murder rituals (E.g. The Illuminati Formula to Create An Undetectable Total Mind Controlled Slave [1996]) to create - through terror - multible personalities, or alters, which are then individually progammed to perform tasks ranging from prostitution to assassinations while under mind control. Cathy O'Brien, another 'presidential model' mind control victim reveals in Trance Formation in America (1994) similar conditioning using satanic ritual terrorization of her and her daughter, Kelly.

British author David Icke has delved deeply into the satanic abuse of children in his book The Biggest Secret (1999) and his 3 hour video taped interview with mind control survivor and high satanic 'Mother Goddess' Arizona Wilder leaves no doubt that the use of children in satanic rituals for sex, terrorization, and human sacrifice is wide spread in this country and abroad and reaches into the very highest level of governments, royalty, clergy, military/intelligence organizations, and the upper corporate world.

I had a chance to speak briefly with Ted after his Orange County talk two years ago, but I got to know him a lot better this past Fall and early Winter. We met and spent time together in Nevada where he had been helping another high level 'presidential model' mind control survivor named Brice Taylor and her daughter, who is also named Kelly. Taylor's1999 book, *Thanks for the Memories*goes even farther than Cathy O'Brien's book in its shocking revelations of the vicious and abominable conduct of well known celebrities and friends of NWO insiders such as Bob Hope

I spent last Thanksgiving with Ted, Brice, Kelly, and some other friends who were there to help. I was Ted's kitchen assistant, since he had insisted on buying and cooking the Thanksgiving meal for everyone (yes, he's a good cook). After we finished eating, I casually asked him if I could copy a few of his documents and he offered to let me copy everything he has: files, slides, photos, reports, investigative journals, notes, ...anything I wanted. Before I left Nevada, I took advantage of that offer and came home with a couple of heavy boxes full of Gunderson's files.

Ted Gunderson did not ask me to write this article, nor has he ever spoken to me about the Art Bell affair at any time. I obtained the radio broadcast transcript from a mutual friend who had gotten it from Gunderson's attorney. The information mentioned here concerning Gunderson's investigations was taken from the files he had allowed me to copy in Nevada. I had to write this story because Ted's reputation deserves to be defended. The impression that one is left with based on Art Bell's assumptions and on-air characterization of Gunderson is that he's a reckless rumor monger who is so lacking in integrity and concern for his fellow man that he would falsely accuse Art Bell of child molestation when Bell's own son apparently had been victimized by it. That impression is about as far from reality as it can possibly get.. It is a lie, an utter fabrication on the part of Art Bell to smear Ted Gunderson's name and reputation.

Gunderson is a Giver and cares about the safety and welfare of America's children more than any person I know. Over the past two decades he's contributed a great deal of his time and money to help people who were otherwise powerless and defenseless to rescue themselves. Based on his files, his work and investigational habits appear to be first rate and very professional. I've never heard him level accusations about anybody without evidence to support his suppositions. Never.

In the case of Art Bell, as the transcript of Hinkson and Gunderson clearly reveals, Ted didn't accuse Art Bell of ANYTHING... But how many of Bell's nine million listeners are ever going to know that? As Bell's lawyer Fox aptly remarked "there is no putting the genie entirely back in the bottle".

Gunderson's former comrades in the FBI have long ago turned their back and shunned him because he's been willing to tell it like it is and let the chips fall where they may. He's more interested in the truth, the welfare of the American people, and the saving of innocent lives than in being a comfortable retiree with Club Fed. His dedication to the principles of righteousness and justice has cost Gunderson dearly, more than the public will know.

It's truly ironic that Art Bell should be the vehicle to bring discredit on Ted Gunderson, when Art's son was reportedly a victim of kidnapping and sexual abuse; the very thing that Ted Gunderson has been trying to expose and put an end to in this country, all the while, working upstream against very powerful and dark forces.

The court case is due to resume on May 25.

Как стать зомби: самый страшный наркотик снова в ходу

В Южной Америке появился наркотик, который местные жители успели окрестить "Дыханием смерти". После его приема человек превращается в настоящего зомби, готового выполнять все, что ему скажут. Вещество, активно применявшееся немцами во время Второй мировой войны, вновь набирает популярность, сообщает Daily Mail.

Практически забытый препарат недавно вновь попал во внимание южноамериканской полиции: его стала активно применять колумбийская мафия. Наркотик не имеет ни вкуса, ни запаха, он называется скополамин. После его приема люди не помнят ничего, что происходило с ними в течение последних двух-трех суток. Случалось, что жертвы "Дыхания смерти" просыпались не только без денег, но и без некоторых внутренних органов. Разумеется, принять наркотик добровольно, вероятно, решались лишь редкие смельчаки.

В основном им пользуются колумбийские преступники, под тем или иным предлогом подмешивая опасное вещество в еду или питье своим жертвам. Как рассказывали некоторые бандиты, пойманные с пакетиком скополамина в кармане, этот порошок "хуже сибирской язвы". По словам одной из жертв, попробовавшей "Дыхание смерти", наркотик подсыпал ей в сок мужчина, с которым она случайно познакомилась на улице в колумбийской столице.

Злоумышленник спросил у девушки дорогу, разговорил ее, а потом угостил ее напитком с подмешанным туда опасным веществом. После этого жертва сама отвела преступника к себе домой, отдала ему все деньги и некоторые ценности. Стоит отметить, что скополамин не зря называют "Дыханием смерти": передозировка может привести к летальному исходу.

История скополамина уходит корнями в глубокую древность. Говорят, что древние южноамериканские племена использовали его, чтобы заживо хоронить жен и рабов почившего вождя, которые могли понадобиться ему в загробном мире. "Дыхание смерти" не раз применял при допросах нацист Йозеф Менгеле, а также сотрудники американских спецслужб во время холодной войны. Скополамин считался лучшим средством выпытать все тайны даже у самых несговорчивых противников.

Невероятно опасное вещество содержится в пыльце деревьев, растущих близ столицы Колумбии. О нем знают даже дети: мамы учат их не делать привалы под деревьями с желто-белыми цветами. В Эквадоре "Дыхание смерти" используют в медицинских целях.

Путин делал пророческие заявления, но к нему не прислушались

Владимир Путин неоднократно выступал с пророческими заявлениями, касающимися разных сфер, рассказал в эфире телеканала "Россия 1" Дмитрий Песков.

"Он же никого не пугал, будь то сфера разоружения, сфера безопасности, изменение климата. Президент очень здорово иногда описывает перспективы", – отметил представитель Кремля в интервью ведущему программы "Москва. Кремль. Путин" Павлу Зарубину.

И даже те, кто не обратил внимания на заявления российского лидера, позже понимают, что он был прав.

"Может быть к нему не прислушиваются, но потом понимают, что так оно и происходит", – указал Песков.

Revelation 20:9 being fulfilled as we speak, all of the mainstream footage of this operation is a lie, it is not a war, it is cleaning gog and magog out.

It actually appears as though they are being consumed by fire in the distance, we are only moments away from all evil being removed, forever!!!

Thank you Jesus!!!

"Nouveau millénaire, Défis libertaires"
Le Code Noir
Texte intégral 1665

Origine : http://www.haiti-reference.com/histoire/documents/code_noir.html

Note de Haiti-Reference:

Il exista deux versions du Code Noir. La première préparée par le ministre du roi et puissant contrôleur général, Jean-Baptiste Colbert (1616 - 1683). Il fut promulgué en 1685 par Louis XIV, Roi de France du 14 mai 1643 au 1er septembre 1715 . La seconde promulguée par son successeur Louis XV en 1724. Les articles 5, 7, 8, 18 et 25 du Code noir de 1665 ne sont pas repris dans la version de 1724. Le texte suivant est celui de Colbert (1665).
Le Code Noir, qui était censé freiner les abus des maitres à l'égard de leurs esclaves, n'a eu pour effet que de codifier l'esclavage des noirs et la traite, justifiés, en ce temps là, par l'Eglise et les philosophes. A travers ses soixantes articles transpire l'hypocrisie du legislateur qui, tout en faisant semblant de considérer l'humanité de l'esclave noir, le présente, sur le plan purement juridique, comme une marchandise soumise aux lois du marché et un bien faisant partie intégrante d'un domaine.

Texte intégral du Code Noir:

Voulons que l'Edit du feu roi de glorieuse mémoire, notre très honoré seigneur et père, du 23 avril 1615, soit exécuté dans nos îles ; se faisant, enjoignons à tous nos officiers de chasser de nos dites îles tous les juifs qui y ont établi leur résidence, auxquels, comme aux ennemis déclarés du nom chrétien, nous commandons d'en sortir dans trois mois à compter du jour de la publication des présentes, à peine de confiscation de corps et de biens.

Art. 2
Tous les esclaves qui seront dans nos îles seront baptisés et instruits dans la religion catholique, apostolique et romaine. Enjoignons aux habitants qui achètent des nègres nouvellement arrivés d'en avertir dans huitaine au plus tard les gouverneurs et intendant desdites îles, à peine d'amende arbitraire, lesquels donneront les ordres nécessaires pour les faire instruire et baptiser dans le temps convenable.

Art. 3
Interdisons tout exercice public d'autre religion que la Catholique, Apostolique et Romaine. Voulons que les contrevenants soient punis comme rebelles et désobéissants à nos commandements. Défendons toutes assemblées pour cet effet, lesquelles nous déclarons conventicules, illicites et séditieuses, sujettes à la même peine qui aura lieu même contre les maîtres qui lui permettront et souffriront à l'égard de leurs esclaves.

Art. 4
Ne seront préposés aucuns commandeurs à la direction des nègres, qui ne fassent profession de la religion Catholique, Apostolique et Romaine, à peine de confiscation desdits nègres contre les maîtres qui les auront préposés et de punition arbitraire contre les commandeurs qui auront accepté ladite direction.

Art. 5
Défendons à nos sujets de la religion [protestante] d'apporter aucun trouble ni empêchement à nos autres sujets, même à leurs esclaves, dans le libre exercice de la religion Catholique, Apostolique et Romaine, à peine de punition exemplaire.

Art. 6
Enjoignons à tous nos sujets, de quelque qualité et condition qu'ils soient, d'observer les jours de dimanches et de fêtes, qui sont gardés par nos sujets de la religion Catholique, Apostolique et Romaine. Leur défendons de travailler ni de faire travailler leurs esclaves auxdits jours depuis l'heure de minuit jusqu'à l'autre minuit à la culture de la terre, à la manufacture des sucres et à tous autres ouvrages, à peine d'amende et de punition arbitraire contre les maîtres et confiscation tant des sucres que des esclaves qui seront surpris par nos officiers dans le travail.

Art. 7
Leur défendons pareillement de tenir le marché des nègres et de toute autre marchandise auxdits jours, sur pareille peine de confiscation des marchandises qui se trouveront alors au marché et d'amende arbitraire contre les marchands.

Art. 8
Déclarons nos sujets qui ne sont pas de la religion Catholique, Apostolique et Romaine incapables de contracter à l'avenir aucuns mariages valables, déclarons bâtards les enfants qui naîtront de telles conjonctions, que nous voulons être tenues et réputées, tenons et réputons pour vrais concubinages.

Art. 9
Les hommes libres qui auront eu un ou plusieurs enfants de leur concubinage avec des esclaves, ensemble les maîtres qui les auront soufferts, seront chacun condamnés en une amende de 2000 livres de sucre, et, s'ils sont les maîtres de l'esclave de laquelle ils auront eu lesdits enfants, voulons, outre l'amende, qu'ils soient privés de l'esclave et des enfants et qu'elle et eux soient adjugés à l'hôpital, sans jamais pouvoir être affranchis. N'entendons toutefois le présent article avoir lieu lorsque l'homme libre qui n'était point marié à une autre personne durant son concubinage avec son esclave, épousera dans les formes observées par l'Eglise ladite esclave, qui sera affranchie par ce moyen et les enfants rendus libres et légitimes.

Art. 10
Les solennités prescrites par l'Ordonnance de Blois et par la Déclaration de 1639 pour les mariages seront observées tant à l'égard des personnes libres que des esclaves, sans néanmoins que le consentement du père et de la mère de l'esclave y soit nécessaire, mais celui du maître seulement.

Art. 11
Défendons très expressément aux curés de procéder aux mariages des esclaves, s'ils ne font apparoir du consentement de leurs maîtres. Défendons aussi aux maîtres d'user d'aucunes contraintes sur leurs esclaves pour les marier contre leur gré.

Art. 12
Les enfants qui naîtront des mariages entre esclaves seront esclaves et appartiendront aux maîtres des femmes esclaves et non à ceux de leurs maris, si le mari et la femme ont des maîtres différents.

Art. 13
Voulons que, si le mari esclave a épousé une femme libre, les enfants, tant mâles que filles, suivent la condition de leur mère et soient libres comme elle, nonobstant la servitude de leur père, et que, si le père est libre et la mère esclave, les enfants soient esclaves pareillement.

Art. 14
Les maîtres seront tenus de faire enterrer en terre sainte, dans les cimetières destinés à cet effet, leurs esclaves baptisés. Et, à l'égard de ceux qui mourront sans avoir reçu le baptême, ils seront enterrés la nuit dans quelque champ voisin du lieu où ils seront décédés.

Art. 15
Défendons aux esclaves de porter aucunes armes offensives ni de gros bâtons, à peine de fouet et de confiscation des armes au profit de celui qui les en trouvera saisis, à l'exception seulement de ceux qui sont envoyés à la chasse par leurs maîtres et qui seront porteurs de leurs billets ou marques connus.

Art. 16
Défendons pareillement aux esclaves appartenant à différents maîtres de s'attrouper le jour ou la nuit sous prétexte de noces ou autrement, soit chez l'un de leurs maîtres ou ailleurs, et encore moins dans les grands chemins ou lieux écartés, à peine de punition corporelle qui ne pourra être moindre que du fouet et de la fleur de lys ; et, en cas de fréquentes récidives et autres circonstances aggravantes, pourront être punis de mort, ce que nous laissons à l'arbitrage des juges. Enjoignons à tous nos sujets de courir sus aux contrevenants, et de les arrêter et de les conduire en prison, bien qu'ils ne soient officiers et qu'il n'y ait contre eux encore aucun décret.

Art. 17
Les maîtres qui seront convaincus d'avoir permis ou toléré telles assemblées composées d'autres esclaves que de ceux qui leur appartiennent seront condamnés en leurs propres et privés noms de réparer tout le dommage qui aura été fait à leurs voisins à l'occasion desdites assemblées et en 10 écus d'amende pour la première fois et au double en cas de récidive.

Art. 18
Défendons aux esclaves de vendre des cannes de sucre pour quelque cause et occasion que ce soit, même avec la permission de leurs maîtres, à peine du fouet contre les esclave, de 10 livres tournois contre le maître qui l'aura permis et de pareille amende contre l'acheteur.

Art. 19
Leur défendons aussi d'exposer en vente au marché ni de porter dans des maisons particulières pour vendre aucune sorte de denrées, même des fruits, légumes, bois à brûler, herbes pour la nourriture des bestiaux et leurs manufactures, sans permission expresse de leurs maîtres par un billet ou par des marques connues ; à peine de revendication des choses ainsi vendues, sans restitution de prix, pour les maîtres et de 6 livres tournois d'amende à leur profit contre les acheteurs.

Art. 20
Voulons à cet effet que deux personnes soient préposées par nos officiers dans chaque marché pour examiner les denrées et marchandises qui y seront apportées par les esclaves, ensemble les billets et marques de leurs maîtres dont ils seront porteurs.

Art. 21
Permettons à tous nos sujets habitants des îles de se saisir de toutes les choses dont ils trouveront les esclaves chargés, lorsqu'ils n'auront point de billets de leurs maîtres, ni de marques connues, pour être rendues incessamment à leurs maîtres, si leur habitation est voisine du lieu où leurs esclaves auront été surpris en délit : sinon elles seront incessamment envoyées à l'hôpital pour y être en dépôt jusqu'à ce que les maîtres en aient été avertis.

Art. 22
Seront tenus les maîtres de faire fournir, par chacune semaine, à leurs esclaves

âgés de dix ans et au-dessus, pour leur nourriture, deux pots et demi, mesure de Paris, de farine de manioc, ou trois cassaves pesant chacune 2 livres et demie au moins, ou choses équivalentes, avec 2 livres de boeuf salé, ou 3 livres de poisson, ou autres choses à proportion : et aux enfants, depuis qu'ils sont sevrés jusqu'à l'âge de dix ans, la moitié des vivres ci-dessus.

Art. 23
Leur défendons de donner aux esclaves de l'eau-de-vie de canne ou guildive, pour tenir lieu de subsistance mentionnée en l'article précédent.

Art. 24
Leur défendons pareillement de se décharger de la nourriture et subsistance de leurs esclaves en leur permettant de travailler certain jour de la semaine pour leur compte particulier.

Art. 25
Seront tenus les maîtres de fournir à chaque esclave, par chacun an, deux habits de toile ou quatre aunes de toile, au gré des maîtres.

Art. 26
Les esclaves qui ne seront point nourris, vêtus et entretenus par leurs maîtres, selon que nous l'avons ordonné par ces présentes, pourront en donner avis à notre procureur général et mettre leurs mémoires entre ses mains, sur lesquels et même d'office, si les avis viennent d'ailleurs, les maîtres seront poursuivis à sa requête et sans frais ; ce que nous voulons être observé pour les crimes et traitements barbares et inhumains des maîtres envers leurs esclaves.

Art. 27
Les esclaves infirmes par vieillesse, maladie ou autrement, soit que la maladie soit incurable ou non, seront nourris et entretenus par leurs maîtres, et, en cas qu'ils eussent abandonnés, lesdits esclaves seront adjugés à l'hôpital, auquel les maîtres seront condamnés de payer 6 sols par chacun jour, pour la nourriture et l'entretien de chacun esclave.

Art. 28
Déclarons les esclaves ne pouvoir rien avoir qui ne soit à leurs maîtres ; et tout ce qui leur vient par industrie, ou par la libéralité d'autres personnes, ou autrement, à quelque titre que ce soit, être acquis en pleine propriété à leurs maîtres, sans que les enfants des esclaves, leurs pères et mères, leurs parents et tous autres y puissent rien prétendre par successions, dispositions entre vifs ou à cause de mort ; lesquelles dispositions nous déclarons nulles, ensemble toutes les promesses et obligations qu'ils auraient faites, comme étant faites par gens incapables de disposer et contracter de leur chef.

Art. 29
Voulons néanmoins que les maîtres soient tenus de ce que leurs esclaves auront fait par leur commandement, ensemble de ce qu'ils auront géré et négocié dans les boutiques, et pour l'espèce particulière de commerce à laquelle leurs maîtres les auront préposés, et au cas que leurs maîtres ne leur aient donné aucun ordre et ne les aient point préposés, ils seront tenus seulement jusqu'à concurrence de ce qui aura tourné à leur profit, et, si rien n'a tourné au profit des maîtres, le pécule desdits esclaves que les maîtres leur auront permis d'avoir en sera tenu, après que les maîtres en auront déduit par préférence ce qui pourra leur être dû ; sinon que le pécule consistât en tout ou partie en marchandises, dont les esclaves auraient permission de faire trafic à part, sur lesquelles leurs maîtres viendront seulement par contribution au sol la livre avec les autres créanciers.

Art. 30
Ne pourront les esclaves être pourvus d'office ni de commission ayant quelque fonction publique, ni être constitués agents par autres que leurs maîtres pour gérer et administrer aucun négoce, ni être arbitres, experts ou témoins, tant en matière civile que criminelle : et en cas qu'ils soient ouïs en témoignage, leur déposition ne servira que de mémoire pour aider les juges à s'éclairer d'ailleurs, sans qu'on en puisse tire aucune présomption, ni conjoncture, ni adminicule de preuve.

Art. 31
Ne pourront aussi les esclaves être parties ni être en jugement en matière civile, tant en demandant qu'en défendant, ni être parties civiles en matière criminelle, sauf à leurs maîtres d'agir et défendre en matière civile et de poursuivre en matière criminelle la réparation des outrages et excès qui auront été commis contre leurs esclaves.

Art. 32
Pourront les esclaves être poursuivis criminellement, sans qu'il soit besoin de rendre leurs maîtres partie, (sinon) en cas de complicité : et seront, les esclaves accusés, jugés en première instance par les juges ordinaires et par appel au Conseil souverain, sur la même instruction et avec les même formalités que les personnes libres.

Art. 33
L'esclave qui aura frappé son maître, sa maîtresse ou le mari de sa maîtresse, ou leurs enfants avec contusion ou effusion de sang, ou au visage, sera puni de mort.

Art. 34
Et quant aux excès et voies de fait qui seront commis par les esclaves contre les personnes libres, voulons qu'ils soient sévèrement punis, même de mort, s'il y échet.

Art. 35
Les vols qualifiés, même ceux de chevaux, cavales, mulets, boeufs ou vaches, qui auront été faits par les esclaves ou par les affranchis, seront punis de peines afflictives, même de mort, si le cas le requiert.

Art. 36
Les vols de moutons, chèvres, cochons, volailles, cannes à sucre, pois, mils, manioc, ou autres légumes, faits par les esclaves, seront punis selon la qualité du vol, par les juges qui pourront, s'il y échet, les condamner d'être battus de verges par l'exécuteur de la haute justice et marqués d'une fleur de lys.

Art. 37
Seront tenus les maîtres, en cas de vol ou d'autre dommage causé par leurs esclaves, outre la peine corporelle des esclaves, de réparer le tort en leur nom, s'ils n'aiment mieux abandonner l'esclave à celui auquel le tort a été fait ; ce qu'ils seront tenus d'opter dans trois jours, à compter de celui de la condamnation, autrement ils en seront déchus.

Art. 38
L'esclave fugitif qui aura été en fuite pendant un mois à compter du jour que son maître l'aura dénoncé en justice, aura les oreilles coupées et sera marqué d'une fleur de lys sur une épaule ; s'il récidive un autre mois à compter pareillement du jour de la dénonciation, il aura le jarret coupé, et il sera marqué d'un fleur de lys sur l'autre épaule ; et, la troisième fois, il sera puni de mort.

Art. 39
Les affranchis qui auront donné retraite dans leurs maisons aux esclaves fugitifs, seront condamnés par corps envers les maîtres en l'amende de 300 livres de sucre par chacun jour de rétention, et les autres personnes libres qui leur auront donné pareille retraite, en 10 livres tournois d'amende par chacun jour de rétention.

Art. 40
L'esclave puni de mort sur la dénonciation de son maître non complice du crime dont il aura été condamné sera estimé avant l'exécution par deux des principaux habitants de l'île, qui seront nommés d'office par le juge, et le prix de l'estimation en sera payé au maître ; et, pour à quoi satisfaire, il sera imposé par l'intendant sur chacune tête des nègres payants droits la somme portée par l'estimation, laquelle sera régalée sur chacun desdits nègres et levée par le fermier du domaine royal pour évité à frais.

Art. 41
Défendons aux juges, à nos procureurs et aux greffiers de prendre aucune taxe dans les procès criminels contre les esclaves, à peine de concussion.

Art. 42
Pourront seulement les maîtres, lorsqu'ils croiront que leurs esclaves l'auront mérité, les faire enchaîner et les faire battre de verges ou cordes. Leur défendons de leur donner la torture, ni de leur faire aucune mutilation de membres, à peine de confiscation des esclaves et d'être procédé contre les maîtres extraordinairement.

Art. 43
Enjoignons à nos officiers de poursuivre criminellement les maîtres ou les commandeurs qui auront tué un esclave étant sous leur puissance ou sous leur direction et de punir le meurtre selon l'atrocité des circonstances ; et, en cas qu'il y ait lieu à l'absolution, permettons à nos officiers de renvoyer tant les maîtres que les commandeurs absous, sans qu'ils aient besoin d'obtenir de nous des lettres de grâce.

Art. 44
Déclarons les esclaves être meubles et comme tels entrer dans la communauté, n'avoir point de suite par hypothèque, se partager également entre les cohéritiers, sans préciput et droit d'aînesse, n'être sujets au douaire coutumier, au retrait féodal et lignager, aux droits féodaux et seigneuriaux, aux formalités des décrets, ni au retranchement des quatre quints, en cas de disposition à cause de mort et testamentaire.

Art. 45
N'entendons toutefois priver nos sujets de la faculté de les stipuler propres à leurs personnes et aux leurs de leur côté et ligne, ainsi qu'il se pratique pour les sommes de deniers et autres choses mobiliaires.

Art. 46
Seront dans les saisies des esclaves observées les formes prescrites par nos ordonnances et les coutumes pour les saisies des choses mobiliaires. Voulons que les deniers en provenant soient distribués par ordre de saisies ; ou, en cas de déconfiture, au sol la livre, après que les dettes privilégiées auront été payées, et généralement que la condition des esclaves soit réglée en toutes affaires comme celle des autres choses mobiliaires, aux exceptions suivantes.

Art. 47
Ne pourront être saisis et vendus séparément le mari, la femme et leurs enfants impubères, s'ils sont tous sous la puissance d'un même maître ; déclarons nulles les saisies et ventes séparées qui en sont faites , ce que nous voulons avoir lieu dans les aliénations volontaires, sur peine, contre ceux qui feront les aliénations, d'être privés de celui ou de ceux qu'ils auront gardés, qui seront adjugés aux acquéreurs, sans qu'ils soient tenus de faire aucun supplément de prix.

Art. 48
Ne pourront aussi les esclaves travaillant actuellement dans les sucreries, indigoteries et habitations, âgés de quatorze ans et au-dessus jusqu'à soixante ans, être saisis pour dettes, sinon pour ce que sera dû du prix de leur achat, ou que la sucrerie, indigoterie, habitation, dans laquelle ils travaillent soit saisie réellement ; défendons, à peine de nullité, de procéder par saisie réelle et adjudication par décret sur les sucreries, indigoteries et habitations, sans y comprendre les nègres de l'âge susdit y travaillant actuellement.

Art. 49
Le fermier judiciaire des sucreries, indigoteries, ou habitations saisies réellement conjointement avec les esclaves, sera tenu de payer le prix entier de son bail, sans qu'il puisse compter parmi les fruits qu'il perçoit les enfants qui seront nés des esclaves pendant son bail.

Art. 50
Voulons, nonobstant toutes conventions contraires, que nous déclarons nulles, que lesdits enfants appartiennent à la partie saisie, si les créanciers, sont satisfaits d'ailleurs, ou à l'adjudicataire, s'il intervient un décret ; et, à cet effet, il sera fait mention dans la dernière affiche, avant l'interposition du décret, desdits enfants nés des esclaves depuis la saisie réelle. Il sera fait mention, dans la même affiche, des esclaves décédés depuis la saisie réelle dans laquelle ils étaient compris.

Art. 51
Voulons, pour éviter aux frais et aux longueurs des procédures, que la distribution du prix entier de l'adjudication conjointe des fonds et des esclaves, et de ce qui proviendra du prix des baux judiciaires, soit faite entre les créanciers selon l'ordre de leurs privilèges et hypothèques, sans distinguer ce qui est pour le prix des fonds d'avec ce qui est pour le prix des esclaves.

Art. 52
Et néanmoins les droits féodaux et seigneuriaux ne seront payés qu'à proportion du prix des fonds.

Art. 53
Ne seront reçus les lignagers et seigneurs féodaux à retirer les fonds décrétés, s'ils ne retirent les esclaves vendus conjointement avec fonds ni l'adjudicataire à retenir les esclaves sans les fonds.

Art. 54
Enjoignons aux gardiens nobles et bourgeois usufruitiers, amodiateurs et autres jouissants des fonds auxquels sont attachés des esclaves qui y travaillent, de gouverner lesdits esclaves comme bons pères de famille, sans qu'ils soient tenus, après leur administration finie, de rendre le prix de ceux qui seront décédés ou diminués par maladie, vieillesse ou autrement, sans leur faute, et sans qu'ils puissent aussi retenir comme fruits à leur profit les enfants nés desdits esclaves durant leur administration, lesquels nous voulons être conservés et rendus à ceux qui en sont maîtres et les propriétaires.

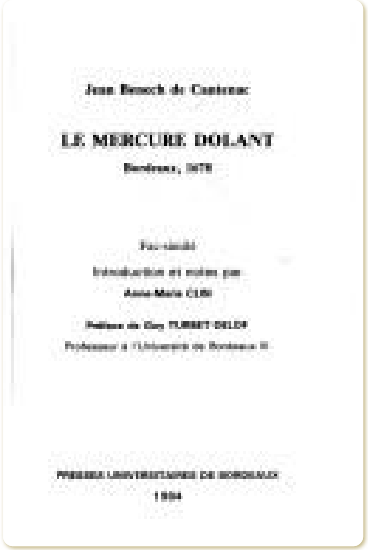
Art. 55
Les maîtres agés de vingt ans pourront affranchir leurs esclaves par tous actes vifs ou à cause de mort, sans qu'ils soient tenus de rendre raison de l'affranchissement, ni qu'ils aient besoin d'avis de parents, encore qu'ils soeint mineurs de vingt-cinq ans.

Art. 56
Les esclaves qui auront été fait légataires universels par leurs maîtres ou nommés exécuteurs de leurs testaments ou tuteurs de leurs enfants, seront tenus et réputés, les tenons et réputons pour affranchis.

Art. 57
Déclarons leurs affranchissements faits dans nos îles, leur tenir lieu de naissance dans nosdites îles et les esclaves affranchis n'avoir besoin de nos lettres de naturalité pour jouir des avantages de nos sujets naturels de notre royauté, terres et pays de notre obéissance, encore qu'ils soient nés dans les pays étrangers.

Art. 58
Commandons aux affranchis de porter un respect singulier à leurs anciens maîtres, à leurs veuves et à leurs enfants, en sorte que l'injure qu'ils leur auront faite soit punie plus grièvement que si elle était faite à une autre personne : les déclarons toutefois francs et quittes envers eux de toutes autres charges, services et droits utiles que leurs anciens maîtres voudraient prétendre tant sur leurs personnes que sur leurs biens et successions en qualité de patrons.

Art. 59
Octroyons aux affranchis les mêmes droits, privilèges et immunités dont jouissent les personnes nées libres ; voulons que le mérite d'une liberté acquise produise en eux, tant pour leurs personnes que pour leurs biens, les mêmes effets que le bonheur de la liberté naturelle cause à nos autres sujets.



Art. 60
Déclarons les confiscations et les amendes qui n'ont point de destination particulière, par ces présentes nous appartenir, pour être payées à ceux qui sont préposés à la recette de nos droits et de nos revenus ; voulons néanmoins que distraction soit faite du tiers desdites confiscations et amendes au profit de l'hôpital établi dans l'île où elles auront été adjugées.

The Black Kings & Queens Project
In 1579, a tall African man now known by the name of Yasuke arrived in Japan.

His height was roughly 6 feet, 2 inches and he had skin like charcoal historians said. The average height of a Japanese man in 1900 was 5 feet 2, so Yasuke would have towered over most Japanese people in the 16th Century,

In 1579, his arrival in Kyoto, the capital at the time, caused such a sensation that people climbed over one another to get a glimpse of him with some being crushed to death, according to historian Lawrence Winkler.
https://www.bbc.com/news/world-africa-48542673

Much about him remains a mystery: it's unconfirmed which country in Africa he hailed from, and there is no verifiable record of his life after 1582. But Yasuke was a real-life Black samurai who served under Oda Nobunaga, one of the most important feudal lords in Japanese history and a unifier of the country. Yasuke is now the subject of two films and a Netflix Anime series.

Большое содержание какао в шоколаде влияет на память

Опубликовано: 2023-02-14 06:34:04

Данные по исследованиям ученых Loma Linda University в США, продемонстрированные на конференции по экспериментальной биологии 2018, рассказали о полезных свойствах какао и о его влиянии на память.

В процессе исследования шоколада биологами под покровительством Ли Берка выяснилось, что не сахар, находящийся в нем, как бытует общественное мнение, влияет на способность активнее мыслить.

Употребляя ежедневно горький шоколад с какао-насыщенностью более 70%, организм человека улучшит работу иммунной системы и мозговой

Вернули из мертвых часть тела: ученые сделали прорыв на пути к воскрешению людей

12 мая 2022 в 12:19

Если результаты ученых будут применимы к умершему мозгу, то можно будет вернуть человека к жизни.

Ученым из Университета штата Юта, США, удалось вернуть к жизни глаза умершего донора органов. Это открытие может означать, что однажды смерть мозга не будет означать смерть в нынешнем понимании и что человека можно будет воскресить из мертвых, сообщает Daily Mail.

В результате нового исследования ученые выяснили, что светочувствительные клетки сетчатки глаза умершего человека могут реагировать на свет в течении 5 часов после смерти. Они даже могут обмениваться сигналами друг с другом, как это происходит у живых людей.

Воскрешение мертвых реально?

Данные нервные клетки в сетчатке глаза являются частью центральной нервной системы (ЦНС), куда также входят человеческий головной и спинной мозг. Новое открытие ученых говорит о том, что существует вероятность того, что и другим нервным клеткам можно вернуть жизнеспособность. Таким образом можно будет восстановить сознание у людей, у которых мозг умер.

Смерть мозга происходит тогда, когда он перестает работать из-за того, что в него не поступает кислород или кровь. Для того, чтобы оживить глаза умершего донора органов, ученые восстановили подачу кислорода и других питательных веществ в глаза через 20 минут после того, как их изъяли у донора.

Результаты нового исследования

"Мы смогли оживить светочувствительные клетки в желтом пятне сетчатки глаза человека, которое отвечает за остроту зрения. Эти клетки даже через 5 часов после смерти человека все еще реагировали на яркий и даже тусклый свет. Теперь мы задаемся вопросом: действительно ли смерть мозга – это конец?", — говорит Фатима Аббас из Университета штата Юта.

Согласно законодательству многих стран, человек считается умершим, если у него умер мозг, даже если специальные аппараты поддерживают работу легких и сердца.

"Это абсолютно новое достижение, нам удалось даже заставить эти нервные клетки посылать сигналы друг другу, то есть они общались между собой. Такого раньше никогда никто не делал", — говорит Франс Винберг из Университета штата Юта.

По словам ученых, их новое открытие может помочь в разработке новых методов лечения потери зрения, а также поможет лучше понять болезни мозга.

которые нельзя получить при изучении лабораторных животных", — говорит Винберг.

Фокус уже писал о том ,что в результате нового исследования ученые выяснили, как люди становятся психопатами.

Ученые из США установили, в конце концов, настоящие причины пьянства. Исследования показали, что люди, злоупотребляющие алкоголем, просто совершенно не понимают серьезность сложившейся ситуации.

Исследователи доказали, что эти люди считают, что последс злоупотребления алкоголя их обязательно обойдут сторо Одновременно у них на уровне подсознания закрепляется т мнение, что алкоголь представляет собой высокий уро сексапильности, коммуникабельности, проч. Чтоб сде подобного рода выводы, были проведены опросы среди пяти с студентов, которым предложили написать тридцать пять са

OBA OVONRAMWEN

OVONRAMWEN was oba (ruler) of BENIN City until it was attacked by the British in 1897. Ovonramwen refused to co operate with the expansion of British trade in his kingdom, and his men killed some of a British party that was sent for discussions with him.

Soon after, a large British force was sent against Benin. Much of the town was destroyed, and most of its artistic treasures were taken away. Ovonramwen himself was later sent into exile at Calabar, and the independence of Benin was ended. The history of Ovonramwen has been made into a play by Ola ROTIMI(Ovonramwen Nognaisi)

En pratique : Quelles sources sont attendues ? Comment ajouter mes sources ?

Un marabout (en arabe : مَربوط [marbūṭ] ou مُرابِط [murābiṭ], appliqué, assidu ; en garnison) est un saint homme (il s'agit rarement d'une femme) et un sage musulman facilitant la vulgarisation de l'islam et faisant l'objet d'un culte populaire. On en retrouve en Afrique du Nord [1] et dans certaines régions d'Afrique subsaharienne.

Ce saint patron donne parfois son nom à un lieu-dit, à un village, à une ville, à qui il offre protection et bénédiction.

Le terme désigne aussi le tombeau à coupole (قُبّة [qubba], au pluriel قِبَاب [qibāb]) de la personne vénérée (saint).

Chaque année des milliers de fidèles se réunissent dans des zaouïa, autour du culte d'un marabout.

Origine du terme [modifier | modifier le code]

Le substantif masculin [2,3] ‹ marabout › est emprunté [2,3], par l'intermédiaire [2] du portugais [2,3] marabuto, à l'arabe [2,3] murābiṭ [3] qui désignait, à l'origine l'homme vivant dans un ribat [3].

Fonctions [modifier | modifier le code]

En Afrique subsaharienne [modifier | modifier le code]

En Afrique subsaharienne, les marabouts sont des personnages à qui l'on prête des pouvoirs multiples, sortes de chamans. Ils rétablissent la santé ou l'ordre social à l'aide de talismans et d'explications du malheur. Ces pratiques magiques sont critiquées par les musulmans orthodoxes, mais n'ont jamais cessé d'exister jusqu'à ce jour. Les marabouts sont aussi, de leur vivant, considérés comme sages, car ayant étudié au cours de leur retraite les divers aspects de l'islam. Ils agissent souvent comme conseil des villageois. Leur vie à l'écart des autres est censée leur donner le recul nécessaire ainsi que le détachement qui leur permet d'obtenir une grande autorité morale.

Ils ne demandent en général pas de salaire pour leurs actions, mais l'obligation morale tacite est de pourvoir à leurs besoins, qui, dans la mesure où ils sont ascètes, se réduisent à la nourriture et à la boisson, ainsi qu'au vêtement. Ils s'interdisent de demander un salaire.

Dans les confréries musulmanes en Afrique de l'Ouest, notamment au Sénégal, les marabouts sont organisés en hiérarchies élaborées. Le marabout le plus élevé de la confrérie des Mourides est ainsi élevé au rang de calife.

En Afrique subsaharienne, l'usage du terme a été étendu aux prêtres, chasseurs traditionnels ou sorciers relevant de rites animistes traditionnels, vaudous ou yoruba par exemple, travaillant à guérir leurs patients d'un mal ou aider à toute autre action sociale. Bien qu'abusif, car se rapportant à des pratiques peu en rapport avec l'islam, cet usage est néanmoins devenu courant.

Des tribus lettrées, notamment maures et touarègues, sont parfois désignées comme des tribus maraboutiques, comme les Kel Ansar.

Au Maghreb [modifier | modifier le code]

Dans le Maghreb, les marabouts sont le plus souvent musulmans. Ils basent leurs techniques sur une lecture ésotérique du Coran. L'attention est portée sur un système de numérologie assez similaire au système de la kabbale, la lecture de certains versets, aux bénédictions (al-Fatiha).

Le terme "marabout" ne désigne pas un sorcier comme cela peut-être le cas en Afrique noire car il ne pratique aucun rite sacrificiel ou animiste au nom d'une quelconque divinité ou esprit. Le terme arabe "marabout" en Afrique correspond en réalité à un saint soufi mystique rattaché (mûra-bet en arabe) à une silsila (chaîne de transmission de la maîtrise spirituelle appelée hekme) qui suit une voie (tariqa) ésotérique de l'islam (voir soufisme). C'est en réalité un maître spirituel qui mène une vie de dévotion, recluse et ascétique. Souvent la population locale arabo-berbère, d'origine paysanne ou montagnarde, lui attribue toutes sortes de "miracles" qui ont donné lieu à de nombreuses croyances populaires. Le saint est généralement enterré dans un sanctuaire appelé qubba en raison de son dôme. Le vert et le blanc, symbole de la paix et de la bénédiction en islam, sont les couleurs qui leur sont toujours associées. Le saint n'a pas de pouvoir politique en général, mais les soufis lui rendent visite (ziyarra) pour le consulter ou s'entretenir sur des problèmes d'ordre spirituel.

Les zaouïa sont des lieux de visites pieuses autour du personnage d'un saint musulman. Le terme de « pèlerinage » est en principe réservé hajj, le pèlerinage à La Mecque.

Imrabdhen [modifier | modifier le code]

En Kabylie (Algérie), les Imrabdhen, (pluriel de amrabedh en kabyle[4]) sont les marabouts et saints et plus généralement dans l'Afrique du Nord berbérophone. Les lignages d'imrabden sont souvent des familles d'origine chorfa (pas tous chérifiennes). Imrabden est une dynastie berbère fondée par Yahia Ben Brahim en 1035, à l'origine des Imravdhen en Kabylie reste inconnue (avec manque d'études scientifiques crédibles sur le sujet).

Origine [modifier | modifier le code]

Le mot amrabed signifie littéralement marabout en français et est un emprunt à l'arabe mrabet, qui signifie : « un soldat ou un enseignant stationné dans un lieu déterminé »[5].

Les imrabden comme tous les Chérifs, bénéficient du titre honorifique de Sidi qui est traditionnellement utilisé pour se référer aux gens reconnus descendants du prophète de l'Islam. Et les femmes sont appelées généralement Lalla.

La majorité des familles chorfa en Kabylie (Algérie) sont issues de la lignée d'Idriss le Petit, fils d'Idriss le Grand, fils d'Abd Allah Al-Kamil dit « le Parfait », fils d'Al-Hassan Al-Muthanna « le deuxième », fils d'Al-Hassan « Sibt » lui-même fils de l'imam Ali ibn Abi Talib et de Fatima Zahra, fille de Mahomet, prophète de l'Islam.

Histoire [modifier | modifier le code]

Les marabouts Chorfas du Maghreb se rattachent, pour beaucoup, traditionnellement à une migration venue de l'Oued Draa dans le centre du Maroc, mais aussi de l'Andalousie, en Espagne après la Reconquista à la fin du XV^e^ siècle, et se sont dispersés dans toutes les régions de l'Afrique du Nord, notamment au Maroc, en Algérie (surtout dans l'ouest et en Kabylie), en Tunisie et en Libye[6].

Le premier arrivé au Maghreb de la descendance de Ali ibn Abi Talib (gendre de Mahomet) est Idriss le Grand, le fondateur du royaume des Idrissides entre 789 et 985[7]. Après la chute de ce royaume au X^e^ siècle, leur descendance était tuée et pourchassée par le pro-fatimide Moussa ibn Abi Al-Afya el Miknasi. D'après la légende, ceux qui ont survécu aux massacres ont fui vers le désert et les montagnes pour se protéger[8].

Ils seraient arrivés en Kabylie entre le XII^e^ et le XV^e^ siècle, se voulant plus instruits que les montagnards et connaisseurs du droit musulman (Fiqh) mais surtout neutres dans les luttes tribales[9] ; ces « nouveaux-venus » ne tardèrent pas ainsi à acquérir la considération générale des habitants.

À l'époque, les conditions exigées pour la prétention au chérifat sont généralement la possession d'un manuscrit de l'arbre généalogique de la famille et le témoignage de quatre personnages eux-mêmes qui aiguise le plus ma curiosité c'est l'ordre maçonnique. Qu'est-ce que c'est ? Et le professeur d'histoire de lui dire.

Chorfa, comme le témoigne une attestation qui daterait de la fin du XIVe siècle, appartenant à un chérif andalou, remise à l'historien Ahmed Taoufik al Madani en 1979 à Alger [10].

-C'est la réunion de trois malédictions réciproques=l'hermétisme, le satanisme et le secret de l'appartenance et de l'initiation. Que le bon dieu nous en garde.

-Pourquoi ce ton sentencieux, réplique l'adolescent interloqué.

-Vois-tu, dans l'islam, on entre au grand jour, avec comme référents= le coran et la sunna du prophète (PSL).

En franc-maçonnerie, l'impétrant qui ne peut être pauvre ou ignorant, est admis dans une loge. Il enfile un tablier fait de peau de porc et une paire de gants qui symbolisent son innocence face au meurtre d'Hiram. Agenouillé, les yeux débandés, il fait acte d'allégeance devant le vénérable maitre au-dessus duquel, sont accrochés, l'équerre et le compas. L'initié entame le voyage spirituel qui consiste à le sortir des ténèbres pour la lumière. De l'ignorance à la connaissance. Celui aussi de la révélation intérieure incommunicable. Il s'engage ensuite, sur le volume de la loi sacrée, à garder le secret maçonnique, et jure sa fidélité à l'ordre, et se vouera à soutenir ses frères maçons dans le besoin ou en difficulté.

Alors il est apparenté au mot de passe secret. Car tout est secret= son appartenance, la liste des frères, les réunions ou tenues. Ainsi en loge, il est formellement interdit d'écrire. A Défaut d'une mémoire d'éléphant, avoir une mémoire fidèle pour accéder aux grades supérieurs. S'engage alors pour lui, la suppression de tous les obstacles à la pénétration de la lumière. En attendant, le voila franc-maçon, titre qui lui sert de passe-droit pour une ascension sociale rapide, source de toutes les magouilles, de toutes les collusions et de toutes les pratiques mafieuses.

-Si je vous saisis bien, notre religion est donc ennemie de cet ordre ?

-Bien sûr. Car célébrer le culte d'Allah dans la mosquée, le jour, et le soir se rendre au temple maçonnique pour faire allégeance à Lucifer, n'est pas seulement outrageant. C'est un sacrilège. Il faut être habité par l'esprit du mal pour oser le faire.

Ce dialogue imagé, est le résumé de mon propos.
La franc-maçonnerie opérative
Au Moyen Age, après le triomphe du christianisme, les grandes villes d'Europe cherchaient à se doter de cathédrales dont la construction prenait des années comme pour les châteaux forts. Pour accomplir ces travaux délicats, les maçons taillaient des pierres, les ajustaient avant de les encastrer. Ils savaient travailler les pierres dont personne n'avait la maitrise ; mais gardaient jalousement le secret de leur corporation et articulaient des codes secrets par des salutations étranges.
Ces tailleurs de pierres construisaient leur demeure, les loges en face de leur ouvrage. Ils étaient souvent robustes et pour cause, mais analphabètes pour la plupart. O n entrait dans la profession comme novice 8 à 10 ans. Les apprentis soumis à une entière obéissance au maitre, apprenaient les rudiments d'un métier hiérarchisé, contenus dans un parchemin ou rouleau, appelé les Anciens Devoirs. Leur vie était partagée entre la taille des pierres le jour et les solitudes nocturnes dans les loges. Ainsi, ils organisaient des rituels en puisant dans leur imaginaire des origines fabuleuses, mythiques et bibliques. La légende se substitue à la vérité.
Abraham, détenteur des 7 sciences dont celle de la géométrie, a enseigné aux Egyptiens l'art de construire. Tout le temps que les Hébreux étaient en Egypte, ils construisaient des pyramides. En Israël, ils ont édifié sous la direction du tyrien Hiram Abif, le temple de Jérusalem ; et par une chaine mystérieuse, ont transmis le métier aux constructeurs de cathédrales. L'équerre, le compas et les 2 colonnes du Temple demeurent des symboles forts de la maçonnerie. Pour des illettrés, l'enseignement est vite compris et bien gardé. Dans les sociétés africaines où l'oral prime encore sur l'écrit, les superstitions fondées sur des affabulations, continuent encore à faire recette. Point n'est besoin de cohérence logique, ni de vérité historique, tout est obscur. La légende et le mythe servent de fil conducteur. Bref, toute cette histoire du métier, avec ses obligations morales et professionnelles, bien alimentées, est rapportée dans les manuscrits Regius et les Anciens Devoirs (Old Charges) par des clercs, eux aussi, peu soucieux de chronologie et de faits avérés ? Surtout que l'église protégeait ses ouvriers fort précieux. Le manuscrit Réqius fixe le statut et les conditions de travail, de recrutement de salaire des tailleurs de pierre ; la fraternité d'entraide, enfin la transmission du savoir par les canaux hiérarchisés : l'apprenti, le compagnon, le maitre.
Vers la fin du xvi siècle, les cathédrales, les églises et les châteaux sont construits en briques.
Frappés de plein fouet par le chômage,, les maçons s'organisaient en mutuelle dans le but de se soutenir. Pour augmenter les cotisations, ils ouvrirent leurs loges aux artisans, ouvriers et petits commerçants ? Les bourgeois et les riches aristocrates, qui y firent par la suite leur entrée, prirent progressivement le contrôle des 4 loges de Londres. Ces nouveaux intrus, hautement éduqués, souvent membres de sociétés scientifiques, étrangers à tout travail manuel, imprimèrent à la maçonnerie sa marque spéculative, celle que nous lui connaissons aujourd'hui.

Les Constitutions de James Anderson

En 1717, les loges que comptait Londres, s'étaient rassemblées et élisaient un grand maitre du nom d'Anthony Sayer.

Deux ans plus tard, le révérend, Dr James Théophile Désagliers, 1683-1774, est porté à la tête de l'obédience. Sa famille avait émigré en Angleterre après la révocation de l'Edit de Nantes. Il devint même ministre de l'Eglise du Royaume.

Aussi donc, la grande loge d'Angleterre (interconfessionnelle) se pose en lieu d'ancrage de la franc-maçonnerie moderne. Les loges ayant perdu tout caractère professionnel, n'en conservent que les symboles. A la place de la construction des édifices, c'est une construction intérieure qui élève les hommes de la terre vers le ciel.

Anderson, tente de revisiter les Anciens Devoirs pour les purifier des incohérences grossières.

11 articles parlent de l'obligation d'appartenir à la religion chrétienne et insistent sur le loyalisme envers l'Etat et ses institutions. Rien de plus normal pour une société conservatrice imprégnée de religiosité. Ces mêmes articles formalisent les relations de fraternité et de solidarité entre frères maçons dans la loge et avec la plus grande loge de Londres. Des lors, pour être franc-maçon, il faut croire en Dieu ou à un Etre suprême. Mais quel Etre suprême ? Car ce terme ne figure pas dans la bible, ni dans le coran. Cependant, les rituels et les symboles sont explicités par la loge, l'obédience et le rite pratiqué.

Le plan de carrière est fixé par des grades et des degrés : de l'apprenti au vénérable maitre.

Cette confrérie, à but humaniste, universaliste et moral, cherche à unir les hommes dans leur différence, mais interdit les discussions politiques ou religieuses. Ce club fermé, ne reçoit pas les femmes, les pauvres, les noirs, les ignorants. Il est plutôt réservé de préférence aux riches bourgeois et surtout les nobles avec l'expansion coloniale, la maçonnerie s'adapta et s'ouvrit aux noirs sauf aux Etat Unis où ils ont leur propre ordre appelé " Prince hall.

Dans les 6 derniers articles, il est question de l'attitude à prendre dans les réunions ou tenues. La prise de parole est ritualisée et systématisée par un règlement ; il s'agit d'aider à la maitrise de soi. L'apprenti n'a pas droit à la parole, son attitude consiste à écouter et à mémoriser.

Apres la tenue, des cotisations élevées, sont versées « le tronc de la veuve » pour soutenir les frères fauchés.

Reste alors à développer les rapports de fraternité, d'amitié, et de confiance mutuelle. Le tout alimenté par un banquet appelé Agape où la nourriture et l'alcool sont en abondance. Ces rencontres exclusivement masculines virent souvent à la débauche.

Pour préserver cette atmosphère bon enfant, tout est permis, sauf que les divergences politiques ou religieuses, s'arrêtent au seuil de la porte.
D'autres points parlent de la relation avec les profanes. A ce niveau, éviter de parler de son appartenance maçonnique ou celle de son « frère », même pas à ses intimes : ami, épouse…
Grace au tuilage, il apprend les signes particuliers de reconnaissance, par la parole ou le signe, pour permettre aux membres de se reconnaitre afin de se protéger des ennemis prompts à percer leurs mystères. L'entraide est le ciment unificateur des membres, en particulier pour ceux qui sont en situation difficile : argent, recasement, promotion, poursuites judiciaires.
Cette solidarité agissante est un attrait pour les arrivistes, les carriéristes et les opportunistes de tout point. De plus est que les conflits internes sont réglés par la justice maçonnique qui opère selon « laver son linge sale en famille ».
Enfin la 3è partie des constitutions d'Anderson comprend 39 articles sur les règlements généraux. Elles parlent de l'organisation des loges autour d'une obédience. Du respect pour les dirigeants, à commencer par le grand maitre à qui l'on doit obéissance, du venerable maitre pour lequel la soumission doit être totale.
Club initiatique où se perpétue la fraternité humaine. Peut être mais dans la réalité, c'est un club de service qui place l'intérêt maçonnique au dessus de l'intérêt général ou national.
Aucune originalité car tout est emprunt rien n'a été inventé. Le récit demeure encore événementiel, invérifiable. Aux maçons opératifs, ils ont emprunté les outils : compas, équerre, maillet, règle, fil à plomb...
.Le symbolisme religieux est emprunté au satanisme et au christianisme. Seule leur utilisation secrète les rend maçons. A l' origine, deux rites étaient reconnus, il y'en aura une centaine au fil des siècles.
Selon G. Mazzini, satanisme, grand maitre du grand Orient d'Italie « peu importe la diversité de rites ou de formes puisque la pensée est unique ».

Le discours d'Andrew Ramsay (1686-1743) sur l'origine templière de la maçonnerie.
Andrew Ramsay, grand orateur de la loge de France, était exilé écossais. Il fait remonter la maçonnerie aux ordres religieux des Templiers et Hospitaliers, contrairement aux Anciens Devoirs (Old Charges) qui la rattachent au Temple de Salomon. Le 30e degré de cet ordre est le grand élu, chevalier kadosh (en hébreu saint) ; donc, un lien ombilical avec les Templiers qui ont subi l'influence du mysticisme oriental.

L'année de la publication du discours de Ramsay, le pape clément XII excommunie les francs-maçons, en raison du secret de leurs assemblées, et dit-il « pour d'autres motifs justes et raisonnables de nous connus. »
Pour Ramsay, alors catholique ; « Du temps des croisades dans la Palestine, plusieurs princes, seigneurs et citoyens, entrèrent en société, firent vœu de rétablir les Temples chrétiens dans la terre sainte… Après les déplorables travers des croisades… le grand prince Edouard, ramènera tous ses confrères, et cette colonie de frères s'établit en Angleterre. Alors les membres en prirent le nom de franc-maçons. Depuis ce temps-là, la grande Bretagne fut le siège de notre ordre.
Extrait du discours de Ramsay
La légende affirme que Pierre d'Aumont, grand maitre, les a conduits en Ecosse où ils bénéficiaient de la protection de la Couronne et y perpétuèrent l'ordre du Temple. Leurs pratiques et leurs rites initiatiques secrets qu'ils partageaient avec les tailleurs de pierres écossais, a évolué vers la maçonnerie. La construction de la chapelle de Roslin, un sanctuaire bizarre, avec des motifs étranges, est à leur actif. Sur la face, sont incrustés des angles, des genoux accroupis, des mains sur le cœur. On l'appelle la cathédrale des codes ou la chapelle de Mary.
En 1599 ? LA 1e loge dite Ecossaise est fondée. C'est le Rite Ecossais Rectifié, qui revendique une filiation spirituelle avec l'ordre du Temple.
A ce jour, aucun historien n'a soutenu un lien quelconque entre templiers et francs-maçons.
A l'origine, c'était une milice destinée à sécuriser les routes peu sûres des pèlerins pour Jérusalem. Ces moines-chevaliers, au service du roi et du patriarche de Jérusalem, qui leur céda une partie de l'Esplanade de la Mosquée Al Aqsa, se faisaient appeler Templiers en souvenir du Temple de Salomon dont il ne restait rien, sinon le mur des Lamentations construit par Hérode le grand, et surmonté de briques cubiques, à l'époque des Omeyyades.
Templiers et Hospitaliers, s'engageaient à garder les lieux saints. Les premiers étaient vêtus de manteau blanc à croix rouge, les seconds du manteau noir ou rouge à croix blanche. Tout en comportant une blanche militaire, les Hospitaliers s'occupaient en particulier des pauvres et des malades.
Les Templiers qui s'interdisaient de fuir devant l'ennemi, constituaient une force redoutable. Leur devise était « ne pas céder au combat ».
Au nombre de 1000 à 1500, ils venaient de tous les pays d'occident une véritable force internationale sans laquelle les envahisseurs n'auraient pas, à eux seuls, réussi à conserver leurs conquêtes, pendant deux siècles.

Entre temps, les templiers ont gagné en importance, en puissance militaire et financière.
Ils ont sous leur contrôle de vastes territoires et la garde d'importantes forteresses, sans parler des profits tirés des lettres d'échange pour les pèlerins.
Mais après la perte d'Acre en 1291, ces moins-soldats se replient en Europe. Leur fortune et leur influence ne tardèrent pas à inquiéter et monarques et rois.
En 1307, Philipe le Bel fit arrêter simultanément 138 templiers avec leur chef le grand maitre du chevalier du Temple Jacques Molay.
Sur l'accusation de reniement du christ, d'homosexualité et Sodomie, le tout aggravé de l'adoration d'une idole appelée Baphomet. Ils seront tous condamnés au supplice du bûcher et leurs biens donnés aux Hospitaliers. D'autres pays suivirent la France.
Les rescapés changèrent de nom et d'accoutrement, pour se fondre dans la masse, avant de fuir sous d'autres cieux. Le coup de grâce vint du Pape Clément v en 1312 avec la dissolution de l'ordre qui, de fait, avait cessé d'exister.
Maçonnerie et Religion
En proclament que « tout est dieu, ou Dieu est tout » la maçonnerie relativise la religion révélée en tant qu'attachement à la foi au même titre que d'autres attitudes de pensée. De ce fait, elle réunit pêle-mêle, cultes et croyances, les cultes d'Egypte, l'occultisme, le spiritisme, l'hermétisme.
C'est donc, en toute logique que divorçant avec la Grande Loge interconfessionnelle de Londres que le grand Orient de France supprime en 1877 la croyance en Dieu et privilégié la liberté totale de conscience, la recherche de la vérité et l'adhésion à la morale universelle.
E n proclamant sa neutralité religieuse, elle enlève progressivement toute foi religieuse à l'initié par le silence et le secret maçonnique. L e frère de lumière est invité à penser par lui-même, en dehors de tout dogme.
Parmi ses symboles et rites, le pentagramme, étoile à 5 branches, révélé au 2e degré, représente dans le satanisme, le bouc de Mendés.
Albert Pike, fondateur du Ku Klux Klan, raciste anti-noir, 33e degré.
-Dans « Morales et Dogmes » -prétend que « la religion maçonnique doit être maintenue dans la pureté de la doctrine luciférienne, la vraie religion est le satanisme. Lucifer est le dieu de la lumière et le dieu des Bons luttant pour l'humanité contre le dieu des ténèbres et des enfers ».
La Rose-Croix, une autre variante de la maçonnerie, affirme que le Dieu de la Bible n'existe pas. Le 18e degré de la Rose-Croix, est ouvertement antireligieux.
C'est tout naturellement que le Vatican considère la maçonnerie comme une secte impie, se fondant sur l'enseignement de Jésus-Christ qui dit : Jean 3 : 19,21 « Or voici d'où vient le jugement : la lumière est venue dans le monde, mais les hommes ont mieux aimé les ténèbres, que la lumière, car leurs œuvres étaient mauvaises. Car celui qui pratique des choses viles a de la haine pour la lumière, de peur que ses œuvres ne soient reprises. Mais celui qui fait ce qui est vrai vient de la lumière, afin que ses œuvres soient manifestées comme ayant été opérées en accord avec Dieu ».

Huit Pape les ont excommuniés, dont les derniers en date est le Pape Jean XXIII en 1983.
L'Islam, qui rejette toute idolâtrie, toute représentation imagée, est une religion de foi totale et absolue en Dieu, dégagée de toute forme d'association. Cette foi intérieure du croyant, est vivifiée, en plus des 5 piliers de l'Islam, par l'amour du prochain.
L'opposition du musulman au frère de lumière est inconciliable, irréductible. Dans la plupart des pays arabo-persiques, les fils de la Veuve, n'ont pas droit de cité. En Arabie Saoudite, ils sont inconnus.
L'Egypte de Gamal Abdel Nasser a fermé leurs loges en 1952, Un Fatwa prononcé par l'université Al Azahar les assimile aux idolâtres.
L'Algérie indépendante, sous Ben Bella, interdit toute activité maçonne. En Iran, la Révolution Khomeyniste ne leur laissa aucun répit, après la fermeture de leurs loges.
Dans les Territoires occupés de Palestine, la maçonnerie alliée au judaïsme est perçue en ennemie de l'Islam et de la Cause des peuples opprimés. La Turquie, après le coup d'Etat de 1908, par des officiers, est le pays musulman qui comptait le plus de maçons.
Depuis l'avènement du parti islamique AKP (Parti de la Justice et du Développement) ceux qui ont rejoint sous les colonnes, sont en net recul. Paradoxalement en Afrique les temples maçonniques se multiplient, aussi bien chez les anglophones que parmi les francophones.
Franc-maçonnerie et pouvoir
L'histoire de l'Humanité s'inscrit dans une logique de convulsions et de contradictions, indispensables à son évolution.
Elle se déploie à des périodes et dates manquantes en des lieux déterminés. La maçonnerie les transcende pour les résumer en légendes. Elle dit le contraire de ce qu'elle fait sans pour autant s'interdire de s'approprier les conquêtes des peuples sur leurs oppresseurs.
La Révolution de 1789, c'est nous. La Déclaration des Droits de l'Homme, notre œuvre. La Démocratie, notre trouvaille.
Au nom des mêmes principes, ils ferment les yeux quand les F16 et les drones Américains bombardent la Libye après l'Irak pour leur voler leur pétrole ; ou qu'Israël procède à un massacre à guichet fermé sur Gaza.
Pour se parer des accusations de collusion avec la finance internationale pour dominer le monde, elle invoque ses activités philanthropiques et humanistes mais reste muette sur l'exploitation des masses laborieuses.

En Afrique francophone, les confréries maçonniques sont des relais efficaces de la françafrique qui pérennise la mainmise économique, commerciale et culturelle de la France dans ses anciennes colonies.
Elles sont affilées pour la plupart aux obédiences françaises= le Grand Orient de France, la Grande Loge Nationale française.
La Rehfram (Rencontres humanistes et fraternelles africaines et malgaches) qui regroupe l'essentiel des loges africaines, se réunit chaque année dans une capitale africaine pour échanger des humanités et des fraternités. Cette partie visible de l'iceberg cache une autre réalité plus profonde= aplanir les hostilités ouvertes entre frères de lumière. Comme celle qui a opposé Pascal Lissouba membre du grand Orient de France et Sassou Nguesso, initié dans un temple de Dakar. En 1997, ils avaient plongé leur pays dans une guerre civile sanglante par milices armées interposées, des milliers de congolais y laissèrent leur vie « Cet exemple reconnait le monde diplomatique de septembre 1997, en dit long sur l'influence des franc-maçons en Afrique francophone ». Sous la colonisation, la maçonnerie s'était beaucoup investie pour le triomphe de la mission culturelle et civilisatrice de la France sur « des peuples vierges de passé et d'écriture ». Son manteau anticlérical abandonné en métropole, elle affichait ouvertement son hostilité à l'Islam maraboutique imprégné de la résistance omarienne.
L'indépendance acquise, beaucoup de dirigeants, pour des raisons de souveraineté nationale, religieuses ou idéologiques, ont interdit dans leur pays les activités maçonniques.
Au Mali le nationaliste Modibo Keita ferma la loge « Art et Science ». En Guinée, le révolutionnaire Sékou Touré, après « le complot maçonnique » de 1961, a décapité ses chefs.
En 1963, le très catholique Houphouët Boigny, jéta en prison, Kacou Aoulou et ses frères de la Loge « Fraternité africaine ».
Le marxisant Mathieu Kérékou au pouvoir au Bénin, comme pour se conformer à la lointaine Résolution de 1922 du 4e congrès de la défunte Internationale invitant les partis communistes à exclure les maçons de leur rang, il les cloua au pilori.
Après une décennie de repli tactique, la grande loge nationale française opérait une Persée spectaculaire en Afrique francophone. Toutes les loges rouvraient et reprenaient du service. Comme un caméléon, la maçonnerie sut s'adapter aux situations changeantes. Elle reste inféodée aux régimes en place, fuissent-ils des plus sanguinaires. La loi du silence aidant, elle place en orbite ses hommes dans les hautes sphères du pouvoir. De fait, s'installe une force occulte qui donne ses directives et applique les mots d'ordre des puissances de tutelle.
Amedée Dunet, ex-33e degré, ex-vénérable secrétaire général de la grande loge de France expliquait : « Elu grand secrétaire de la grande loge de France, j'ai connu le fond de la lâcheté humaine, de la cupidité, de l'hypocrisie, du mal. J'ai tout vu, tout su, tout connu. J'ai quitté la secte écœuré, affaibli, anéanti. Les principes écrits ne sont jamais appliqués, les chefs, des chefs de caverne. La franc-maçonnerie est un instrument entre les mains de roués et de corrompus. C'est un syndicat d'arrivistes, sans scrupules, de petits hommes sans conscience… C'est une erreur de croire que la maçonnerie est un groupement d'hommes de gauche ». Conférence-1924-Strasbourg

La Franc-maçonnerie au Sénégal

La première loge maçonne vit le jour au Sénégal sous domination coloniale à St Louis. Dans son préambule de constitution, elle précise que c'est : «En l'an de vraie lumière 5781, le 9e jour du mois maçonnique et de l'ère vulgaire 9 juillet 1781 ».

A St louis où le commerce de la gomme prenait le pas sur le trafic de l'esclavage, la franc-maçonnerie était à la mode dans la société coloniale, les frères de cette loge se composaient de militaires, fonctionnaires et négociants de la compagnie du Sénégal, évidemment tous français. Trois loges seront créées plus tard : « La Parfaite Union », l'union sénégalaise et « l'Avenir du Sénégal ».

En 1834, des personnalités métisses marquantes dans le tissu économique et politique rejoignirent sous les colonnes. Ainsi, le premier initié mulâtre est Pellegrin François, maire de St Louis, ont suivi Nicolas d'Erneville, Valentin Batiste, Crespin Auguste. Les grandes familles de la petite bourgeoisie métisse.

Il faut attendre 1882 pour voir la maçonnerie coloniale s'ouvrir aux noirs avec Biram Sady et le capitaine des tirailleurs Mamadou Raçine.

Vers la fin du XIXe siècle, St Louis perd son rôle de carrefour commercial, au profit de Dakar capitale de l'AOF où les grands fonctionnaires ont ouvert la première loge en 1899. L'économie fondée essentiellement sur l'agriculture et la commercialisation des matières premières, a pour pôle d'attraction l'arachide, le principal produit d'exportation.

A) Blaise Diagne

La même année, Blaise Diagne, fonctionnaire des douanes, est initié aux mystères de la maçonnerie dans la loge l'Amitié du grand orient de France à St Denis de la Réunion.

L'homme est intelligent. Tout jeune, il raccolait des prix dans son école. Courageux et ambitieux, il avait le flair des opportunités politiques et ne tarissait pas de ressources imaginatives pour atteindre son but.

En 20 ans, il gravit tous les 3 grades et les 33 degrés et, est élu vénérablement maitre de la loge Pythagore en Guyane. A Paris, il est admis au Conseil de l'Ordre du Grand Orient de France. C'est tout naturellement qu'en sa mémoire, la 1e loge de Dakar est baptisée à son nom en 1977. Il est le père spirituel des frères de la lumière du Sénégal.

Des jeunes élites, pressées de s'élever dans l'échelle sociale, investissent avec les libanais, les loges de la région du Cap-Vert ou les temples de la Rose-croix.

Michel Quillardet vénérable maitre du GOF en visite à Dakar en 2007, estimait les enfants d'Hiram dans notre pays au nombre de 3000. Les groupes de bienfaisance qu'ils animent ne sont autre que l'excroissance de la Veuve. Dans une causerie célèbre, intitulée depuis, le Fatwa du Ramadan, le grand guide Abdoul Aziz SY stigmatisé la pratique maçonne assimilée a l'idolâtrie, et voué aux gémonies les musulmans adeptes des loges Le quotidien Walf Fadjri avait vu juste en dénonçant ces clubs de service couverts de lauriers et que l'on appelle = Rotary ou Lion's club.

Au plan politique, Blaise Diagne qui fut maire de Dakar et député colonial, sans interruption de 1914 à 1934, était un politicien avisé, manœuvrier, et à l'occasion machiavélique.
Galandou Diouf, un de ses lieutenants, hostile à l'administration coloniale, a ouvertement combattu son accointance avec les maisons bordelaises détentrices du monopole du commerce. Tout comme les nationalistes africains, en particulier, L amine Senghor communiste de la première heure, qui voyaient en lui l'instrument servile du colonisateur.
En pleine guerre, Blaise Diagne fit voter, le 29 septembre 1916, la loi sur les 4 communes, donnant aux ressortissants de Dakar, St Louis, Rufisque, et Gorée, la citoyenneté française, sans pour autant, leur conférer les mêmes droits que le colon français.
Les affres de la guerre ne sont pas sans rapport à cette loi restrictive.
Entre 1914 et 1916, 50000 soldats étaient recrutés. L'Afrique, ruinée par les épidémies et la famine consécutive au dépeuplement des campagnes et aux réquisitions de céréales et de bétail pour effort de guerre, était exsangue.
Devant l'obligation de fournir encore un certain contingent, les chefs locaux donnaient aux recruteurs leurs anciens esclaves à la place de leurs fils ou neveux.
L'exception vint d'El Hadj Malick Sy, grande figure de l'Islam, qui s'est refusé à laisser partir au front un seul de ses 500 talibés, des adolescents et adultes, confiés à lui, pour leurs humanités coraniques. Il donna son fils ainé Mohamed qui disparaitra à la bataille de Salonique. Ses disciples seront le fer de lance du Tidianisme à l'assaut des dernières poches de résistance du paganisme.
Une autre grande figure, le capitaine Joost Van Vollenhoven, d'origine néerlandaise, nommé gouverneur le 3 juin 1917, s'opposa à un nouveau recrutement massif exigé par le ministre des colonies en termes pathétiques : « je vous demande, monsieur le ministre, de ne pas donner l'ordre de procéder à de nouveaux recrutements de troupes noires. Vous mettriez le pays à feu et à sang. Vous le réuniriez complètement et ce, sans aucun résultat. Nous sommes allés non seulement au-delà de ce qui était sage mais au-delà de ce qui était possible de demander à un pays En répondant au ministre qu'il ne pouvait obtempérer, il démissionna et alla au front où l'attendait la mort. Par devoir de mémoire une grande avenue de Bamako porte son nom. Tant il est vrai que pour rendre l'idéal à la réalité, l'ultime sacrifice n'est pas à écarter.
Blaise Diagne contre ses frères de race
Le général Robert Georges Nivelle, chargé de défendre Verdun, usée par deux années de guerre

de tranchées, atroce, où chaque périmètre de terrain étale ses morts sans nombre, décide de porter l'assaut final contre les Allemands. L e 16 avril 1917, il lance une offensive massive, connue sous l'appellation de Bataille de chemin des Dames. L'échec est total. Le coût humain effarant ; 350000 morts et blessés. Une hécatombe. Pour ne rien arranger des mutineries éclatent contre les mauvaises conditions au front, ajoutées aux révoltes des circonscrits qui refusent souvent de combattre. Alors la France se tourne, encore une fois de plus, sur ce qui restait de la musculature dans ses colonies africaines.

Fort de cette promotion, il est envoyé en Afrique avec une feuille de route bien établie : recrutement de 64000 hommes en AOF et 14000 en AEF. Dés lors, il distribue, à volonté, promesses et bonnes paroles. Ainsi, chaque engagé aura doit automatiquement à une médaille militaire. Un certificat de bien manger (la famille sévissait) une tenue militaire, la citoyenneté française, et enfin, la garantie d'un emploi après la guerre.

Son mentor Clemenceau disait qu' « on ne ment jamais autant qu'avant les élections, pendant la guerre ou après la chasse. En attendant, les agents recruteurs bien motivés, parcouraient les campagnes à la recherche de « chair à canon ».

Dans les provinces du Sine et du Saloum des centaines de jeunes fuyaient en Gambie anglaise où l'engagement n'était pas obligatoire. Jamais le Sénégal n'avait connu une misère aussi profonde que pendant la grande guerre. Malgré tout Blaise Diagne parvint à recruter 73000 hommes.

Après les hostilités, la plupart des survivants regagnèrent leurs villages pour reprendre leurs activités agricoles ; car très peu eurent droit à un emploi.

Le maire de Dakar assimilationniste convaincu, s'enorgueillissait du droit de vote et du titre de sujet français pour les ressortissants des 4 communes qui se distinguaient de la grande masse des indigènes taillables et corvéables à souhait grâce au système du travail forcé. « La France, disait-il, seule est capable de travailler pour l'avancement de la race noire ». En 1921, il est élu président de la commission sur les colonies. Entre 1931 et 1932, Blaise Diagne occupe le poste de sous-secrétaire d'Etat aux colonies dans le gouvernement de Pierre Laval. Dans son livre intitulé Blaise Diagne, Aly Khaly Dieng, présente le personnage comme une marionnette entre les mains de l'homme blanc.

A sa mort en 1934, il a eu droit aux hommages des différentes obédiences françaises. A Dakar, les Lébous ont refusé son inhumation dans leur cimetière. En dépit de fortes pressions des autorités coloniales, ils sont restés dignes, fermes et résolus. Finalement, la dépouille mortelle de celui qu'on appelle le premier député noir, trouvera sa sépulture dans un petit coin, à l'entrée du cimetière des Abattoirs. C'est e le châtiment réservé par l'Histoire à ceux qui tournent le dos aux intérêts de leur peuple pour se mettre aux ordres de l'étranger. Ils tombent dans l'oubli.

C’est pour le ressusciter dans la mémoire collective que le président Wade a donné le nom de Blaise Diagne à l’aéroport international de N’Diass. Une insulte à la mémoire des milliers de morts africains dans la boucherie de la première guerre mondiale-une offense à la morale- un mépris des sénégalais. Mohamed Ibn Malick Sy, Van Vollenhoven et tant d’autres seraient-ils morts pour rien?
Comme hier en 1918, Blaise Diagne arnaquait ses concitoyens au nom d’une assimilation impossible. Comme aujourd’hui, Wade trompait son peuple sous le manteau d’un nationalisme ombrageux. Ils ont, tous les deux, en partage le simulacre maçonnique.
Tout le contraire de Mamadou Dia, ancien président du Conseil, pour qui, l’immense amour qu’il a toujours porté au Sénégal, l’a rendu aimable.

Je ne vais même pas prendre le risque de voter pour Macky qui donne des gages à tous les lobbies. Wade en a pour 3 ans et au moins il a de la poigne. Il vivra avec un gouvernement d'opposition ou d'union. Ce qui l'empêchera de faire passer son fils.

Mais Macky, non merci!!!!

Macky,ce candidat qui pose probleme.
1)Il est soupçonne non sans raison d'appartenir aux loges maçonniques
2)Il semble qu'il soit lie aux homosexuels et cela,depuis Petrosen ou il a connu une ascension rapide
3)Il est entoure d'intellectuels gauchistes qui lui dictent la conduite a tenir et on sait de quoi ceux la sont capables
4)Son parti est fondamentalement ethniciste comme celui de GBAGBO
5)Comme Simone GBAGBO , c'est sa femme qui porte la ceinture
6)Comme GBAGBO,il accepte toutes les conditions qu'on lui poses
7)En bon franc macon,il n'aime pas les marabouts,surtout les marabouts mourides

Avouez quand meme que cocktail est explosif.
Votez Wade,c'est voter pour un vieux monstre mourant.
Votez MACKY,c'est voter pour un monstre au summum de sa puissance

Nous savons ce qui en est d' Ablaye Wade concernant la franc-maçonnerie. Après des aveux circonstanciés, il décide de donner le nom de Blaise Diagne au nouvel aéroport non encore inauguré. Les sénégalais, ont dans leur majorité, classé Ablaye Wade, sauf répentir sincère. Mais pour ce qui est de Macky Sall, tant qu'il ne se sera pas publiquement prononcé sur sa prétendu appartenance à la franc-maçonnerie pour la réfuter, je ne voterai pas pour lui. A lui de choisir de perdre au moins une voix ?

Je trouve vos réactions trop à "l'emporte -pièce" . Je peux être admettre que vous ne soyez pas d'accord avec l'auteur de cet article que je trouve riche en enseignement mais la moindre des choses c'est de faire l'effort qu'il a fait en démontrant le non fondé de ses propos. A la place vous vous en prenez à cheikh Yérim qui n'est même pas l'administrateur de ce site pour le faire démentir des propos sur lesquels ses connaissances ne sont pas sûres d'être établies.

LES FRANÇAIS ET LA TRAITE DES ESCLAVES EN SÉNÉGAMBIE

L'histoire de la traite des esclaves en Sénégambie au 18e siècle est essentiellement celle de la concurrence franco-anglaise, surtout après l'expulsion des Hollandais de la côte à la suite de la guerre de la gomme dans les années 1720. Le premier contact des navigateurs français avec le fleuve Sénégal remonte au milieu du 15e siècle mais leur premier établissement fixe n'a été fondé qu'en 1638 quand Thomas Lambert construisit une loge de commerce sur la pointe de Bieurt, située à trois lieues de l'embouchure du fleuve[1]. En 1628 déjà, il avait fallu déloger les Anglais de cet endroit. Le capitaine dieppois Bontemps avait alors enlevé aux Anglais deux navires (le James et la Bénédiction) portant cent Nègres et une cargaison estimée à 130 000 livres[2].

Thomas Lambert était un capitaine marchand qui, depuis 1626 au moins, fréquentait l'Afrique. En 1638, les négociants associés de Rouen et Dieppe le choisirent pour conduire au Sénégal deux vaisseaux chargés de marchandises et de matériaux pour bâtir une habitation. Celle-ci fut construite en briques avec un appontement sur la rivière pour recevoir les cuirs et charger les barques. Elle subsista jusqu'en 1658 quant elle fut détruite par la mer qui avait rompu la barre. La seconde habitation, construite par le commis Louis Caulier, ayant été détruite aussi, les Dieppois furent obligés d'abandonner la place et de se retirer dans une petite île située au milieu du fleuve et mieux protégée contre l'assaut des vagues. Louis Caulier y construisit un fort en 1659. L'endroit, appelé Ndar par les autochtones, sera baptisé du nom de Saint-Louis en l'honneur du roi Louis XIV.

Premier établissement permanent des Français en Afrique, Saint-Louis du Sénégal a servi de base pour la mise en valeur des colonies françaises d'Amérique. Chef-lieu de la Concession du Sénégal et entrepôt général de vivres et marchandises de traite, la ville devint rapidement un foyer humain où se côtoyaient des Noirs, des Blancs et des mulâtres. Les limites de la Concession française du Sénégal avaient été fixées par les lettres patentes du roi de France de 1696, à savoir du Cap Blanc au nord, jusqu'à l'embouchure de la rivière Sierra Leone au sud. Mais, en fait, pendant la première moitié du 18e siècle, les Français se désintéressèrent de la partie de la côte située entre les Bissagos et la Sierra Leone. Les deux centres principaux de la concession étaient les établissements côtiers de Saint-Louis, à l'embouchure du fleuve Sénégal, et Gorée, au large de la presqu'île du Cap-Vert[3].

Le fort de Saint-Louis était la résidence du directeur général de la Concession. Protégée des incursions venant de la mer par la langue de Barbarie à l'ouest et, au sud, par la barre qui gêne le franchissement de l'embouchure, Saint-Louis commandait l'entrée du fleuve Sénégal. Les Français avaient l'habitude d'engager des équipages noirs, surtout des mulâtres libres de Saint-Louis et Gorée appelés Gourmettes, pour le cabotage le long des côtes africaines et le franchissement de la barre. Cette opération réussie, les navires de haute mer s'arrêtaient devant le fort d'où partait une flottille pour assurer le commerce du fleuve. Pendant la saison des basses eaux, le commerce ne se faisait guère au-delà de Podor à cause de la rupture du cours d'eau en plusieurs endroits du fait du retrait des eaux. Le mil, les cuirs et peaux et surtout la gomme étaient alors négociés aux « escales » dites du Désert, du Coq et du Terrier Rouge dans le Fuuta Tooro[5]. Au moment de la crue, la flottille remontait le fleuve Sénégal jusqu'au confluent de la Falémé et ses environs, c'est-à-dire au pays de Galam.

Ce pays était le poumon économique de la Concession avec l'or et les esclaves comme principaux produits de traite. Pour Saugnier, c'est « le lieu des bonnes affaires […]. On se procure chez cette nation beaucoup d'esclaves que les caravanes y conduisent de diverses contrées de l'Afrique. On y traite en abondance, or, morphil, pagnes et mille autres objets[6] ». Au-delà du Galam, toute la région du Haut-Sénégal-Niger était intégrée à la mouvance de Saint-Louis du Sénégal. Cette ville aurait été le plus grand centre de traite négrière en Afrique n'eussent été les difficultés de la navigation sur le fleuve Sénégal et la concurrence des Anglais, solidement implantés en Gambie, qui parvenaient à détourner vers ce pays une partie des caravanes qui allaient au Galam.

Selon Prosper Cultru, la première expédition française au Galam date de 1667. Les Français avaient alors envoyé une trentaine d'hommes dans des barques, au moment de la crue, l'objectif étant de savoir si l'on pouvait naviguer de la rivière du Sénégal à celle de la Gambie. Cette première tentative se solda par un échec car les membres de l'expédition furent décimés par la fatigue. Le 23 juin 1685, une deuxième expédition conduite par Chambonneau, directeur de la Concession, s'arrêta au Fuuta Tooro car le souverain du pays ne voulait pas « qu'il allât en Galam à cause de Sambaboüé (Samba Booy), son ennemi, qui s'y était réfugié, avec qui il craignait qu'il n'eût quelque commerce[7] ». Par la suite, le Fuuta obligera plusieurs expéditions à renoncer au voyage de Galam. Les souverains de ce royaume, de même que ceux de tous les pays riverains du fleuve, conditionnaient le droit de commerce dans leurs territoires, ainsi que le passage au pays de Galam, au paiement de redevances appelées « coutumes ». Le souverain du Fuuta, par exemple, percevait des traitants européens, avec force protocole, divers articles de traite désignés sous les noms évocateurs de « bonjour du Roy », « grand bonjour du Roy », « coutume du Roy », « coutume des femmes du Roy », « coutume de l'alquier du Roy », « coutume de Camalinque[8] ».

Le directeur de la Compagnie était désigné familièrement par les indigènes sous le nom « Borom Ndar » (le Seigneur de Ndar). Ce qui précède montre qu'il n'était pas tout puissant, loin s'en fallait. André Brüe, directeur de la Compagnie du Sénégal à partir de 1697 et premier concepteur d'une présence impérialiste française en Afrique occidentale bien avant Faidherbe[9], l'apprit à ses dépens pour avoir cherché à imposer les intérêts de la Compagnie au détriment de ceux de ses partenaires au Sénégal. Il s'en tira après de longs jours de captivité et une forte rançon au profit de Lat Sukaabe Faal, souverain des royaumes Wolof du Kajoor et du Bawol, de 1695 à 1720[10]. La faiblesse relative du « Borom Ndar » explique à cette époque sa propension à utiliser ses partenaires africains les uns contre les autres pour s'accommoder à la réalité du terrain en attendant, plus de trois siècles plus tard, d'asseoir sa souveraineté absolue sur le pays. Delcourt n'a pas tort de considérer la vallée du fleuve Sénégal comme le meilleur champ d'étude de la politique française dans ses rapports avec les populations indigènes africaines, surtout quand il s'agit de maintenir un équilibre relatif entre les communautés noires et arabo-berbères[11].

Sous André Brüe, un premier fort fut construit au Galam en 1699, mais il fut emporté par les eaux en 1702[12]. En 1710, commença l'édification d'un nouveau fort qui sera achevé en 1714 et baptisé Fort Saint-Joseph[13]. La traite du fleuve était un véritable casse-tête pour les négociants français. Il fallut recourir à un personnel indigène nombreux. En 1720, toute la concession ne comptait que 98 employés civils dont 27 ouvriers et domestiques noirs et mulâtres. En 1736, il y avait 368 employés civils dont 229 ouvriers et domestiques noirs et mulâtres. Le personnel indigène était beaucoup plus important car les employés noirs et mulâtres de la marine de traite n'étaient pas recensés avec les ouvriers et domestiques[14]. Les embarcations utilisées dans le commerce du fleuve étaient des barques à fond plat que les Wolof appellent « mbana », gros porteurs évasés, plus aptes à la navigation fluviale que maritime, d'une capacité utile de dix à vingt-cinq tonnes[15]. Les chefs de ces embarcations, les « maîtres de barques », étaient choisis pour leur connaissance parfaite du fleuve. Ils étaient flanqués de leurs « mousses », apprentis navigateurs, et de « pileuses », femmes indigènes recrutées pour faire la cuisine et laver le linge. Des « maîtres de langues » étaient engagés pour leur parfaite connaissance des coutumes et langues du pays et leur aptitude de négociateurs infatigables. Ils étaient toujours au cœur des situations les plus dramatiques qu'ils contribuaient à apaiser. Ils pouvaient aussi être à l'origine de malentendus surtout quand ils parlaient un français trop approximatif. Toutefois, les « laptots », navigateurs et soldats à l'occasion, prototypes des futurs tirailleurs sénégalais, étaient les auxiliaires les plus indispensables. Ils se recrutaient parmi toutes les nations du fleuve, surtout parmi les Bambara. Selon Lacourbe, « sans ces gens là il serait impossible de monter au haut de la rivière ; car ce sont eux qui, quand le vent est contraire, halent la barque à la cordelle et se mettent quelque fois dans l'eau jusqu'au col, lorsque le bord de la rivière n'est pas praticable[16] ». C'étaient généralement des esclaves dont plusieurs appartenaient aux « signares » de Saint-Louis, dames de compagnie, généralement mariées à des Blancs, qui contrôlaient une bonne partie du commerce de la ville selon Pruneau de Pommegorge[17].

Environ deux tiers des esclaves vendus dans la Concession du Sénégal provenaient du commerce de Galam, soit en moyenne 1 300 à 1 500 esclaves par an. Certaines années, le nombre d'esclaves traités au Galam était supérieur à 3 000. L'apogée du commerce de Galam fut atteinte entre 1720 et 1750. Dans son Mémoire sur le commerce du Sénégal (1752), Pruneau de Pommegorge nous apprend que les bâtiments de rivière engagés dans le commerce de Galam mettaient ordinairement quarante jours pour y monter et en descendaient en huit à quinze jours. Certaines barques parvenaient à effectuer deux, voire trois fois le voyage avant la baisse des eaux et chacune d'elle pouvait apporter 80 à 120 captifs[18]. Durant tout le 18e siècle, les esclaves capturés sur le Haut-Sénégal et dans les pays voisins étaient aussi acheminés vers d'autres points de traite de la Sénégambie, notamment en Sierra Leone, aux comptoirs portugais de Guinée, et surtout en Gambie où des prix suffisamment élevés attiraient les commerçants Jula, Jaxanke et Soninke[19]. Abdoulaye Bathily estime que la Gambie a détourné bon an mal an, l'équivalent de 25 % du nombre d'esclaves traités par les Français au Galam.

La Gambie était, avec la région des Bissagos, l'un des endroits de la côte où les compagnies reconnaissaient le droit pour les étrangers de posséder des établissements permanents. Les Anglais possédaient un fort – Fort James – sur une île située au milieu du fleuve. En amont de ce fort, ils interdisaient le passage aux Français car les captifs vendus dans la haute rivière coûtaient moins cher que ceux traités dans le cours inférieur. Le principal établissement des Français en Gambie était Albreda, sur la rive droite du fleuve, non loin de Fort James. Plus au sud, dans les fameuses Rivières du Sud, ils étaient établis à Bissao, Boulam et Cacheu où ils côtoyaient les Portugais. Toutefois, ils préférèrent abandonner ces établissements pour se livrer à la « traite volante » d'autant plus qu'ils ne pouvaient soutenir la concurrence avec les Luso-Africains établis de longue date dans la région et qui avaient tissé des liens très solides avec les chefs locaux. C'était dans les Rivières du Sud, zone rizicole par excellence, que le Sieur Herpin, capitaine du négrier l'Aurore, devait jeter l'ancre pour acheter du riz et des riziculteurs destinés à la Louisiane[20]. À propos de la Casamance, centre de gravité de ce royaume du riz, le sieur Pelletan notait : « on ignore quelle quantité de Nègres on y traite ; mais on sait que l'on peut tirer de cette rivière une assez grande quantité de riz de très bonne qualité[21] ».

Au nord de la Gambie, les Français avaient des comptoirs à Rufisque dans le Kajoor, à Portudal dans le Bawol, et à Joal dans le royaume du Siin[22]. En dehors de Saint-Louis, tous les établissements français situés au nord et au sud de la Gambie, jusqu'à la rivière Sierra Leone, étaient polarisés par Gorée, annexe de l'entrepôt général de Saint-Louis. Les avantages de Gorée sont évoqués par de nombreux témoignages dont celui du Sieur Pelletan, ancien directeur de la Compagnie. Selon ce dernier, dans toute la côte, depuis le port de Mogador au Maroc jusqu'à la Côte de l'Or, la barre empêche le débarquement des chaloupes et même des canots qui ne peuvent entrer dans les embouchures des rivières qu'avec l'aide des pilotes praticiens du pays. Nulle part ils ne peuvent ni caréner, ni même abattre sur le côté pour réparer une voie d'eau. L'île de Gorée se trouvant protégée par la pointe avancée du Cap-Vert et à la distance d'une petite lieue de terre, offre un mouillage excellent pour les gros navires de même que des facilités pour faire de l'eau et du bois[23]. Gorée bénéficiait, de surcroît, de la protection de l'eau contre les attaques des chefs locaux et constituait ainsi un entrepôt sûr où l'on portait les marchandises et les esclaves à mesure qu'on les traitait sur la côte. Entourée de brisants et de roches, sauf dans sa partie orientale, Gorée était facilement défendable contre les assauts des concurrents européens[24].

À partir de 1444, Gorée fut successivement occupée par les Portugais, les Hollandais et les Anglais au gré des canonnades. En 1677, l'île fut prise aux Hollandais pour le compte des Français par le maréchal d'Estrée. Cette vive concurrence pour la possession de Gorée était due, outre les avantages évoqués, au fait que l'île conférait à la nation occupante une réelle supériorité sur le trafic négrier en Sénégambie. Les Français étaient convaincus que la possession de Gorée était le seul obstacle qui empêchait les Anglais de les expulser de toute la côte occidentale de l'Afrique. Comme les vaisseaux ne pouvaient séjourner sans danger dans la rade de Saint-Louis, ils n'y restaient dans la plupart des cas que le temps de décharger des marchandises et d'embarquer les esclaves qui s'y trouvaient. Une fois ces opérations terminées, on les faisait passer à Gorée où embarquaient la plus grande partie des esclaves traités en Sénégambie[25]. De là aux Amériques, la traversée durait environ un mois tandis que les captifs traités au-delà de la Séné-gambie mettaient deux à trois mois pour effectuer le trajet. La Compagnie d'Occident, devenue Compagnie Perpétuelle des Indes depuis mai 1719 avec l'incorporation des domaines de la Compagnie de Chine et des Indes Orientales, s'était réservée le commerce du Sénégal pour deux raisons : d'une part, elle considérait que ce pays « fournit les seuls esclaves qui soient utilisables en Louisiane, la Guinée étant trop éloignée ; d'autre part, il sert de relâche aux vaisseaux qui se rendent en Guinée et ainsi rendent encore service à la traite des nègres[26] ». Guinée s'entend ici pour la côte d'Afrique située au-delà de la Sierra Leone jusqu'en Afrique centrale.

La Compagnie des Indes était confrontée à plusieurs problèmes. Son monopole sur le commerce négrier transatlantique était battu en brèche par des armateurs privés auxquels elle s'était résolue à vendre des licences à partir de 1742 en ce qui concerne le commerce du Sénégal. La Compagnie était aussi dans un état de désorganisation tel que les navires faisaient parfois défaut pour transporter les esclaves. Il s'agit là d'un problème fort ancien car le Sieur de La Courbe l'évoquait dans un mémoire en date du 26 mars 1693, suite à un troisième séjour au Sénégal où il occupait le poste de directeur général de la Compagnie. Il reprochait à celle-ci de n'avoir jamais eu en France un directeur qui connût les marchandises, l'assortiment, les prix et les dates favorables pour la navigation. On envoyait des navires pour charger des marchandises quand les comptoirs étaient encombrés de captifs qui mouraient de maladies dans les enclos, parce qu'on ne venait pas les prendre, et l'on envoyait des négriers à une époque où, en revanche, on avait jusqu'à 50 000 cuirs qui pourrissaient faute d'avoir été enlevés[27].

Enfin, il y avait aussi le problème de la nourriture des esclaves dans un contexte de crise généralisée. Selon Oumar Kane, disettes et famines revenaient de façon cyclique en Sénégambie au 17e siècle, « mais le 18e siècle bat tous les records en la matière, au point qu'on peut affirmer qu'il est le siècle de la crise généralisée […] La guerre et les destructions qu'elle entraîne sont souvent à l'origine des disettes et des famines. C'est le cas en 1723, 1724 […] : la crise de subsistance s'est toujours accompagnée de la recrudescence de la traite négrière car, à côté des prises ordinaires, il arrive que les populations affamées offrent des leurs pour sauver les autres de la mort par faim. Le seul élément qui freine l'achat massif des esclaves, c'est la possibilité de les nourrir[28] ».

Ces « maccube heege » (captifs de la faim), comme les appelaient les Fulbe du fleuve, étaient donc de ceux qui surpeuplaient les captiveries de la Concession du Sénégal où beaucoup mouraient d'inanition. À la lecture des correspondances des responsables du poste de Galam, on constate que toute la première moitié des années 1720 était marquée par la pénurie alimentaire. Dans une lettre datée du 6 août 1720, le directeur de Galam faisait état de sérieuses difficultés de ravitaillement qu'il expliquait par la guerre entre le Xaaso et le Bambuxu. Dans une autre lettre datée du 18 décembre 1723, il demandait aux responsables de la concession du Sénégal de ne point être surpris « de voir que depuis trois ans Galam n'a fourni que très peu de captifs dans la basse saison parce que le mil y a été d'une rareté étonnante[29]… »

Pendant la guerre de Sept Ans (1756-1763), les Anglais occupent Gorée et Saint-Louis dès 1758. Lors du traité de paix de 1763 qui mit fin à la guerre, la France accepta de renoncer à son comptoir de Saint-Louis, mais parvint à faire reconnaître son droit de possession sur Gorée. Le 1er novembre 1765, un arrêté du roi d'Angleterre créait la « Province of Senegambia » avec Saint-Louis comme capitale. Ainsi, 130 ans après leur expulsion de l'embouchure du fleuve Sénégal, les Anglais parvenaient à reprendre pied dans la région, mais leur objectif était avant tout les basse et moyenne vallées du fleuve où se négociait la gomme destinée à leur industrie textile. Selon Abdoulaye Bathily, il semble que le Galam était, entre 1767 et 1774, une sorte de concession réservée à la Norton and Grace. Dans ses correspondances, ce groupe de la City déclarait n'être pas intéressé par la traite des esclaves mais par le commerce de l'or, de l'ivoire, de la cire, des cuirs et peaux[30]. Toutefois, la nomination de Charles O'Hara comme gouverneur de la « Province of Senegambia », le 1er novembre 1765, allait se traduire par la recrudescence du commerce négrier touchant particulièrement le pays wolof. Pendant dix ans, entre 1766 et 1776, Charles O'Hara s'est livré à une politique désastreuse consistant à financer les razzias des Maures sur le Kajoor, le Waalo et le Bawol. Dans le seul royaume du Waalo, les Anglais auraient récupéré plus de 8 000 esclaves en moins de six mois en 1775. Le gouverneur anglais participait lui-même au pillage des villages wolof situés sur les deux rives du fleuve. Il fut rappelé en 1776 à la suite de pétitions organisées par les marchands britanniques et la population de Saint-Louis qui l'accusaient de brutalité et surtout de trafic clandestin d'or et d'esclaves[31].

En 1779, l'expédition Lauzun reprenait Saint-Louis pour le compte des Français ; mais la traite de Galam était compromise du fait de l'abandon des établissements fortifiés. La Révolution de 1789 se traduisit par la disparition de la Compagnie et de ses privilèges. L'exploitation de la traite au Galam était désormais le fait de négriers individuels qui se regroupaient parfois en association. À partir de 1792, les guerres de la Révolution puis de l'Empire créèrent une atmosphère d'instabilité peu propice à l'installation des Français au Galam. D'ailleurs, c'est tout le commerce français au Sénégal qui était compromis du fait du blocus imposé par la marine anglaise pendant les guerres révolutionnaires[32]. Cette situation s'est traduite par la percée des négociants américains qui s'emparèrent de l'essentiel du commerce français au Sénégal en y établissant des maisons de commerce et des facteurs[33]. La percée américaine au Sénégal se concrétisa davantage pendant les guerres napoléoniennes avec le blocus naval imposé par les Anglais et l'occupation de Saint-Louis par ces derniers, de 1800 à 1817.

À partir de 1807, à la faveur de la révolution industrielle, l'Angleterre, ayant décidé d'abandonner la traite négrière (suppression généralisée par toutes les puissances européennes en 1815) et de lutter contre le trafic d'êtres humains, la traite clandestine devint alors très active dans toute la Sénégambie, notamment à Saint-Louis et Gorée. Séparée de l'Angleterre et de tout accord bilatéral avec quelque puissance que ce soit, la France feindra toujours d'agir contre la traite jusqu'en 1833, date à laquelle les deux pays signaient une convention pour la répression de la traite des Noirs. La France avait voté une nouvelle loi abolitionniste le 15 avril 1818. La traite des Noirs était légalement interdite aux nationaux, mais s'y adonner ne constituait pas un acte criminel[34]. Entre 1818 et 1848, s'étale une période de 30 ans durant laquelle des négriers français sont régulièrement mis en accusation mais sans grand dommage à cause d'une législation à la fois tatillonne et laxiste. L'ampleur du trafic négrier dans la colonie[35] avait conduit le Sieur Morénas à déposer deux pétitions à la Chambre des députés, le 14 juin 1820 et le 19 mars 1820, dénonçant l'implication de divers bâtiments français dans le commerce illégal[36]. En 1848, à la faveur de l'avènement de la II^{e} République, les autorités françaises mettent officiellement fin à la traite négrière et à l'esclavage dans les territoires sous leur contrôle. Mais l'esclavage subsistera au moins jusqu'aux premières décennies du 20^{e} siècle.

وكالة الأنباء الإسبانية تكتب عن التيار

Create PDF in your applications with the Pdfcrowd HTML to PDF API PDFCROWD

▪وكالة الأنباء الإسبانية (EFE) تكتب عن التيار المغربي الموري.. نعم والخبر صحيح.. وأشارت بشكل بارز الى صفحتنا Moorish History – التّاريخ المَغربي المُورِي وإلى صفحة التّيار المَغربي المُورِي – ⵜⴰⵎⴰⵣⵉⵖⵜ ⴰⵏⵎⵓⵔⵉ وهذه سابقة مدوية والتي توضح أن أصداء التيار قد بلغت الاعلام الدولي ونال اهتمامه..

▪نحن لا نستغرب بتاتا اهتمام الاسبان بالتيار.. خاصة وانه يحمل افكارا تنافسية مناوئة تذكّر بالتفصيل بامجاد المغاربة بشبه الجزيرة الآيبيرية.. فإنبعاث الشخصية الوطنية المغربية على أسسها المحلية الصلبة.. وعلى الوعي التاريخي من شأنه ان يثير حفيظة جيراننا الشماليين..

▪يضيف نفس التقرير ""أن التيار يهدف إلى "تعزيز الثقافة والتاريخ والهوية المغربية في قلب الشباب: المغرب أمة ذات حضارة فريدة وأصيلة.. وأن الهدف أيضا هو التعريف بـ "عبقرية" الشخصية المغربية في العلوم والأدب والعمارة والفن والصناعة، مع مراعاة مساهمات الحضارات "الموريّة" منذ فجر التاريخ"'

▪مع مراعاة أن التيار المغربي الموري ليس لعبة بيد الإعلام الدولي خاصة الاعلام المناوىء الذي يبحث عن ثغرات يراهن عليها من أجل الإساءة إلى بلدنا، اذ يحرص على تقديم وجه مشرف وراقي اتجاه وطننا وينتصر لقضاياه الأساسية!

Tahar Gaïd, l'Algérien qui influença la vision politique de Malcolm X

4 janvier 2017, 16 h 50 min

Eminente personnalité algérienne, pétrie d'humilité, cette vertu des grands hommes, Tahar Gaïd, 87 ans, n'a jamais été de ceux qui courent son combat, mené jusqu'au sacrifice, le range dans la catégorie des héros valeureux des luttes de libération.

Cet ancien ambassadeur en Afrique dont la riche carrière diplomatique a été ponctuée de rencontres marquantes, notamment avec les deux révolutionnaires de légende que furent Malcolm X et Che Guevara, a accordé à Oumma une interview exclusive. Il révèle au grand jour l'influence qu'il exerça sur la vision idéologique et politique de l'icône du mouvement noir aux Etats-Unis, lors d'un entretien, à forte valeur historique, relégué, hélas, aux oubliettes de l'Histoire.

Malcolm X s'employa pourtant à en dévoiler l'importance publiquement, au cours de la conférence de presse qu'il donna à New York en 1964, en rendant hommage à son grand inspirateur dont il se flattait d'avoir suivi à la lettre les conseils avisés : « C'est l'ambassadeur d'Algérie au Ghana qui m'a fait changer d'opinion en me conseillant de créer un parti », se félicitait-il alors.

Né le 22 octobre 1929 à Timenagche, Beni Yala (wilaya de Sétif), Tahar

Né le 22 octobre 1929 à Timenguche, Beni Yala (Wilaya de Sétif), Tahar Gaïd fut un militant de la première heure du mouvement national algérien PPA/MTLD. Il a combattu pour l'Indépendance au prix d'un emprisonnement, en 1956, qui le cloîtra pendant six longues années derrière les barreaux des prisons et camps d'internement en Algérie.

de Mascara, puis à Alger.

A partir de 1980, il se consacra aux aspects théoriques et pratiques de l'Islam, devenant un auteur prolifique en la matière. Son ouvrage « le Dictionnaire élémentaire de l'Islam (OPU) » fera date.
Révolutionnaire dans l'âme et fin diplomate, Tahar Gaïd est avant tout un homme très pieux et éclairé, chantre du "Juste Milieu" contre toutes les formes d'extrémismes, ayant fait sienne cette citation de l'imam Ali à la forte résonance :

« Ne sois pas trop tendre, car on te pressera, ni trop sec, car on te brisera.»

Tahar Gaïd dédicaçant ses ouvrages au Salon du Livre à Alger Vous étiez l'ambassadeur d'Algérie à Accra, au Ghana, lorsque vous avez rencontré Malcolm X en 1964. Cet entretien important, à forte valeur historique, a-t-il eu lieu à sa demande et pour quelles raisons ?

Malcolm X revenait de son pèlerinage à La Mecque. Le Ghana était alors

Malcolm X revenait de son pèlerinage à La Mecque. Le Ghana était alors dirigé par feu Kwamé Nkrumah, très forte personnalité africaine, chaud partisan d'une fédération africaine et défenseur d'une Afrique libérée de toutes les formes d'aliénation et de colonisation. L'Afrique, des partis d'opposition s'étaient établis à Accra.

Vous comprenez aussi les raisons qui ont conduit Malcolm X à visiter le Ghana à son retour de La Mecque. Il est à faire remarquer que l'Algérie était auréolée de son indépendance, acquise deux ans auparavant, après une guerre qui a duré sept ans.

Il n'est pas exagéré de dire que les pays africains francophones devaient indirectement leur indépendance au sang versé par les Algériens. Ces éléments, entre autres, ont motivé Malcolm X à demander à voir non pas ma personne, qu'il ne connaissait pas, mais à rencontrer le représentant de l'Algérie révolutionnaire, partisane de la libération effective du continent africain.

Les idées révolutionnaires et le combat de Malcolm X faisaient écho en vous. Avant de le rencontrer, quelle perception en aviez-vous en tant que militant de la première heure du mouvement national algérien ayant combattu pour l'indépendance de l'Algérie ?

Je dois avouer que j'avais une vague idée du combat mené par Malcolm X et du prestige qu'il avait aux Etats-Unis, voire dans le monde entier. J'avais été arrêté le 24 mai 1956 et libéré que le 30 mars 1962, après six années de détention.

radios. Les seules informations que nous avions étaient celles qui nous provenaient de nos parents et nos avocats pendant les visites réglementaires, ou encore des rares moments où nous pouvions faire entrer clandestinement des journaux de France.

Il n'en reste pas moins qu'en deux années, j'ai pu m'informer quelque peu de la lutte des Afro-américains, plus particulièrement vers la fin de l'année 1963. Je me trouvais à New-York pour assister, avec la délégation algérienne, à la session de l'ONU. J'ai profité de ce déplacement officiel pour visiter le quartier qu'on appelait Harlem. J'ai eu ainsi l'occasion, en me hasardant dans des cafés et des bars, de discuter avec les gens de leurs problèmes et de leurs aspirations.

Il faut dire de surcroît que l'Algérie défendait le droit des peuples à disposer d'eux-mêmes et soutenait les causes justes. A ce titre, je ne pouvais que recevoir Malcolm X avec fierté et sympathie, voire avec la chaleureuse fraternité que pouvait éprouver un jeune révolutionnaire à l'égard d'un dirigeant révolutionnaire d'une haute stature internationale.

Contrairement à l'idée largement répandue selon laquelle la vision politique de Malcolm X, alias al-Hajj Malik al-Shabazz, fut chamboulée par son pèlerinage à La Mecque, en avril 1964, ce sont vos échanges qui exercèrent une réelle influence sur lui. Quelle en fut la teneur ?

fraternité dont il avait été témoin à La Mecque. Cette ferveur qui animait les pèlerins de tous les continents l'avait impressionné et ému. Cela ne faisait aucun doute.

Ensuite, il avait abordé le problème des Afro-américains aux Etats-Unis, leur lutte et leurs revendications. Il parlait avec une forte conviction et chaleur, selon son habitude, martelant constamment ces deux mots « Noirs » et Blancs » en les opposant continuellement l'un à l'autre.

J'avais compris qu'il n'avait pas transposé la solidarité des peuples vécue à La Mecque au niveau des réalités américaines. Je voyais qu'il distinguait l'une de l'autre et que le vécu dans les lieux saints n'avait, pour lui, aucune relation avec les réalités et les besoins de sa « nation ». L'exposé qu'il me faisait de sa vision politique était toujours dominé par une tension irréversible entre le « Noir » et le « Blanc ».

Je l'ai interrompu au milieu de son exposé pour lui dire : « Pourquoi donc es-tu venu me voir ? Tu ne vois pas que je suis blanc. Tu ne fais que m'attaquer et me blâmer ». Il a été interloqué par mon intervention. Je m'attaquer et me blâmer », il a été interloqué par mon intervention. Je dois dire qu'il me fixa pendant quelques instants. Je m'étais aperçu qu'il réfléchissait. Non seulement, il réfléchissait vite mais comprenait aussi vite les intentions de son interlocuteur. C'est pourquoi, il releva la tête et Vous êtes-vous appuyé sur votre expérience révolutionnaire personnelle pour tenter de lui faire dépasser son clivage racial entre « Blancs » et « Noirs » ?

Oui, cela s'imposait. Je lui ai parlé longuement de l'expérience algérienne, en insistant sur le fait que nous ne confondions pas le colonialisme avec le peuple français et que nous faisions une distinction entre les gouvernements français, qui conduisaient une politique coloniale en Algérie, avec le peuple de France.

Egalement, dans notre conception de la lutte, nos attaques visaient essentiellement les colons qui accaparaient les richesses des Algériens et non pas directement les Français d'Algérie qui étaient d'origines diverses : Français, Espagnols, Italiens, Maltais…

Je lui disais, en le répétant avec force, que notre lutte ne revêtait ni un caractère religieux, bien que l'Islam était un des éléments mobilisateurs du militantisme des Algériens, ni ethnique, bien que nous appartenions à une sphère culturelle différente de la France. C'est ainsi qu'une grande partie du peuple français avait soutenu, lui ai-je indiqué, la lutte des Algériens pour reconquérir leur indépendance et que de nombreux

Je lui ai affirmé que nous avions gardé la même ligne politique à l'égard du peuple français lorsque nous avons pris les armes pour reconquérir notre indépendance. C'est ainsi que des Français militèrent activement à nos côtés en transportant des valises d'argent, collecté dans les milieux de notre émigration, et des valises contenant également des armes. Des Français véhiculèrent des dirigeants du FLN pour les faire passer, en toute sécurité, d'un endroit à un autre. Des aides matérielles furent apportées aux Algériens détenus dans les prisons françaises.

Je lui ai cité quelques noms d'intellectuels français qui défendaient notre cause à travers leurs écrits. Je n'ai pas manqué aussi de lui rappeler que nous étions soutenus par des manifestations de Français dans plusieurs villes de France. Mon objectif était de lui faire abandonner cette idée de lutte du « Noir » contre le « Blanc », d'autant plus que je lui avais déclaré que, sur la base de l'expérience algérienne, s'il changeait sa vision politique, il gagnerait la sympathie et le soutien de nombreux Américains blancs.

Dans cette perspective, je lui avais proposé de créer un parti politique dont le programme serait fondé sur une nouvelle vision des rapports entre « Noirs » et « Blancs ».

Malcolm X m'avait écouté attentivement. Il me remercia pour mon long exposé et nous nous sommes dit au revoir, sans savoir si mes arguments avaient été persuasifs et percutants. Je crois pourtant qu'ils le furent. A quoi, il fallait ajouter le ton de mes paroles. Je parlais avec le dynamisme et la ferveur révolutionnaire qui m'animaient à cette époque.

Je me voyais aussi éloquent que Malcolm X, sans connaître, sur le moment, l'impact de mes explications. Nous nous sommes malheureusement quittés sans que je sache si je l'avais convaincu ou s'il allait camper sur ses positions. Il ne laissa rien paraître, à tel point que je pensais qu'il m'avait seulement écouté poliment et que sa visite n'était qu'une marque de courtoisie.

L'avenir devait vous rassurer pleinement sur votre force de conviction auprès de l'une des figures les plus charismatiques et puissantes du mouvement noir aux Etats-Unis. Quand l'avez-vous su ?

J'ai rencontré Malcolm X trois mois plus tard au Caire, lors de la conférence des pays membres de la ligue arabe. J'étais membre de la délégation algérienne. Quant à lui, il était certainement venu défendre la cause de son mouvement auprès des délégations arabes présentes au Caire.

suivi votre conseil) ». Je n'ai pas saisi sur le moment ce qu'il voulait dire. Je ne l'apprendrai que plus tard, lorsqu'il annonça publiquement la création de son nouveau parti politique.

Parmi les souvenirs que vous gardez de cette rencontre, pouvez-vous relater une anecdote mémorable ?

La visite de Malcolm X à Accra (Ghana) avait coïncidé avec la présence de Muhammad Ali dans cette ville. Je me trouvais entre un « champion du monde » en politique et un champion du monde de boxe (Que Dieu leur accorde Sa miséricorde avec l'espoir qu'Il les a accueillis dans Son immense Paradis).

Je me souviens encore de la longue silhouette de l'un et de l'autre, lançant devant une foule d'admirateurs : I am the king ! ». J'étais ravi et comblé. C'est une image inoubliable et douloureuse à la fois, aujourd'hui encore.

La grande histoire n'a pas retenu votre influence sur l'orientation politique de Malcolm X. Que ressentez-vous face à cette injustice historique ?

celle-ci passe à toute vitesse, laissant derrière elle des bons et des mauvais souvenirs. Ce n'est pas la seule « affaire » que j'avais à traiter. Accra était le siège de partis politiques d'opposition de divers pays africains.

L'Algérie apportait son discret soutien politique à ces partis. C'est ainsi que j'ai eu comme ami Djibo Bakari, le vrai leader et libérateur du Niger. Cependant, la France colonialiste en a voulu autrement. Je l'ai abrité à l'ambassade lors du coup d'Etat qui a destitué Nkrumah. Au bout d'un mois, malgré la surveillance de la police et de l'armée ghanéennes, j'ai réussi à lui faire traverser la frontière togolaise et ensuite la frontière du Dahomey (aujourd'hui le Bénin). Je l'ai déposé au Nigéria où je l'ai quitté à sa demande.

Dans l'extrait ci-dessous du film "Ali" (2001), le biopic consacré à Mohammed Ali que l'on doit au grand réalisateur Michael Mann, avec dans le rôle titre Will Smith, Malcolm X croise par hasard le champion du monde des poids lourds au Ghana et lui indique, en le désignant et le nommant, qu'il est en compagnie de l'ambassadeur d'Algérie à Accra, Tahar Gaïd.

Votre carrière diplomatique fut riche et bien remplie. Quels sont, à vos yeux, ses moments forts ?

J'ai noué des relations très amicales avec le secrétaire de l'UPC (Union Populaire du Cameroun). Je ne me rappelle plus son nom. Je lui avais préparé un voyage à Alger de deux semaines. Il était revenu enchanté. Il était surtout très admiratif de la conscience politique de la jeunesse algérienne. Ce n'est malheureusement plus le cas. Les jeunes et les plus vieux ont troqué les idéaux de liberté et de justice sociale pour le matérialisme sordide.

Je me souviens également avoir eu « affaire » avec un représentant de l'opposition du Nigéria. Là encore, son nom m'échappe, il s'est libéré de été fructueux et instructifs.

Lorsque j'étais ambassadeur en Tanzanie, j'ai pris l'initiative, sans aviser mon gouvernement mais avec l'accord du MPLA (mouvement de libération de l'Angola), et escorté de deux Angolais maquisards, de traverser la frontière zambienne pour me rendre dans les maquis de l'Angola, où j'ai vécu au milieu des combattants pendant cinq jours, avec pour objectif de régler un différend. Les deux parties avaient une grande confiance en l'Algérie.

Cette initiative personnelle me rappelle celle que j'ai prise au lendemain du premier novembre 1954, alors que j'étais enseignant à Palikao ou Tighenif (ville de l'Oranie). J'ai organisé, sans en rendre compte à personne, des cellules de Fidaï (nom donné aux militants du FLN qui opéraient dans les villes et réalisaient des opérations militaires). Le groupe fut rattaché à l'organisation d'Oran, après mon entrevue en avril 1955 avec Abbane Ramdane. La tâche était dangereuse, car Palikao était une petite ville de colonisation, d'où une facile surveillance de la population, asservie par des colons et des Pieds-noirs.

Je suis gêné d'égrener ces quelques souvenirs parmi tant d'autres, mais je veux montrer que mon activité de militant servait les intérêts de mon pays. Je cherchais à glorifier les idéaux de liberté, chers à l'Algérie des fois réglée, je fermais le registre et je passais à une autre activité.

Il n'en reste pas moins qu'aujourd'hui je suis bien heureux que ce soit le site Oumma qui rétablisse la vérité sur ma rencontre avec Malcolm X et l'influence déterminante qu'elle a eue sur son évolution idéologique et politique.

J'espère que des personnes ou des associations suivront son exemple et mettront en lumière d'autres activités encore peu connues, voire totalement méconnues du grand public et de cercles plus restreints. C'est une bonne chose que de rétablir la vérité, quel que soit l'endroit où elle se cache.

Son assassinat, le 21 février 1965, vous a-t-il surpris, diriez-vous que cela a été un choc pour vous ?

Je m'attendais à un grave affrontement avec l'organisation « Nation of Islam » et son leader Elijah Muhammad qu'il venait de quitter, mais je ne pensais pas que cela irait jusqu'au crime. L'annonce de sa mort a été effectivement un choc brutal, car les Etats-Unis, dans leur ensemble, perdaient un grand homme. Sa mort marqua la fin d'une époque mais pas la fin de la lutte des Afro-Américains, bien que si Malcolm X vivait

Che Guevara, que vous avez eu également l'opportunité de rencontrer, figure à votre panthéon des grandes figures de l'anti-impérialisme. Comment s'est passée cette entrevue inoubliable ?

J'ai effectivement rencontré Che Guevara à Accra (Ghana). Il se rendait au Congo où, pensait-il, il allait déclencher des révolutions en Afrique à partir de ce pays. Bien sûr, il ne me dévoila pas son projet. Je croyais qu'il voulait simplement discuter avec moi pour connaître mon point de vue sur la situation politique en Afrique. Quand il me parla de révolution dans le continent africain, je lui ai répondu que cela n'était pas possible dans le contexte actuel, parce que le sentiment tribal l'emportait sur le sentiment religieux et même patriotique.

Je pense que beaucoup de choses ont changé en Afrique mais dans les années 60, il n'était pas rare de rencontrer dans une même famille, par exemple, un frère musulman, une sœur chrétienne, une mère animiste… D'une manière générale, l'Africain chrétien, par exemple, défendrait sa tribu contre un autre chrétien d'une autre tribu tribu contre un autre chrétien d'une autre tribu.

Nous avons vu le sort de Lumumba, sans racine tribale déclarée, qui avait voulu moderniser politiquement son pays. Nous avons encore en mémoire l'attitude de Tchombé au Katanga, région de l'ethnie à laquelle apparemment libérée du colonialisme ? Tel est le résumé de l'exposé que j'avais fait à Che Guevara.

J'ai revu le Che quelques années après. Il m'avait fortement serré la main, en me disant : « You are right ! = Vous avez raison ! ». J'étais flatté mais l'honneur allait à mon pays, car c'est en son sein que j'ai été formé et que ma plume et ma langue ont été aiguisées pour le bonheur du peuple auquel j'appartiens.

Je souhaite que la jeunesse algérienne, française et du monde entier prenne exemple sur ces deux géants de l'histoire moderne que sont Malcolm X et Che Guevara. Les jeunes, génération montante et ouverte sur l'avenir, apprendront d'eux le courage, l'esprit de sacrifice, y compris le sacrifice suprême, les idéaux de liberté des peuples et d'égalité des hommes, saisiront à leur juste valeur les principes de justice et de justice sociale.

Ils combattront le racisme, l'islamophobie et prendront conscience qu'il n'y a pas une culture et une civilisation au-dessus des autres. L'histoire est un enchaînement d'événements. Chaque époque historique hérite de la précédente et ouvre ses bienfaits à l'époque suivante. Il n'y a pas de race blanche mais un creuset d'ethnies dans chaque nation. En un mot, ils sauront ce qu'est l'Homme, al-Insân.

J'ai déjà écrit, non pas mes mémoires, mais mes souvenirs avec des impressions. Le contenu du livre prend fin avec l'Indépendance de l'Algérie. Il est en vente dans les librairies d'Alger depuis le 1er novembre. Je prépare le second tome où j'évoquerai mon entretien avec Malcolm X et ma rencontre avec Che Guevara.

Donc, quant à rétablir la vérité historique sur l'influence que j'ai eue sur Malcolm X, ainsi que sur d'autres pans de ma carrière et de mes activités auprès du grand public, le site Oumma vient de le faire au site. Je vous souhaite une bonne continuation et beaucoup de succès.

Masyaf Castle, the Seat of the Assassins

READ LATER PRINT

Fans of the popular video game series Assassin's Creed would be familiar with the castle of Masyaf in Syria. In the series, the castle of Masyaf was the headquarters of the notorious Assassins, and this is not fiction - Masyaf was indeed once home to the much feared ancient order of assassins .

During the late 11th century, an order of Nizari Ismailies was formed in Persia and Syria by a man called Hassan-i Sabbah. These were the notorious Hashshashins who captured many mountain fortresses and posed a threat to Sunni Seljuk authority in Persia. Perhaps the Hashshashin, from which the name 'assassins' derives, were most famous for the way they got rid of their opponents – through highly-skilled assassinations.

Based on archaeological evidence, it has been suggested that the castle of Masyaf was built during the time of the Byzantines, constructed on top of a natural limestone hill that rose above the surrounding plain and village. This gave the castle a strategic position which allowed its occupants to oversee and control the region. The Assassins first occupied the castle in A.D. 1141 when they captured it from the Sanqur, who held it for the Banu Munqidh of Shayzar, one of the petty Islamic dynasties in the region during the 12 th century A.D.

The Assassins were notorious throughout the region for their efficiency at dispatching their enemies. This gave them a degree of political power that some of the bigger powers in the Middle East were not comfortable with. Thus, Masyaf became a target for those who were brave enough to make an attempt at breaking the power of the Assassins. This endeavour was undertaken by no less an illustrious character as Saladin, the first Sultan of Egypt and Syria and the founder of the Ayyubid dynasty.

Saladin's siege of the castle in 1176 A.D., however, ended in failure. According to legend, while Saladin was asleep beneath Masyaf, an Assassin managed to infiltrate his tent. Saladin awoke to catch a glimpse of this figure as he was leaving the tent. A poisoned cake or hot scones with a poisoned dagger were left on the side of Saladin's bed. This pastry was accompanied by a note warning Saladin that he would be killed if he did not withdraw. Fearing for his life, Saladin chose to make peace with the Assassins.

Nevertheless, the Assassins were not invincible. In 1260 A.D., Masyaf and three other Assassin fortresses surrendered to the invading Mongols. The Mongol victory was short-lived, however, as they were defeated by the Mamelukes at the Battle of 'Ayn Jalut in the same year. Once the Mongols were expelled from Syria, the Assassins were back in control of Masyaf. Ten years later, the Mamelukes under their sultan, Baibars, took control of Masyaf. Whilst the Assassins eventually disbanded, the castle remained a part of the landscape.

In 2000, conservation work began on the castle of Masyaf. This project, completed in 2006, has consolidated and restored the crumbling structure. Moreover, it has provided us with a much better understanding of the Assassins when they occupied the castle. For instance, the project discovered a tunnel that is believed to have been a secret escape passage. In addition, a system of channels designed to carry rain water into cisterns beneath the castle was also uncovered. This is further evidence that the castle was designed to withstand long periods of enemy siege. Yet, the castle is not without its luxuries, as attested by the finding of a traditional bath house.

*Tunnel inside Masyaf Castle. Image source: TripAdvisor

It may be worth pointing out that the castle of Masyaf does not exist as an isolated point in the landscape, but co-exists with the neighbouring old city of Masyaf. Thus, the conservators, who took into account the urban context of the castle, made an effort to conserve and enhance the old city, upgraded the markets and pedestrian areas and created more attractive facilities for tourists. By taking these measures, the local population would benefit from the tourism industry, and would probably work to preserve the castle, as they have a stake in it. Thus, by involving the local population, such ancient monuments may be protected for future generations to come.

Fascinating. I love the Assassin's Creed games, it's good to see old Masyaf getting fixed up. Involving the locals is brilliant, I hope it works. The problem is, there aren't a lot of tourists willing to go to Syria right now.

Alba Fucens, a City Not Even the Roman Gods Could Protect

READ LATER PRINT

Italy is visited by millions of tourists each year for its many remarkable ancient ruins, fascinating heritage sites, incredible food, and beautiful countryside. Because there is such an abundance of historical locations to visit, many sites are not as well known. One of these is Alba Fucens, which contains some of the finest early Roman ruins in Italy. This once a bustling town at the foot of Monte Velino was largely destroyed by marauding pirates in the Middle Ages .

The History of Alba Fucens

The town which once stood on this site was ancient. It was founded by the Aequi, a tribe who lived in the area before the establishment of Rome. They were a hardy mountain people and were among the most implacable foe of the Early Roman Republic .

Alba Fucens, originally a hillfort, was finally conquered in the Third Samnite War (298 to 290 BC). The area was occupied by the Romans who sent citizens to colonize the town, although the Aequi were given many rights. During the Second Punic War (218 to 201 BC), the city refused to send soldiers to help in the war against Hannibal and it appears that the population of the town was punished.

The location of Alba Fucens, central Italy, Europe (Google Maps)

Alba Fucens prospered during the Social War (91 to 88 BC), when many Italian allies revolted against Roman rule since they stayed loyal. By this time the town was losing its Aequi culture and was increasingly Latin in culture and language.

As Alba Fucens was located in a very strategic position, it was fought over during the many civil wars. These eventually led to the fall of the Roman Republic in the First Century BC. Reports in primary sources state that the hill-top town was used to hold captured foreign kings .

Based on archaeological evidence found at the site, Alba Fucens prospered in the Imperial period (27 BC to 476 AD). Following the fall of the Western Roman Empire, the town became part of the Ostrogothic and Lombard kingdoms.

From the 9 th century AD, Arab pirates and raiders, known as the Saracens, were ravaging the coasts of Italy and conquering territories. As they became more brazen, they ventured inland. In the 10 th century they attacked Alba Fucens, destroyed it, and enslaved much of the population. The town was almost completely depopulated and entered into a period of decline.

Alba Fucens was completely abandoned when the survivors established the nearby town of Massa d'Albe. Belgian archaeologists investigated in the mid-20 th century and did much to conserve the ruins.

The Remains of the Once Prosperous Alba Fucens

The abandoned town is located in Abruzzo, Central Italy, in a mountainous region with many historic sites. Despite its sack by the Saracens there are still spectacular ruins to be seen. The remaining town walls, roughly 2 miles (3.2km) long, encircle the site and are among the best-preserved in all of Italy.

According to inscriptions, the amphitheater was built by the Praetorian prefect Naevius Macro. The circular structure , with tiers of seats encircling an open space, afforded the crowd a great view of the games held here. The remains of this once popular venue and its original entrance stand as a testament to the durability of Roman construction.

The town of Alba Fucens, Abruzzo, Italy (ValerioMei / Adobe Stock)

The foundations of many private and public buildings are still visible, including Alba Fucens' original market and the columns located in this area. The thermal spa is very impressive with its mosaics, and what would an ancient Roman city be without its shrines, these one dedicated to Hercules, Isis and Apollo. Or a partly standing Roman wine bar, sadly no longer trading. Studies have shown that their sewage system was unique and one of the most sophisticated ever found from the Roman period.

On the hill above the abandoned town stands the Church of San Pietro which has an interesting blend of Romanesque and Byzantine motifs and designs and dates back to the 12th Century. Stones and columns from the Temple of Apollo were used in its construction. San Pietro's apse is much admired as are several mosaics in the church. From this higher vantage point, ancient page shrine and remining stones that once belonged to the Temple of Apollo are visible. A castle ruined in the 15 th century during the French invasion of Italy is close to Mount Velino.

How to see Alba Fucens

Alba Fucens is in Abruzzo, approximately 50 miles east of Rome. The site is not far from the town of Massa d'Albe and there is a car park adjacent to the site. Admittance is free.

Like many, if not most ancient stone-built sites all around the Med, if there are no texts of the era describing their construction, the laborious quarrying, moving and erecting of the stones, which doesn't happen 'in a day', we should assume these were aboriginal complexes built prior to the Ice Age. I.e., by the fair-haired Atlantean-era people, whose culture was destroyed in the event that caused the Ice Age. Otherwise, it just doesn't add up.

Nobody gets paid to tell the truth.

Thanks for your article! It is so nice to see reviewed some of the least famous (but still amazing) historical places of my country.

Alba Fucens is an incredible place where we find the finest ancient and medieval architecture was made. Great works, not inferior for charm and beauty to more famous gems of the country, Alba Fucens really stands out of the average. It is also quit far inland, sitting on mountain highlands with amazing views.

Megalithic walls are just everywhere, here! The kilometric surrounding wall is such, there are three false doors as well, fit in a polygonal segment within the urban area. Recently, a pristine megalithic tunnel, featuring a neat polygonal masonry just as outside, was found and further work is going to follow.

You really hit the place to visit!

OUR MISSION

At Ancient Origins, we believe that one of the most important fields of knowledge we can pursue as human beings is our beginnings. And while some people may seem content with the story as it stands, our view is that there exist countless mysteries, scientific anomalies and surprising artifacts that have yet to be discovered and explained.

The goal of Ancient Origins is to highlight recent archaeological discoveries, peer-reviewed academic research and evidence, as well as offering alternative viewpoints and explanations of science, archaeology, mythology, religion and history around the globe.

By bringing together top experts and authors, this archaeology website explores lost civilizations, examines sacred writings, tours ancient places, investigates ancient discoveries and questions mysterious happenings. Our open community is dedicated to digging into the origins of our species on planet earth, and question wherever the discoveries might take us. We seek to retell the story of our beginnings.

15 Basic Facts Most People Don't Know About The Actual History Of Ninjas

Travis Morgan
Updated January 9, 2020 • 175.1k views • 15 items

Are ninjas real? While they seem like a part of Japanese folklore, they are, in fact, real. Though most people think of the ancient shinobi mercenaries as nothing but stealth assassins, in reality, they were a lot more James Bond than Sonny Chiba's Hattori Hanzo. Espionage was the name of the game. Cloaked in a variety of disguises, they infiltrated enemy territory to learn building layouts, swipe secret passwords, and spread misinformation. If need be, they were also up for sabotage, mainly in the form of arson.

No one knows when ninjas first started to appear, but it's estimated it was around the 15th century. However, they didn't fully come into their own until the Sengoku period (also known as the Warring States Period). During this time, the two most famous ninja clans, Iga and Koga, had their heydays. But like with all golden ages, eventually, the sun had to set. Even so, shinobi have left an imprint on the history of Japan that will never be erased. So, if you only thought ninjas were all myth, think again: these are some real facts about ninjas.

Ninjas' Roots Come From China

After the Tang dynasty collapsed in 907, some of the generals fled to Japan. Later, in the 1020s, Chinese monks followed, carrying their own new ideas along with them.

The resulting blend of tactics and philosophies had a huge influence on Japan.

Shinobi And Ninja Mean The Same Thing

Some say ninja, some say shinobi. Who's right? As it turns out, everybody's a winner! Ninja stems from Chinese, but it's pronunciation changed after it was adopted into Japanese (ninja translates to “one who endures”). Shinobi on the other hand, is a homegrown Japanese term.

In Kanji, ninja (or shinobi, and more formally shinobi-no-mono) has two characters, and when pronounced in Chinese, sounds like "nin-sha." In modern times, ninjas are sometimes referred to as ninjutsu.

Iga And Koga Were The Most Famous Clans

The two most famous ninja clans were Iga (from Mie prefecture) and Koga (Shiga prefecture).

They kept their ninja communities hidden away in the local mountains and forests, allowing them to hone their skills.

The Tartarians were a tall people, averaging some eight to twelve feet in height. They would have been considered giants to our current average height of only around six feet.

Each preceding civilization had an average taller height than the civilizations coming after them and each succeeding civilization had an average shorter height than the civilizations predating them. Statures diminishing after each deluge and with each new astrological age we entered.

The Tartarians are thought to have been “Breatherians,” a being who does not rely on the digestion and burning of calories from food/water, but instead rather receives energy straight from the aether. The aether is thought to be the very fabric of the space time continuum that some would associate with electrons, the wind, the holy spirit, the atmosphere, and the gasses in the atmosphere such as oxygen, nitrogen, and hydrogen. Since the The Tartarians quite possibly had a completely altered digestion system than the one we now have, they had no need for toilets in their bathrooms. Which could hint at one of the reasons why bathrooms in the recent past have been used quite extensively more as social gathering powder rooms to not only freshen oneself up but to hear and spread local gossip.

ничего, однако она постоянно находилась в изолированном вольере и смотрители зоопарка никак не могли понять в чем же дело, пишет IFL Science.

В попытках разгадать тайну "непорочного" рождения работники зоопарка собрали волосы и экскременты Момо, ее детеныша, а также четырех самцов, которые содержались поблизости и могли претендовать на звание отца малыша-гиббона. Каково же было удивление сотрудников зоопарка, когда анализ ДНК, проведенный Киотским университетом, показал, что один из самцов в действительности является отцом детеныша.

как же гиббоны устраивали себе "свидания"?

Со временем ответ нашелся. По словам директора зоопарка Дзюна Ямано, они с коллегами предполагают, что зачатие произошло не в самих вольерах, где содержались гиббоны, а в выставочном пространстве.

Сотрудники зоопарка исследователи выставочное пространство и обнаружили, что здесь гиббоны были разделены лишь дощатой перегородкой. По словам Ямано, вероятно, в один из дней, когда самец Ито находился в выставочном пространстве, они и спарились через отверстие.

Отметим, что перфорированная доска, которая разделяла выставочные зоны гиббонов, имела отверстия диаметром всего около 9 миллиметров, что кажется весьма любопытным. Сотрудники зоопарка также рассказали о том, что после того, как тайна "непорочного" зачатия была раскрыта, они тут же заменили деревянную перфорированную перегородку на стальную пластину без отверстий.

Почему рождение Иисуса от девственной девы не удивило ранних христиан

24 декабря 2022 в 10:00

матери, по имени Мария, что является фундаментальным для христианского понимания того, что Иисус есть божественный сын Божий.

Исследователь Нового Завета Родольфо Гальван Эстрада III рассказал, почему рождение Иисуса от Марии не удивляло ранних христиан, пишет Ancient Origins.

Он утверждает, что первоначальную аудиторию этой истории не оттолкнула бы предполагаемая "странность" истории о непорочном зачатии. По мнению исследователя, эта история была гораздо более привычной для слушателей в то время, когда древнее Средиземноморье наполняли рассказы о легендарных людях, рожденных от богов — и когда ранние христиане уделяли пристальное внимание пророчествам еврейской Библии.

Что говорит и чего не говорит Библия

Впечатляет то, что Новый Завет относительно молчит о непорочном зачатии, за исключением двух мест. Оно появляется только в Евангелиях от Матфея и Луки, написанных спустя несколько десятилетий после смерти Иисуса.

Книга от Матфея объясняет, что когда Иосиф был обручен с Марией, она "беременела от Духа Святого". Автор связывает эту неожиданную беременность с ветхозаветным пророчеством в Исаии 7:14, в котором говорится, что "Дева во чреве зачнет, и родит Сына, и дадут Ему имя: Эммануил". По словам пророка Исаии, этот ребенок станет знаком для еврейского народа, что Бог защитит его от могущественных империй.

Была ли вера в непорочное зачатие основана на неправильном переводе? Необязательно. В греческой и иудейской мысли такие термины иногда были синонимами. И это же греческое слово, parthenos, встречается и в версии сомнениям в чести Марии. Она также способствовала их вере в то, что Иисус был Сыном Божьим, а Мария – Матерью Божией. Эти идеи приобрели еще большее значение во втором веке, когда некоторые христиане спорили о происхождении Иисуса: просто ли он родился человеком, но стал Сыном Божьим после крещения? Был ли он полубожественным существом, не совсем человеком? Был ли он полностью божественным, и полностью человеческим?

Последняя идея, символизирующая непорочное зачатие, была наиболее приемлемой — и сейчас является стандартной христианской верой. Но относительное молчание о ней в первые несколько десятилетий христианства не обязательно свидетельствует, что ранние христиане в нее не верили. Как отметил библеист Реймонд Браун, непорочное зачатие, вероятно, не было главным вопросом для христиан первого века. Они утверждали, что Иисус был божественным Сыном Божьим, который стал человеком, не пытаясь объяснить, как это произошло.

Александр Македонский.

Одна из древнейших греческих легенд утверждает, что Персей, древний предок греческого народа, родился от девственной матери, по имени Даная. История начинается с того, что Данаю заточил ее отец, царь Аргосу, который боялся ее, потому что было пророчество, что внук его убьет его. По легенде, греческий бог Зевс превратился в золотой дождь и оплодотворил Данаю.

Когда Даная родила Персея, они сбежали и наконец высадились на острове, где он и вырос. Впоследствии он стал известным героем, убившим змееголовую Медузу, а его правнуком стал Геракл, известный своей силой и безудержным гневом.

Драматург Эврипид, живший в V веке до нашей эры, описывает историю Иона, отцом которого был греческий бог Аполлон. Аполлон изнасиловал Креусу, мать Иона, отказавшуюся от него при рождении. Ион вырос, не зная о своем божественном отце, но в конце концов примирился со своей матерью-афинянкой и стал известен как основатель разных греческих городов на территории современной Турции.

Наконец, легенды утверждали, что Зевс был отцом Александра Македонского, македонского правителя, завоевавшего свою огромную империю в возрасте средиземноморском мире. Ко второму веку нашей эры Юстин Мученик, христианский богослов, защищавший христианство, признал этот момент: что девственное рождение не считалось бы "экстраординарным" в обществах, знакомых с греко-римскими божествами. Фактически, в обращении к римскому императору Антонину Пию и философам Юстин утверждал, что они должны терпимо относиться к христианской вере в непорочное зачатие так же как они относились к вере в истории о Персее.

Идея участия Бога в зачатии ребенка, обреченного на величие, не казалась бы столь уж необычной для древней аудитории. Более того, толкование ранними христианами пророчества в Исаии 7:14 из Септуагинты поддерживало их веру в то, что происхождение Иисуса было не только божественным, но и предсказуемым в их пророческих писаниях.

د. هيثم طيون Dr. Hitham Tayoun و د. سام مايكلز Dr. Sam Michaels

يعود أول دليل على وجود دين في الهند في فترة ما قبل التاريخ إلى أواخر العصر الحجري الحديث (5,500–2,600 ق.م). أما معتقدات و شعائر الفترة الكلاسيكية المبكرة فتسمى الديانة الفيدية التاريخية، هذه الديانة يظهر فيها تأثر ها بالديانة الهندو-أوروبية البدائية، و أقدم فيدا هي الريغ فيدا Rigvida و يرجع تاريخها من 1,700 -1,100 ق. م، و هي مركز الفيدات لآلهة مثل إندرا و فارونا و آغني، و في طقوس السومية. و طقوس تضحيات النار يابنا تغنى بترانيم فيدية لكن بدون معبد أو تماثيل. و قد شهد القرنين التاسع و الثامن قبل الميلاد تكوّن الأوبانيشادية الأولى. و الأوبانيشاد تمثل الأساس النظري للهندوسية الكلاسيكية و تسمى فيدانتا (و هي ختام الفيدا). شنت الأوبانيشاد هجمات على التكثيف المتزايد للطقوس، و من ثم فقد تم توليف هذه التضاربات الواحدية (نسبة للمذهب الواحدي Monistic) في إطار إيماني في المخطوطة الهندوسية المقدسة بهاغافاد غيتا. و الملاحم السنسكريتية العظمى رامايانا و مهابهاراتاتم جمعها على فترات طويلة أثناء أواخر قرون ما قبل الميلاد و بداية القرون الميلادية، و هي تحوي قصصاً أسطورية عن حكام و حروب الهند القديمة تخللتها أطروحات دينية و فلسفية. و كتاب برواناس المتأخر يحوي حكايات عن الديفا والديفيز و تفاعلها مع الإنسان و حروبه ضد الراكشاسا. و التمدن المتزايد في الهند في القرنين الثامن و السابع قبل الميلاد أدى إلى زيادة حركات زهدية أو ما يعرف بالشارمانا، التي تحدت منهجية الطقوس. و يُعتَبر ماهافيرا (حوالي 549 - 477 ق.م)، مؤيد الجاينية و بوذا (حوالي 563- 483 ق.م.) مؤسس البوذية من أبرز أيقونات تلك الحركة. أطلق المصطلح في البداية على تلك المفاهيم الدينية للهندوس و عُرفت تلك المفاهيم بالتالي بالهندوسية - ديانة الهندوس. و البراهمي أو الهندوسي هو من يؤمن بالفلسفات الواردة في أسفار الـ "فيدا"

1- "الفيدا" (Veda): هي كلمة سنسكريتية معناها "الحِكمة و المعرفة" تصور حياة الآريين، و مدارج الإرتقاء للحياة العقلية من السذاجة إلى الشعور الفلسفي، و فيها أدعية تنتهي بالشك و الإرتياب، كما أن فيها تأليهاً يرتقي إلى وحدة الوجود، و هي تتألف من أربعة كتب

2- مها بهارتا: ملحمة هندية تشبه الإلياذة و الأوديسا عند اليونان ، و مؤلفها "وياس" ووهو إبن العارف "بوسرا" الذي وضعها سنة 950 ق.م.، و هي تصف حرباً بين أمراء من الأسر المالكة، و قد اشتركت الآلهة في تلك الحرب

ب- نظرة الهندوسية إلى الآلهة:

- التوحيد: لا يوجد عند البراهميين (الهندوس) توحيد بالمعنى الدقيق، لكنهم إذا أقبلوا على إله من الآلهة أقبلوا عليه بكل جوارحهم حتى تختفي عن أعينهم كل الآلهة الأخرى، و عندها يخاطبونه ب"رب الأرباب" أو "إله الآلهة"

- التعدد: يعتقد الهندوس بأن لكل طبيعة نافعة أو ضارة إلهاً يُعبد كالماء و الهواء و الأنهار و الجبال. و هي آلهة كثيرة يتقربون إليها بالعبادة و تقديم القرابين أو الأضاحي (مثل عيد الأضحى في للديانة الإبراهيمية النصرانية أي الإسلامية و تقديم الأضاحي إلى رب الأرباب / الإله الأكبر / الله أكبر)

- التثليث: في القرن التاسع قبل الميلاد جمع الكهنة الآلهة في إله واحد أخرج العالم من ذاته و هو الذي أسموه: 1- براهما: من حيث هو موجود و 2- فيشنو : من حيث هو حافظ و 3- شيفا: من حيث هو مُهلك (قارنوا مع أسماء الإله الإسلامي الله: الموجود و الحافظ و المُهلِك)، من يعبد أحد الآلهة الثلاثة فقد عبدها جميعاً أو عبد الواحد الأعلى و لا يوجد أي فارق بينها

- تُعد البقرة حيواناً مقدساً في الهندوسية (قارنوا مع تقديس العجل الذهبي و عبادة البعليم في الديانة اليهودية و مع إسم أهم سورة في القرآن الإسلامي و عن ماذا تحدّثت سورة البقرة)، كما تقدس بعض الجماعات أنواع من الزواحف كالأفاعي و أنواع من الثدييات كالقردة، و لكن تتمتع البقرة من بينها جميعاً بقداسة تعلو على أي قداسة، و لها تماثيل في مختلف المعابد و المنازل و الميادين، و لها حق الإنتقال إلى أي مكان، و لا يجوز للهندوسي أن يمسها بأذى أو بذبحها، و إذا ماتت دفنت بطقوس دينية

- و أيضاً يعتقد البراهميون / الهندوس بأن آلهتهم قد تحل في الانسان فيسمى "أفاتار Avatar" كالفيلم الأمريكي الشهير للمخرج كاميرون، مثل الأفاتار (كريشنا) على سبيل المثال! و تظهر معتقدات البراهمية / الهندوسية جلية واضحة في في "الكارما" و تناسخ الأرواح و الإنطلاق و وحدة الوجود:

3- الإنطلاق: صالح الأعمال و فاسدها ينتج عنه حياة جديدة متكررة لتثاب فيها الروح أو لتعاقب على حسب ما قدمت في الدورة السابقة.

- من لم يرغب في شيء و لن يرغب في شيء و تحرر من رق الأهواء، و اطمأنت نفسه فإنه لا يعاد إلى حواسه، بل تنطلق روحه لتتحد بالبراهما

4- وحدة الوجود: التجريد الفلسفي وصل بالبراهميين إلى أن الإنسان يستطيع خلق الأفكار و الأنظمة و المؤسسات، كما أنه يستطيع المحافظة عليها أو تدميرها، و بهذا يتحد الإنسان مع الآلهة، و تصير النفس هي عين القوة الخالقة:

- الروح كالآلهة أزلية سرمدية مستمرة غير مخلوقة

- العلاقة بين الإنسان و الآلهة كالعلاقة بين شرارة النار و النار ذاتها، و كالعلاقة بين البذرة و بين الشجرة

- هذا الكون كله ليس إلا ظهوراً للوجود الحقيقي، و الروح الإنسانية جزء من الروح العليا

أفكار و مُعتقدات أخرى في البراهمية / الهندوسية:

- الأجساد تحرق بعد الموت لأن ذلك يسمح بأن تتجه الروح إلى أعلى و بشكل عمودي لتصل إلى الملكوت الأعلى في أقرب زمن، كما أن الإحتراق هو تخليص للروح من غلاف الجسم تخليصاً تاماً

- عندما تتخلص الروح و تصعد يكون أمامها ثلاثة عوالم: 1- إما العالم الأعلى: عالم الملائكة، 2- و إما عالم الناس: مقر الآدميين بالحلول، 3- و إما عالم جهنم: و هذا لمرتكبي الخطايا و الذنوب

- ليس هناك جهنم واحدة، بل لكل أصحاب ذنب جهنم خاصة بهم (قارنوا مع درجات جهنم و الدرك الأسفل عند المسلمين)

- البعث في العالم الآخر إنما هو للأرواح لا للأجساد

- المرأة التي يموت زوجها لا تتزوج بعده، بل تعيش في شقاء دائم، و تكون موضعاً للإهانات و التجريح و تكون في مرتبة أقل من مرتبة الخادم، و لذلك قد تحرق المرأة نفسها إثر وفاة زوجها تفادياً للعذاب المتوقع الذي ستعيش فيه، و قد حرّم القانون المدني هذا الإجراء الديني المتبع منذ أمدٍ بعيد في الهند الحديثة!!

الإيرانيون الأوائل و أسطورة التكوين الإيرانية:

براهما (إبراهيم) الشخصية الدينية التي ارتبطت بصحف الفيدا، بل بكثير من المصطلحات الدالة على الديانة المرتبطة بالفيدا هي الشخصية المسماة في النصوص السنسكريتية "براهما" التي عرفت في الشرق الأدنى بإسم النبي "أبراهام / أبرام" في التوراة و الاناجيل أو النبي "إبراهيم" في القرآن. بالتأكيد هناك من سيعترض على ربط هاتين الشخصيتين في شخص واحد؛ و سيرد هذا الإعتراض أولاً و قبل اباآخرين من أتباع الديانة نفسها التي يُفضلون إطلاق مُصطلح "البراهمية" عليها بدلاً من مصطلح "الهندوسية" ، لأن الأول يدل على الأصل الذي يرد في النصوص المقدسة، فليس ل"هندي" أو "هندوسي" أي ذكر فيها، و لأن المُصطلح الأخير يشمل كل ما في الهند الحديثة و القديمة من أديان، بعضها ناشيء عن البراهمية و بعضها الآخر وافد من ثقافات أخرى. ثم سيعترض أيضاً أصحاب الديانات الإبراهيمية الأخرى خاصة اليهودية و إبنتها الوفية النصرانية (الإسلام) على ذلك، بسبب ادّعاء كل من هاتين الديانتين ملكية شخصية "إبراهيم"، بوصفه السّلف الأول لكل من الشعبين الإسرائيلي و العربي و معتقداتهما اليهودية و الإسلامية، فلا يرضون بأن يكون أصله هندياً أو آرياً كما سيرد في تحليل النصوص السنسكريتية و الوقائع التاريخية و المواقع الجغرافية. إذاً سيتوجب علينا الإعتماد في هذا الربط على ناحيتين: ١. الأولى لغوية خالصة تتعلق باتفاق الأسماء الدالة على الشخصيتين في بلاد السّند و في بلاد غرب الرافدين (الشرق الأدنى)، و ٢. الثانية هي اتفاق الصفات المُلازمة لكل منهما حتى و إن اختلفت المؤهلات و المُصطلحات الدالة على الهوية - المصدر: كتاب صحف إبراهيم، جذور البراهمية من خلال نصوص الفيدا

04 14 سين مرغ و مفهوم مُحَمَّد رَسولُ الله، نبوّة الشامبهالا الهندية، التشابهات بين البوذية و اليهودية و الإسلام توافق التلمود مع الأحاديث النبوية

لو راجعنا المخطوطات التي تعود إلى القرنين السادس 6 و السابع 7 الميلاديين نجد أنّها تشير إلى أنّ (مُحَمَّد) هو شخص مُنفصل تماماً عن كسرى الفرس خسرو الثاني و قد قضى على حُكم الملك الفارسي يزدجرد الثالث (آخر كسرى للفرس و هو بحسب الباحث د. سامي فريد عبد الملك بن مروان و هو نفسه المأمون في بحثه العصر الساساني الأخير هو نفسه العصر العباسي الأول و لا وجود لخلفاء راشديين و لا خلفاء أمويين) و أنهى حُكم الساسانيين / آل ساسان! و في شهادة لإحدى المخطوطات الفارسية ذكرت أن محمد "كان قائد الجيشِ الذي قضى على يزدجرد"، و حتى التاريخ الإسلامي يوجد فيه حديث منسوب للنبي يقول فيه: "هلك كسرى و لا كسرى بعده" في إشارة واضحة لتطابق المخطوطات الفارسية تلك مع كتب الحديث و التراث الإسلامية. إضافةً إلى أن تلك الأحداث كانت تمثّل ثورة لإعادة مجد مملكة بارثيا العربية من جديد (الحلم العربي) و العرب الذين أتوا من بلاد فارس (و ليس من شبه الجزيرة العربية) كانوا أصحاب مملكة البارثان / البارثن / البرثن التي كانت مُمتدة من تخوم الهند و السند شرقاً و أرمينيا إلى حدود الصين شمالاً و إلى العراق و بلاد الشام غرباً، و لذلك نجد العديد من وجوه الخلفاء العباسيين بملامح آسيوية خالصة، لأنه قد حدث صِراع بين تلك القبائل على السلطة. يقول الباحث أحمد رسمي: "عندما قمنا بالبحث عن المدينة التي أتى منها الإمبراطور البيزنطي موريس (أو موريق) الذي ساعد الملك الفارسي خسرو الثاني باستعادة حكمه من الإنقلابي بهرام تشوبين وجدنا أنها كانت تقع في أرمينيا و إسمها (عربسوس / عرب سوس) و نحن نعلم أنّ لازمة (سوس) هي لازمة يونانية و تعني "مدينة" أي أنّ عربسوس أو عرب سوس تعني "مدينة العرب" التي كانت في أرمينيا". و هذا يُطابق ما أورده الباحث عارف مُعين في مُحاولته أن يُظهِر بأن الملك الفارسي خسرو الثاني نفسه كان هو (محمد رسول الله) حين ذكر أنّ أخوال خسرو الثاني كانوا من البارثان و قد ساعدوه في استعادة حكمه من الإنقلابي بهرام تشوبين، لأننا نجد أنّ الإمبراطور البيزنطي موريس (موريق) كان فعلاً من أخوال خسرو الثاني لأنه كان بارثي الأصل، و توحيد البارثان تمّ تحت راية المذهب الديني النصراني النسطوري التوحيدي الجديد (سيصبح نواة الإسلام الشيعي لاحقاً) الذي وحّدهم تحت راية مذهب واحد لأنّ ذلك كان هو الحل الوحيد لجمع قبائل فارسية و عربية و يهودية و مسيحية مُتفرّقة كانت لكل منها عادات و تقاليد مُختلفة ...

من المُمكِن جداً أن يكون الملك خسرو الثاني هو الذي ساعد في ظهور و تبلور دين الإسلام فعلاً و ذلك عن طريق أنّه سمح لقائد جيوشه سين / إيليا / عليا / شاهين / ذو الفقار / أبو تراب / الفاروق / إياس بن قبيصة ملك المناذرة أن يُباشر دعوته تحت رعايته! و لو أخذنا بعين الإعتبار لقب إليا / عليا و هو القائد (سين)، نلاحظ أنّ القادة الفرس كانوا يأخذون ألقابهم من الديانة الزرداشتية القديمة تكريماً لهم، فلماذا أطلق الملك خسرو الثاني على إيليا / عليا لقب

(سين)؟ الحقيقة أنّ هذا تعبير يرجع لـ(سين مرغ) الكائن الأسطوري الفارسي المُشابه للعنقاء أو طائر الفينيق و كان يُسَمَّى عند الفُرس: (رسول ما بين الأرض و السماء)!! هذا يعني أن الملك خسرو الثاني شخصياً أعطى القائد إيليا / عليا لقب الرّسول (سيُطلَق عليه لاحقاً بصيغة رسول الإسلام / النبي المحمد)!!!، عندما أحب الإمبراطور هيراكيوليس / هيركوليس (هرقل) أنّ يتفاوض على السلام مع الفرس اختار صقر المملكة القائد سين حتى يتكلّم معه و لم يختار القائد الآخر خنزير المملكة الجنرال شهرباراز أو شهرفاراز (أبو سُفيان) رغم كونه رومياً كان يعمل تحت أمرة الفرس، لأنّ القائد سين هو "الرسول" / رأس الجناح الديني الذي كان له التأثير الأكبر، الأمر الذي أغضب خسرو الثاني، لأن إيليا / عليا (الرّسول) وافق حينها على عقد السلام مع هرقل قبل العودة لرأي خسرو الثاني فأخذ حجماً أكبر مما أراده له خسرو الثاني، و هذا ما تخوّف منه إلقائد إيليا / عليا من أنّ خسرو الثاني كان يفكر بالتآمر عليه و بالتّخلّص منه، مما دفع إيليا / عليا إلى أن يهرب من وجهه و أن يُهاجر مع أتباعه و قيامه بالإلتجاء إلى قبائل الغساسنة (المسيحيين العرب / النّصارى) في بلاد الشام و يبدأ في تأسيس جيش الإنقلاب على حُكم الساسانيين!

"مُحَمّد رسول الله" هي نبوءة الشامبهالا، التي تمّ تفصيلها على إيليا / عليا؛ نبوءة مُحَمّد المعلّم السّابع. أما مكة الإسلام الأولى المعنية هنا فهي كعبة بلخ التي كانت تقع بشمال أفغانستان، و من هنا جاء لفظ (بر مكة) أو ال(برامكة)، سَدَنة أو حفظة بيت كعبة بلخ الذين سنتناولنهم بالتفصيل في إحدى الحلقة القادمة، و عبارة "كالاكي المُوَحِّد" تعني "أمير المُوَحِّدين" أو "أمير المؤمنين"، فالفتح الفارسي لبلاد العراق و الشام و فلسطين و مصر هو الفتح العربي، و الذي كان قائد جيش العرب (البارثان) ما هو إلا ملك المناذرة صقر المملكة الشاهين إياس بن قبيصة / إيليا / عليا الرّسول / سين مرغ / القائد سين / النبي الفاتح / المُحَمَّد المُخَلِّص، الذي كان يستعين به كسرى الفرس خسرو الثاني في جميع حروبه و يأخذ مشورته، و جيش إياس / إيليا / عليا كان مؤلفاً من الهاجريين (أبناء هاجر) أو الإسماعيليين / أبناء إسماعيل (السراسنة / السرسن) الذي كان مُتحالفاً مع عرب و يهود الرّها و قبائل يهود شمال شبه الجزيرة العربية (يهود الشتات) في "الحرب المُقدّسة" لاسترجاع مدينة القدس و موقع قدس الأقداس من الرّوم البيزنطيين!!

أتى من الديانة البوذية في الهند؛ أسطورة الشامبهالا! حينما يفكر الناس في المفهوم الإسلامي للجهاد أو "الحرب المُقَدَّسة" فهم يربطونه بالمعنى السلبي الذي يحمل معنى الإنتقام و التّدمير بإسم الله لإكراه الناس على اعتناق دين الإسلام. و قد يقرون أنهم بذلك مُساويين للصليبيين، لكنهم عادةً لا يرون أنّ البوذية مُشابهة لهذا، فهم على أية حال يقولون إنّ البوذية دين السلام، و ليس فيها مُصطلح "الحرب المُقَدَّسة"! لكن الفحص العميق للنصوص البوذية، و خاصةً أدب "الكالاتشاكرا تانترا"، يكشف كِلا المستويين الداخلي و الخارجي للمعركة التي يُمكن أن نسميها "حروب مُقَدَّسة". و الدراسة غير المنحازة للإسلام تكشف نفس الشيء، ففي كلا الديانتين قد يستغل القادة الأبعاد الخارجية للحرب المُقَدَّسة لمكاسبَ سياسيةٍ أو إقتصادية أو شخصيَة، باستخدامها لحشد القوات العسكرية للمعركة. و هناك أمثلة تاريخية معروفة بالنسبة للإسلام، غير أن المرء ينبغي ألا يكون ورديا حيال البوذية، و يظن أنها مُحصنةٌ ضد هذه الظاهرة. و رغم ذلك فإن الديانتين تؤكدان على أنّ المعركة المُقَدَّسة هي معركة داخلية روحية ضد جهل الإنسان لنفسه و ضد أساليبه و نزعاته التّدميرية!!

يكاد مُعظم الباحثين يُجمِعون على أنّ الدين غير الهندي الموجود في الكلاتشاكرا هو الدين اليهودي و هو دين الإسلام نفسه، و قد يرجع ذلك لكون دين الإسلام قد ظهر في التاريخ الذي تنبأ به الملك مانجوشري ياشاس! و قد يُعزّز من استنباطهم هذا أنّ اليهودية و الإسلام لهما مظاهر كثيرة مُشتركة جاءت في مواضع أخرى من نصوص الكلاتشاكرا مثل: نحر الذبائح بإسم الله، و خِتان الذكور، و النساء المُحجَّبات، و وضعيات الصلاة و الصلاة خمس مراتٍ في اليوم بالتوجه نحو الحرم المكّي. المُصطلح السنسكريتي لغير الهنود هنا هو "مليتشا" (و بلغة التِّبت لالو)، و هو يعني "شخصاً ما يتحدث بطريقة غير مفهومة"، أي بلغة غير سنسكريتية (الطريف أننا اليوم نطلق تعبير معاكس على أنّ شخصاً ما يتحدّث بالسنسكريتية للدلالة على أنه يتحدث بطريقة غير مفهومة فنحن نقول: احكي معي بالعربي مو بالسنسكريتي). و قد طبّق الهندوس و البوذيون هذا المُصطلحَ على كل الغُزاة الأجانب في شمال الهند، بدءاً من غزو الهنود الإغريق Indo-Greek Kingdom في زمن أشوكا الكبير (الإسكندر الأكبر). أما المُصطلح السنسكريتي الرئيسي الآخر المُستخدم فهو "طايي"، و هو مُصطلح مُشتق من المُصطلح الفارسي الذي يُشير إلى العرب؛ فهو مُستخدم للإشارة إلى الغزاةِ العرب لإيران في مُنتصف القرن السابع 7 الميلادي

قدّم الكالكي الأول مزيداً من الوصف للدين المُستقبلي غير الهندي، على أنّ لديه صفاً من المُعلّمين العظماء، هم: آدم و نوح و إبراهيم و موسى و عيسى و ماني و محمد و المهدي. و أنّ محمد سيأتي إلى بغداد في أرض مكة، و هذه الفقرة تُساعد في تحديد الغزاة داخل المُجتمع الإسلامي. عاش محمد، بحسب الرواية الإسلامية الرسمية، بين عامي 570 م و 632 م أما بغداد فقد بُنِيَت في عام 762 م؛ لتكون حاضرة الخلافة العباسية العربية و استمرت حتى سقوطها و تدميرها على أيدي الغُزاة المغول عام 1,258 م. و ماني رجل فارسي، عاش في العراق في القرن الثالث 3 الميلادي، و أسَّس ديانة اختيارية هي: المانوية، التي كانت تقوم، مثل الديانة الإيرانية التي سبقتها: الزرادشتية، على الصِّراع بين قوى الخير و الشر. و كانت الطائفة الشيعية المانوية المُبتدعة هى الوحيدة فى الإسلام التى كانت ترى فى مانى نبياً، تلك الطائفة التى كان من أتباعها بعض المسؤولين الكبار فى البلاط العباسى ببغداد فى صدر

الدولة العباسية، اضطهدهم الخلفاء العباسيون. لكن عامة المُسلمين عامة لا يرون ماني كذلك. علماء البوذية فيما يُعرَف اليوم بأفغانستان و شبه القارة الهندية عملوا في بغداد خلال الجزء الثاني من القرن الثامن 8 الميلادي (طبعاً جميع هذه التواريخ تقليدية و لا تحتسب الزمن الشبحي حوالي ال 300 سنة المُضافة إلى التقويم الميلادي و في حال تطبيقها هذا يضع جميع تلك الأحداث في القرن الميلادي الرابع و ليس السابع)، و كانوا يترجمون النصوص السنسكريتية إلى العربية. و تُتابع النّبوءة: سيكون المهدي حاكماً مُستقبلياً (إمام) من نسل محمد، يقود المؤمنين إلى القدس، و يستعيد الشريعة الإسلامية، و يوحّد أتباع الإسلام في دولة سياسية واحدة، قبل قيام الساعة التي تنهي هذا العالم. و هو مُعادل التّصوُّر الإسلامي للمسيح المُنتَظر، فمفهوم المهدي برز فقط خلال العصر العباسي الأول (الساساني الأخير)، حيث ظهر ثلاثة 3 أشخاص ادَّعَوا هذا اللقب: ١. الخليفة نفسه (الملك الساساني عبد الملك بن مروان / المأمون)، و ٢. منافسه في مكة (عبد الله بن الزّبير / من الزّبيل)، و ٣. شهيد يحمل إسمه تجرَّد لحملة تمرُّد ضد الدولة العباسية (بابك الخرمي؟). أما النّظر للمُهدي المُنتَظر على أنه يسوع عيسى المسيح بن مريم فلم يظهر إلا لاحقاً!

المُلفِت للنّظر أنّ قائمة الشيعة الإسماعيلية للأنبياء هي القائمة نفسها الموجودة في الكلاتشاكرا، لكن ينقصها (ماني) فقط! و الإسماعيلية هي الطائفة الوحيدة التي تؤمن بأنّ المُهدي نبي!! الشيعة الإسماعيلية كانت الطائفة الرسمية المُتّبعة في مولتان (أو ما يعرف اليوم بشمال السند في الباكستان) خلال النّصف الثاني من القرن العاشر 10 الميلادي، و كانت مولتان حليفةً للإمبراطورية الفاطمية الإسماعيلية التي كان مركزها في مصر (القاهرة)، حيث كان الإسماعيليون الفاطميون ينافسون العباسيين من أجل السيادة الكاملة على العالم الإسلامي
من هذا الدليل قد نفترض أن وصف الكلاتشاكرا للغزاة غير الهنود كان اعتماداً على الإسماعيليين في مولتان أواخر القرن العاشر 10 الميلادي، مُختلطاً ببعض مظاهر الشيعة المانوية في أواخر القرن الثامن 8 الميلادي. و على الأرجح أن مُعِدّي هذا الوصف كانوا معلمين بوذيين يعيشون تحت حُكم الشاهيين الهندوس في شمال أفغانستان و أوديانا (وادي سوات في شمال غرب باكستان الحالية). فالأديرة البوذية في منطقة كابول من أفغانستان، مثل سوباهار، لها زخارف مِعمارية مُشابهة لتلك الموجودة في الكالاتشاكرا ماندالا، حيث كانت أوديانا إحدى المناطق الرئيسة التي نَمَت فيها التانترا البوذية. علاوةً على ذلك كان لأوديانا اتصال مُباشر مع كشمير؛ حيث ازدهرت بها كلٌ من التانترا البوذية و الهندوسية الشيفية (نسبةً للإله الظّلامي شيفا إله كوكب زحل). و كان هناك طريقٌ رئيسٌ للحج البوذي ربط الإثنين معاً. لذا يجب علينا أن ننظر إلى العلاقات البوذية - الإسلامية في شرقي أفغانستان و أوديانا و كشمير خلال العصر العباسي لنفهم سياق تعاليمها عبر التاريخ و منشأ مفهوم الحروب المقدسة

"الحرب بين قوى الخير و الشر، التي ستنتهي بحربٍ رهيبة يقودها المسيح"، هي فكرة ظهرت بدايةً في الزرادشتية، و تأسّست في القرن السادس 6 قبل الميلاد، أي قبل ولادة بوذا، و دخلت اليهوديةَ في الفترة ما بين القرن الثاني 2 قبل الميلاد و القرن الثاني 2 الميلادي، و بالتالي شقّت طريقَها إلى اليهو-مسيحية النصرانية المبكرة و المانوية، ثم بعد ذلك إلى الإسلام. و قد ظهرت فكرة هذه الحرب الرهيبة بطريقة أخرى في الهندوسية في "الفيشنو بورانا"، في القرن الرابع 4 الميلادي تقريباً و هي تروي أنّ الإله فيشنو سيظهر في تجسّده الأخير في نهاية الكاليوجا في صورة كالكي، و يولد في بلدة شامبالا إبناً للبراهمان (فيشنو ياشاس)، و سيهزم غير الهنود في ذلك الوقت الذين يتّبعون مسار التدمير، و سوف يعيدون إيقاظ عقول الناس. بعد ذلك، و في مواكبة المفهوم الهندي للزمن الدوري، سيتبع ذلك عصرٌ ذهبي، بدلاً من الحكم النهائي و نهاية العالم، كما في رواية غير الهنود للفكرة. من الصعب إثبات أن وصف "الفيشنو بورانا" مُستمد من التأثيرات الأجنبية بتصرُّف ليتلاءم مع العقلية الهندية، أم أنه نشأ بصفةٍ مُستقلة. و إنّ إستخدام الإسلام لتمثيل القوى التدميرية المهددة أمرٌ ربما يمكن فهمه إذا نُظِر إليه في سياق العصر العباسي الأول / الساساني الأخير في منطقة كابول بشرقي أفغانستان!

العلاقات البوذية - الإسلامية أثناء العصر العباسي:

حكم الشاهيون الأتراك المنطقة حتى عام 870 م، و قد فقدوا السيطرة عليها فقط بين عامي 815 م و 819 م؛ إذ أنه أثناء تلك السنوات الأربعة غزا الخليفة العباسي المأمون (عبد الملك بن مروان / يزدجرد الثالث) كابول، و أجبر الشاه الحاكم على الخضوع له و قبول الإسلام. و قد قدَّم شاه كابول ليُعبِّر عن خضوعه إلى الخليفة هدية كانت عبارة عن تمثال ذهبي لبوذا من دير سوباهار. و وأرسل الخليفة المأمون، كعلامةً على انتصار الإسلام، التّمثال الضّخم بعرشه الفضي و تاجه المرصَّع إلى مكة، و عرضه هناك عند الكعبة لمدة عامين كاملين! بفعلته هذه كان الخليفة يظهر سلطتَهُ في حكم العالم الإسلامي بأسره بعد قهرِه لأخيه في حربٍ أهلية. و رغم ذلك فهو لم يُجبِر البوذيين في كابول على دخول الإسلام، و لم يُدَمِّر الأديرة، و لم يُحَطِّم تمثال بوذا الذي أهداه له شاه كابول باعتباره صنماً، لكنه أرسله بدلاً من ذلك إلى مكة بوصفه غنيمةً!! بعدما انسحب الجيش العباسي الساساني ليُحارب حركاتٍ إنفصاليةً في أجزاء أخرى من إمبراطوريتهم سَرعان ما استردت الأديرة البوذية عافيتها. الفترة التالية التي كانت فيها منطقة كابول تحت الحكم الإسلامي كانت أيضًا قصيرةً، بين عامي 870 م و 879 م. فقد غزاها الحكام الصفاريون، و كانوا يحكمون دولة عسكرية مُستقلة، و كان من قسوتها تدميرها للثقافات المحلية و قد أرسل الغزاة عدداً من الأصنام البوذية إلى الخليفة العباسي كغنائمَ حرب. لكن حينما استعاد الشاهيون الهندوس المنطقة من الشاهيين الأتراك مرةً أخرى استعاد البوذيون و الأديرة رونقهم السابق

هل إحدى طرائق الغازي هي المفهوم الإسلامي للجهاد؟ إذا كان الأمر كذلك، فهل الكلاتشاكرا تصور بدقةٍ الجهاد؟ أو هي فقط تستخدم الغزو غير الهندي للشامبالا لتمثل تطرفاً يجب تحاشيه؟ لكي نتحاشى سوء الفهم بين الأديان من المهم استقصاء هذه الأسئلة! فالكلمة العربية "الجهاد" تعني: النِّضال، يحتاج الفرد فيهِ أن يتحمّل المُعاناة و الصّعوبات مثل الجوع و العطش، أثناء رمضان، و هو شهر الصيام. هؤلاء الذين ينخرطون في هذا النِّضال يُسمون: "مُجاهدين"، و هذا يُذَكِّرُ المرءَ بالتعاليم البوذية عن الصّبر من أجل ال"بوديساتفا" لتحمُّل الصّعوبات في اتّباع طريق التّنوير

أهل السُّنَّة من المُسلمين يعرفون خمسة 5 أنواع من الجهاد:

١. جهاد عسكري: يمثل حملةً دفاعية ضد المُعتدين الذين يحاولون إلحاق الضرر بالإسلام، و هو ليس هجوماً عدوانياً لإكراه الآخرين على اعتناق الإسلام
٢. جهاد بالمال: لدعم الفقراء و المُحتاجين
٣. جهاد بالعمل: و هو دعم الإنسان لنفسَه و لأسرته بأمانة
٤. جهاد بالدِّراسة: لاكتساب المعارف و
٥. جهاد ضد النّفس: و هو نضالٌ داخلي لقهر الرّغبات و الأفكار ضد التّعاليم الإسلامية

أما المُسلمين الشيعة فيؤكدون على النوع الأول من الجهاد؛ مُساوين بين الهجوم على دولةٍ إسلامية و الهجوم على الدين الإسلامي، و العديد من الشيعة يقبلون أيضاً النوع الخامس، و هو الجهاد الداخلي الرّوحي ...

التشابهات العديدة بين البوذية و اليهودية و الإسلام:

عرض الكلاتشاكرا لحرب شامبالا الأسطورية، و المناقشة الإسلامية للجهاد يبين تشابهاً ملحوظاً؛ فكلٌّ من الحروب المقدسة البوذية و الإسلامية هي تكتيكات دفاعيةٌ لإيقاف هجوم القوى المُعادية الخارجية، و لم تكن أبداً حملاتٍ عدوانيَّةً للفوز بمُعتنقين جُدد للدين. و كلاهما لديه مستويات داخلية روحية للمعنى؛ حيث تكون المعركة ضد الأفكار السلبية و العواطف المدمرة. و كلاهما تقومان على مبادئَ أخلاقيةٍ، لا على أساس التّحامل و الكراهية. و هكذا، فعرض الغزو غير الهندي لأسطورة الشامبالا هو عرضٌ سلبيٌّ محض، فإن أدب الكلاتشاكرا في الحقيقة يُحَرِّفُ مفهومَ الجهاد بطريقة البراسانغيكا، من أخذها إلى المنطقية المُتطرِّفة لتبيان موضع لِتَحاشيه. و كما شوَّه العديدُ من القادة مفهوم الجهاد، و استغلوه من أجل القوة و المكاسب الشخصية، فإن الشيء نفسه حدث مع شامبالا، و مناقشتها للحرب ضد القواتِ الأجنبيةِ المدمرة. و كمثال على ذلك فقد أعلن أغفان دورجييف، مُساعد المعلم دالاي لاما الثالث عشر 13، و هو روسي مغولي من بوريا‌تيا، عاش في أواخر القرن التاسع عشر 19 الميلادي، أنّ روسيا كانت هي شامبالا، و أنّ القيصر الرّوسي كان هو الكالكي! بهذه الطريقة حاول إقناعَ الدالاي لاما الثالث عشر 13 بأن يتحالفَ مع روسيا ضد البريطانيين "المليتشا"، في الصِّراع من أجل السيطرة على آسيا الوسطى!!

و مثلما يُمكن لنُقّاد البوذية أن يُركِّزوا على إساءة استخدام المستوى الخارجي الكلاتشاكرا للمعركة الروحية و تجاهل المستوى الداخلي، مما فيه من إجحافٌ للبوذية كليةً؛ فالشيء نفسه يَصدُق على النُّقاد المُعادين للإسلام و للجهاد! النّصيحة في التانترا البوذية فيما يتعلّق بالمعلم الرّوحي ربما تكونُ مفيدةً هنا، فكل معلم روحي تقريباً لديه خليط من الصفات الإيجابية و السلبية. و على الرغم من أن التابع لا ينبغي أن يُنكرَ الصِّفات السَّلبيةَ للمعلم؛ إذ إنّ الإسهابَ فيها سيُسببُ مشاعر الغضبَ و الإكتئاب، و لو أنه بدلاً من ذلك ركّز على جوانب معلمه المضيئةِ سيكسب إلهاماً لاتّباع الطريق الروحي. الشيء نفسه يمكن أن يُقالَ عن التعاليم البوذية و الإسلامية، فيما يتعلق بالحروب المقدسةِ، فكلا الدينَين تعرَّضا للإساءة لدعوتَيْهما من أجل معركةٍ خارجيةٍ، حينما تُهدِّد القوى التّدميرية المُمارسةَ الدينيةَ. و دون إنكار أو إسهابٍ في هذه الإساءاتِ يُمكن للمرء أن يكسِبَ الإلهامَ بالتركيزِ على الفوائدِ من خوضِ حربٍ مقدسةٍ داخلية في كِلا العقيدَتَيْن [1-3]

1. التّعريف:
يُعرف التلمود على أنه الشريعة الشفهية التي كتبت بعد وفاة نبي الله موسى / محمد ملك اليهود و كذلك [السنة القولية الشفهية هي ما كتب عن النبي محمد بعد موته مشافهة]

2. أول من كتبها و هالة التّقديس:
كان أوّل من كتب المرويات لدى اليهود هو الحاخام (عيزرا الكاتب) الذي يعده اليهود واحداً من أنبيائهم التالين، و له في العهد القديم سفر خاص به ورد في لقبه: "عزرا الكاتب.. كاتب كلام وصايا الرّب"
و كذلك [نهي عن كتابة المرويات في عهد الرسول محمد و عهد خلفائه، ثم تم السماح بكتابتها و جمعها فبدأ مالك بن أنس الملقب ب"حجة الله على خلقه"، في موطأه ثم تولى محمد البخاري في الحديث بجمعها في صحيحه. و لدى الشيعة الكليني الملقب ب"ثقة الإسلام" و كتابه الكافي]

3. الحجية:
يعتبر التلمود هو سجل يجمع نقاشات الحاخامات حول الشريعة المكتوبة و يجمع أيضاً الأخلاق و العادات و الأساطير و القصص التي يعدها التراث اليهودي مؤصّلة بالتواتر الشفهي
و كذلك [تعتبر روايات السنة هي تجميع لما قاله النبي محمد و ما حصل من نقاشات و اختلافات الصحابة لدى السنة و أهل البيت لدى الشيعة مؤصلة بالتواتر الشفهي]

4. الطبقية:
يعتبر كتبة التراث الشفهي (التلمود) حاخامات معلمين يقال لهم "سفرائيم" قاموا بجمع أسفار التوراة و شروحاتها و ربطوها بالتراث المروي شفاهياً، و على امتداد 300 سنة قاموا باستنباط أحكام التوراة و تكييفها بالمرويات حتى أصبحت شريعة تفاعلية
و كذلك [يعتبر السنة كتبة الموروث الشفهي علماء لمُصطلح الحديث، كما يعتبر الشيعة أئمة لأهل البيت قاموا بجمع الروايات بعد وفاة النبي محمد بـ 200 سنة، ثم قاموا باستنباط أحكام القرآن مما جمعوه من المرويات حتى أصبحت شريعة تفاعلية]

5. السلطة الدينية:
سنّ اليهود مجموعة من الشرائع سميت فيما بعد "كلام السوفريم"، ثم تشكلت بعدهم هيئة قضائية صارت بمثابة سلطة تشريعية عرفت بإسم حُكماء الدين (السنهدرين الأعلى)
و كذلك [تم تشكيل سلطة تشريعية بإسم علماء الدين لدى السنة و الشيعة]

6. التأصيل:
أتى بعدهم من كتب تلك الشريعة الشفاهية و سميت "المِشناه" أي (كتاب المراجع و القوانين) في عام 200 م، و كاتبوها يعرفون بإسم "التنائيم" أي "المعلمون"
و كذلك [سنّ علماء الحديث لدى السنة مجموعة شرائع سميت بعلم مُصطلح الحديث، كما سنّ الشيعة في كتبهم فهم أئمة أهل البيت لتفاسير القرآن و روايات عن سيرة النبي محمد و حديثه و تعليقاتهم عليه]
و بعد ذلك بـ 300 عام ظهر تحليل للمشناه سمي ب"الجمارا" (أي التّكملة)، قام به من أسموا أنفسهم ب"الأمورائيم"
و كذلك [انتشر ما يسمى بالمذاهب الإسلامية ليتشكل علم الفقه الإسلامي و عرف علمائها سنة و شيعة بإسم أئمة المذاهب أو الفقهاء]

7. العدد:
تتألف المِشناه من ستة 6 مباحث تسمى "سداريم"
و كذلك [يجزم علماء مُصطلح الحديث أن صحاح المرويات 6 و هي ما تعرف بإسم كتب الصحاح الستة 6 لدى السنة بينما لدى الشيعة فهي 4 كتب فقط]

8. التفريع:
كل سدر منها يتألف من 7 إلى 12 مقالة "مسيختوت" هي:
1- سدر طهروت (الطهارة)
2- سدر زراعيم (العبادات)
3- سدر موعيد (الأعياد و تقاليدها)
4- سدر نشيم (أحكام الزواج و الطلاق و مُلك اليمين)
5- سدر نزيقين (العقوبات)
6- سدر قداشيم (أحكام الصّيام و التّضحية و الهيكل)
و كذلك [يتألّف كل صحيح من الصحاح الستة 6 لدى السنة أو الكتب الأربعة 4 لدى الشيعة من عدة كتب يحتوي كل كتاب منها على عدة أبواب كل باب يتألف من عدة روايات، و من هذه الكتب:
1- كتاب الطهارة

2- كتاب العبادات
3- كتاب الزواج
4- كتاب العقوبات
5- كتاب الصّيام
و غيرها من الكتب
9. الفحوى و الأسلوب:

يتكون التلمود من المِشناه و الجمارا، و المِشناه عبارة عن آراء محسومة فيها القليل من الحوار، بينما الجمارا فعلى النقيض منها فهي تطرح على شكل جدال و حوار بين السائل و المُجيب حتى و إن كانت شخصياتهم وهمية من صنع الخيال
و كذلك [تلتزم كتب الحديث على الحكم المحسوم بالرواية، أما ما يعرف ب"الفقه" فهو على اختلافات كثيرة بين أهل المذاهب يشوبها الجدل و الطرح الحواري بين السائل و المُجيب كلٌ بحسب مذهبه دون تحديد لهوية السائل]

نأتي الآن للتساؤلات:

التشابهات بين الموروث اليهودي و الموروث الإسلامي ليست مُقتصرة فقط على الكتب بل تتعدّاها إلى ظهور الطوائف، نهايةً ب(اليهود القرّائين) في اليهودية و (المسلمون القرآنيون) في الإسلام. من كتب هذه الكتب و لماذا؟ لماذا هذا التوافق أو بالأحرى شبه التطابُق التام بين كتب الموروث اليهودي و كتب الموروث الإسلامي؟! ألا يبدو واضحاً لنا أنّ تراثنا الإسلامي من الفقه و التشريع و كتب السيرة و الأحاديث النبوية هو نسخة طبقة الأصل للتراث اليهودي و هو مليء بالإسرائيليات، و القصص الكاذبة و المزورة و المسروقة من أساطير الشعوب و الحضارات القديمة؟! ألا يجدر بنا أن نصيح بملء أصواتنا: صح النوم أيها الغافلون!!!

أخيراً نود أن نُثير الإنتباه إلى عدة نقاط حول بحث د. سامي فريد "مقدمة في نشوء الإسلام":

1. أولاً، يوجد خطأ في الجدول المُرفق على أنّ عمر بن الخطاب ليس الملك خسرو الثاني بل هو الملك الساساني خسرو الأول فاقتضى التنويه

2. شخصية محمد رسول الله كما بتنا جميعنا نعلم هي توليفة من عدة شخصيات دينية و عسكرية؛ الشخصية الدينية القرآنية الرئيسية مُتمحورة حول النبي موسى (موزا / بوذا سيدهارتا غواتاما أي سيّد بني حارثة قثم جاءَ و أتمّ) ملك اليهود و الخطاب القرآني موجه بشكل أساسي إلى بني إسرائيل ثم أضيفت عليها عدة شخصيات لأنبياء آخرين أتوا بعده، فقد نسج رواة الفرس شخصية محمد الدينية كمزيج من عدة أنبياء آخرين مثل زرادشت و مزدك (مصدق) و ماني و يوحنا المعمدان و تحطيم إبراهيم لأصنام قومه (تحطيم محمد لأصنام الكعبة) و هجرة موسى بأتباعه هرباً من الإضطهاد الديني (الهجرة النبوية؛ هجرة محمد و التجائه بالنجاشي ملك الحبشة و أيضاً هجرته من مكة إلى المدينة)، أما شخصية محمد القائد العسكري فهي لعليا / إيليا / إياس بن قبيصة ملك المناذرة قائد جيش خسرو الثاني الذي حرّر الشام و القدس من البيزنطيين و استعاد صليب الصلبوت المقدس منهم، و أيضاً أخذ الرواة الفرس جوانب من شخصية ملك الفرس الساساني خسرو الثاني و ألصقوها بشخصية محمد في كتب التراث الإسلامي و السيرة النبوية مثل التجاءه إلى أخواله من آل شيبان في الأهواز و زواجه من شيرين المسيحية (زواج محمد من ماريا القبطية) و هربه مع صديقه الصدوق إليا / عليا / القائد سين / الشاهين / صقر المملكة إياس بن قبيصة من وجه المنقلب عليه بهرام تشوبين (هروب محمد مع أبو بكر من وجه المُشركين و اختباءهما في أحد المغاور في الرواية الإسلامية) و غيرها ...

3. محمد السيرة النبوية شخصية وهمية نشأت من دمج سيرة قثم جاء و أتمّ (بوذا / النبي موسى) مع شخصيتي إياس / الياس بن قبيصة حاكم الحيرة و شخصية مُسلمة بن حبيب الحنفي و أسموه قثم بن عبد اللات القرشي (أخذوا من مُسلمة لقبه الصادق الأمين و آياته المكية السلمية التي تدعو للحوار و لحُسن مُعاملة الأهل و الجوار إلخ ...)، الذي ولد في بصرى و درس على يد بحيرا الراهب و القس ورقة بن نوفل في الشام كنبي و مبشر لأم القرى أي أورشليم و القرى المهلكة كمدين في سيناء و لوط في البحر الميت. "المُهاجرين" هم أتباع الدعوة النصرانية التوحيدية من اليهو-مسيحيين الذين طردوا من بلاد الشام و فلسطين من قبل الروم المسيحيين التثليثيين الذين أجبِروا الباقين منهم على التعميد بإسم الثالوث و هؤلاء هم "المُستضعفين الذين لم يُهاجروا" الوارد ذكرهم في القرآن، أما "الأنصار" فهم المناذرة الذين آووهم و أعزوهم و شاطروهم أموالهم و أملاكهم و قاموا بحمايتهم. من هؤلاء و هؤلاء تشكّل جيش عليا / إليا المُقاتل زعيم الحيرة و فاتح القدس الذي حارب جيش مُسلمة لاحقاً في الشام و هزمه. بكة الأصلية هي أورشليم القديمة قبل البتراء و لم تكن إيلياء القدس و لا مكة الحجاز الحالية في المملكة السعودية، أما بلخ في أفغانستان فهي مكة المذكورة في كتب التراث الإسلامي و السيرة النبوية الفارسية و التي كانت كعبتها (كعبة النوبهار / نيافا هارا / و سدنتها البرامكة) قبلة لعدة أديان و مقر لآلهة الهندوس و البوذيين و النّصارى / النّصرانيين الموحدين (اليهو-مسيحيين نواة المُسلمين قبل تزواجهم مع الزردشتية لإنتاج دين الإسلام) و اليهود، (هي التي كانت بداخلها صور المسيح و أمه)، أي أنها كانت مركز تجمُّع ديني للجميع من كل الأديان و الفرق و الطوائف كانوا يحجّون إليها و يتاجرون على طول طريق القوافل، طريق الحرير الذي امتد من الهند شرقاً إلى روما غرباً

5. في ذلك الوقت كان الحكام يتدرّجون بالألقاب بحسب حجمهم و مساحة رقعة حكمهم، من حاكم أو والي محلي صغير إلى أمير منطقة كبير إلى أمير المؤمنين وصولاً إلى المنصب الأعلى و هو منصب "هلفة الله أو خلفة الله" (الخليفة / خليفة المُسلمين)، فيزدجرد الثالث مثلاً كان له 15 لقباً كان منها "عبد الملك" بن مروانان / بن مروان (أي من مرو في فارس) و أيضاً حصل على لقب "المأمون" عندما تسلّم الخلافة و هي أعلى لقب و أعلى سلطة سياسية في البلاد تماماً مثل لقب "أغسطس" الذي كان يُمنَح للإمبراطور الرّوماني كدرجة عليا، فهذه عادة درج عليها الحكام الساسانيين مثلما درج عليها الحكام البيزنطيين و هنا بيت القصيد: هذا يفسر لماذا نقش الملك الفارسي الساساني يزدجرد الثالث لقبه "المأمون" على الحجر التأسيسي و على الجدران الداخلية لمسجد قبة الصخرة في إيلياء القدس الفلسطينية الحالية و لم ينقش لقبه "عبد الملك" أو "بن مروانان / بن مروان" مع أنه كان باستطاعته القيام بذلك، و لأولئك الذين يصرّون على أنّ المأمون "العباسي" قام بشطب أو محي إسم "عبد الملك بن مروان" الأموي و إقحام إسمه بدلاً منه، نقول لهم و للمرة الألف فقط إنظروا إلى إسم المأمون المؤلف من كلمة واحدة فقط في النقش الذي يبدو بوضوح أنه مكتوب في سياق الجملة بمكانه الصحيح و لا يوجد مط أو إطالة في حروفه ليسد مكان عبارة طويلة هي "عبد الملك بن مروان" المؤلفة من أربعة كلمات، نعتقد أنّ الجدل بات محسوماً في هذه المسألة فلا خلاف على أنّ النّقش أصلي و لم يقُم المأمون بتزويره أو استبدال إسم أو بالأحرى لقب عبد الملك بن مروان و إقحام إسمه بدلاً منه (عبد الملك أو عبد المسيح هو لقب ديني بالمناسبة فالملك هو الله / الملك هو المسيح God is King)!

6. بالنّسبة للعملات، يرد إسم يزدغرد الثالث على عدة عملات بكتابات إسلامية و آيات قرآنية صريحة، فكيف لملك ساساني أن يضرب على عملاته آيات قرآنية؟! أيضاً، توجد عملات له بعد ان استحوذ على لقب "عبد الملك" مضروب عليها كتابات باللغة البهلوية / الفهلوية (الفارسية الوسطى / الساسانية) فكيف لحاكم عربي "أموي" ان يضرب عملة باللغة الفارسية الساسانية و هو الشهير بانه "قام بتعريب الدواوين" ألم يكن حريٌ به القيام بتعريب صكّته التي ستخلد ذكره قبل تعريب أي شيء؟

7. تذكر المرويات الإسلامية و جود 14 خليفة أموي لكن عشرة 10 منهم لا يوجد أي دليل و لا أي عملة و لا أي أثر واحد على وجود اي منهم و لم تكتب سيرتهم من قبل رُواة الفرس في العصر العباسي إلا بعد مرور وقت طويل على انقضاء زمنهم، كل ذلك يدعم ما توصّل له الباحث المصري الكبير د. سامي فريد بتعاون من الباحثة المغربية المُتميزة ليلى حسن بأنّ العصر العباسي الأول كان هو نفسه العصر الساساني الأخير و لا وجود لعصر راشدي و لا لعصر أموي، أما العصر العباسي الثاني فهو عصر حكم ترك المغول. نتمنى أن تكون الفكرة قد توضحت لكم الآن بشكل أفضل، للمزيد يُرجى مُراجعة بحث مقدمة في نشوء الإسلام، أين و كيف و متى؟ ل د. سامي فريد على الروابط التالية:

يعود أول دليل على وجود دين في الهند في فترة ما قبل التاريخ إلى أواخر العصر الحجري الحديث (5,500–2,600 ق.م). أما معتقدات و شعائر الفترة الكلاسيكية المبكرة فتسمى الديانة الفيدية التاريخية، هذه الديانة يظهر فيها تأثر ها بالديانة الهندو-أوروبية البدائية، و أقدم فيدا هي الريغ فيدا Rigvida و يرجع تاريخها من 1,700- 1,100 ق. م، و هي مركز الفيدات لآلهة مثل إندرا و فارونا و آغني، و في طقوس السومية. و طقوس تضحيات النار يانا تغنى بترانيم فيدية لكن بدون معبد أو تماثيل. و قد شهد القرنين التاسع و الثامن قبل الميلاد تكوّن الأوبانيشادية الأولى. و الأوبانيشاد تمثل الأساس النظري للهندوسية الكلاسيكية و تسمى فيدانتا (و هي ختام الفيدا). شنت الأوبانيشاد هجمات على التكثيف المتزايد للطقوس، و من ثم فقد تم توليف هذه التضاربات الواحدية (نسبة للمذهب الواحدي Monistic) في إطار إيماني في المخطوطة الهندوسية المقدسة بهاغافاد غيتا. و الملاحم السنسكريتية العظمى رامايانا و مهابهاراتاتم جمعها على فترات طويلة أثناء أواخر قرون ما قبل الميلاد و بداية القرون الميلادية، و هي تحوي قصصاً أسطورية عن حكام و حروب الهند القديمة تخللتها أطروحات دينية و فلسفية. و كتاب بروناس المتأخر يحوي حكايات عن الديفا والديفيز و تفاعلها مع الإنسان و حروبه ضد الراكشاسا. و التمدن المتزايد في الهند في القرنين الثامن و السابع قبل الميلاد أدى إلى زيادة حركات زهدية أو ما يعرف بالشارمانا، التي تحدت منهجية الطقوس. و يُعتَبر ماهافيرا (حوالي 549 - 477 ق.م)، مؤيد الجاينية و بوذا (حوالي 563- 483 ق.م.) مؤسس البوذية من أبرز أيقونات تلك الحركة. أطلق المصطلح في البداية على تلك المفاهيم الدينية للهندوس و عُرفت تلك المفاهيم بالتالي بالهندوسية - ديانة الهندوس. و البراهمي أو الهندوسي هو من يؤمن بالفلسفات الواردة في أسفار الـ "فيدا"

Create PDF in your applications with the Pdfcrowd HTML to PDF API PDFCROWD

2- مها بهارتا: ملحمة هندية تشبه الإلياذة و الأوديسا عند اليونان ، و مؤلفها "وياس" ووهو إبن العارف "بوسرا" الذي وضعها سنة 950 ق.م.، و هي تصف حرباً بين أمراء من الأسر المالكة، و قد اشتركت الآلهة في تلك الحرب

ب- نظرة الهندوسية إلى الآلهة:

- التوحيد: لا يوجد عند البراهميين (الهندوس) توحيد بالمعنى الدقيق، لكنهم إذا أقبلوا على إله من الآلهة أقبلوا عليه بكل جوارحهم حتى تختفي عن أعينهم كل الآلهة الأخرى، و عندها يخاطبونه ب"رب الأرباب" أو "إله الآلهة"

- التعدد: يعتقد الهندوس بأن لكل طبيعة نافعة أو ضارة إلهاً يُعبد كالماء و الهواء و الأنهار و الجبال. و هي آلهة كثيرة يتقربون إليها بالعبادة و تقديم القرابين أو الأضاحي (مثل عيد الأضحى في للديانة الإبراهيمية النصرانية أي الإسلامية و تقديم الأضاحي إلى رب الأرباب / الإله الأكبر / الله أكبر)

- التثليث: في القرن التاسع قبل الميلاد جمع الكهنة الآلهة في إله واحد أخرج العالم من ذاته و هو الذي أسموه: 1- براهما: من حيث هو موجود و 2- فيشنو : من حيث هو حافظ و 3- شيفا: من حيث هو مُهلك (قارنوا مع أسماء الإله الإسلامي الله: الموجود و الحافظ و المُهلِك)، من يعبد أحد الآلهة الثلاثة فقد عبدها جميعاً أو عبد الواحد الأعلى و لا يوجد أي فارق بينها

- تُعد البقرة حيواناً مقدساً في الهندوسية (قارنوا مع تقديس العجل الذهبي و عبادة البعليم في الديانة اليهودية و مع إسم أهم سورة في القرآن الإسلامي و عن ماذا تحدّثت سورة البقرة)، كما تقدس بعض الجماعات أنواع من الزواحف كالأفاعي و أنواع من الثدييات كالقردة، و لكن تتمتع البقرة من بينها جميعاً بقداسة تعلو على أي قداسة، و لها تماثيل في مختلف المعابد و المنازل و الميادين، و لها حق الإنتقال إلى أي مكان، و لا يجوز للهندوسي أن يمسها بأذى أو بذبحها، و إذا ماتت دفنت بطقوس دينية

- و أيضاً يعتقد البراهميون / الهندوس بأن آلهتهم قد تحل في الانسان فيسمى "أفاتار Avatar" كالفيلم الأمريكي الشهير للمخرج كاميرون، مثل الأفاتار (كريشنا) على سبيل المثال! و تظهر معتقدات البراهمية / الهندوسية جلية واضحة في في "الكارما" و تناسخ الأرواح و الإنطلاق و وحدة الوجود:

3- الإنطلاق: صالح الأعمال و فاسدها ينتج عنه حياة جديدة متكررة لتثاب فيها الروح أو لتعاقب على حسب ما قدمت في الدورة السابقة.

- من لم يرغب في شيء و لن يرغب في شيء و تحرر من رق الأهواء، و اطمأنت نفسه فإنه لا يعاد إلى حواسه، بل تنطلق روحه لتتحد بالبراهما

4- وحدة الوجود: التجريد الفلسفي وصل بالبراهميين إلى أن الإنسان يستطيع خلق الأفكار و الأنظمة و المؤسسات، كما أنه يستطيع المحافظة عليها أو تدميرها، و بهذا يتحد الإنسان مع الآلهة، و تصير النفس هي عين القوة الخالقة:

- الروح كالآلهة أزلية سرمدية مستمرة غير مخلوقة

- العلاقة بين الإنسان و الآلهة كالعلاقة بين شرارة النار و النار ذاتها، و كالعلاقة بين البذرة و بين الشجرة

- هذا الكون كله ليس إلا ظهوراً للوجود الحقيقي، و الروح الإنسانية جزء من الروح العليا

أفكار و مُعتقدات أخرى في البراهمية / الهندوسية:

- الأجساد تحرق بعد الموت لأن ذلك يسمح بأن تتجه الروح إلى أعلى و بشكل عمودي لتصل إلى الملكوت الأعلى في أقرب زمن، كما أن الإحتراق هو تخليص للروح من غلاف الجسم تخليصاً تاماً

- عندما تتخلص الروح و تصعد يكون أمامها ثلاثة عوالم: 1- إما العالم الأعلى: عالم الملائكة، 2- و إما عالم الناس: مقر الآدميين بالحلول، 3- و إما عالم جهنم: و هذا لمرتكبي الخطايا و الذنوب

- ليس هناك جهنم واحدة، بل لكل أصحاب ذنب جهنم خاصة بهم (قارنوا مع درجات جهنم و الدرك الأسفل عند المسلمين)

- البعث في العالم الآخر إنما هو للأرواح لا للأجساد

- المرأة التي يموت زوجها لا تتزوج بعده، بل تعيش في شقاء دائم، و تكون موضعاً للإهانات و التجريح و تكون في مرتبة أقل من مرتبة الخادم، و لذلك قد تحرق المرأة نفسها إثر وفاة زوجها تفادياً للعذاب المتوقع الذي ستعيش فيه، و قد حرّم القانون المدني هذا الإجراء الديني المتبع منذ أمدٍ بعيد في الهند الحديثة!!

الإيرانيون الأوائل و أسطورة التكوين الإيرانية:

هناك الكثير من الأساطير الإيرانية القديمة، لكن أشهرها بالطبع هي تلك التي تحكي عن بدايات الشعب الآري فى إيران للقديمة و هي أقرب ما تكون إلى سفر تكوين إيراني موازي لسفر التكوين التوراتي الذي يحكي عن بدايات الشعب اليهودي و غيره من شعوب تلك المنطقة من العالم آنذاك، حيث تقول الأسطورة الإيرانية أن أول ملوك إيران كان "جيومرت بن يافث بن نوح" و يعتبر هو الجد الأول للفرس و كان يسكن الجبال و يقال له (كر شاه) أي "ملك الجبال"، ثم جاء حفيده "هوشنك بن سيامك بن جيومرت" و قام بتعمير الأراضي الإيرانية لأول مرة. بعد وفاة هوشنك بقيت البلاد من بعده 300 سنة بلا ملك حتى حكمها الملك "طمهورث" الذي قام بتعمير بلاد فارس من جديد، و هو أول من جعل الكلاب تقوم بحراسة الغنم و المواشي و أول من استخدم الطيور الجارحة للصيد و بحسب الأسطورة "قام بركوب الشيطان و طار به إلى السماء"! و من بعده جاء الملك "جمشيد" الذي كان أول من غزل القز و الكتّان و القطن و صنع الخوذة العسكرية و رتّب طبقات الناس و قسّم أعمالهم أي "التّخصص" و ألزمهم العمل باختصاصاتهم. و تضيف الأسطورة الإيرانية أنّ جمشيد قام بصناعة عجلة و فرشها بالديباج و طار بها في السماء و سمي ذلك يوم أورمزد أول أيام الربيع الذي اتّخذه الفرس عيدهم الأعظم و أسموه ب"عيد النيروز"

فيما يخص مكة و كعبتها، تتفق آراء المؤرخين و الباحثين على أن الأصل في إسم "مكة" هو "إل-مقة"، و هو إسم عُثر عليه في العديد من النقوش السبئية كان مرتبطاً بعبادة الإله القمر. أورد الدكتور سيد القمني في كتابه [النبي إبراهيم و التاريخ المجهول] ما نصه: "في النقوش المكتشفة حتى الآن في آثار الجنوب العربي ورد إسم غريب أكثر من ألف مرة، و كان واضحاً أنه إسم علم لإله معبود، زعم الباحثون في آثار اليمن أنه إسم لمعبود سبئي، كما زعموا أنه كان إله القمر، و يُعد أشهر الآلهة المعبودة في اليمن، و هذا هو الإله الذي سجلته النقوش بإسم (المقة / إل-مقة)" و يقول الباحث د. سام مايكلز، في مقال له بهذا الخصوص: "كان العرب في جنوب شبه الجزيرة العربية يعبدون ثالوثاً هو الإله القمر و الإلهة الشمس و الإبنة العزّة أو العزّى و كان الإله الأكبر في هذا الثالوث هو الإله القمر"، و يضيف د. سام: "و قد ورد إسم إل- مقّة في كتابات المسند على نحو يصوره بصورة ثور أحياناً و بشكل نسر أو حيّات. و هذا كلّه يؤكد أن هذا الإله كان يُشير إلى القمر لأن هذه الرموز كانت تدل على إله القمر عند الساميين، و قد أُشير الى المقة بـ (هلّل) بمعنى هلال" و الهلال هو رمز للإله شيفا الذي غالباً ما يصور جالساً على العرش في وضعية اليوغا و بيده حربة ثلاثية (رمزاً للثالوث الإلهي براهما و فيشنو و شيفا)، و على رأسه هلال هو رمزه الخاص. و هذا يعيدنا إلى فرضية أن الكاهن الهندوسي الشيفي (أبراهام) هو من بنى الكعبة - بمعية إبنه إش ماهال / إسماعيل - كمعبد للإله (شيفا)، الذي يرمز إليه بالهلال كإله ذكر، و معروف أن اليمنيون عبدوا القمر كإله ذكر (إضافةً إلى الشمس كإلهة أنثى - زوجة القمر و ابنته - و الزهرة ابنته إضافةً إلى إلهة كوكب زحل إلهة القدر و الموت أو المنية مناة إبنته الثالثة؛ تلك هي الغرانيق العُلى و إنّ شفاعتهنّ لتُرجى)، فقد عبده الحِميَريون بإسم الإله "عم" (يذكرنا ب جزء عم في القرآن) ، و عبده الحضرميون بإسم الإله "سين" (يذكرنا بسورة يا سين في القرآن)، و عبده المعينيون بإسم الإله "ود" (الودود هو أحد أسماء الله الحسنى)، و عبده السبئيون بإسم (إل - مقة / إيل - مقة). تخبرنا الروايات الهندية أنّ الملك الهندي فيكراماديتيا Vikramaditya وسّع نفوذ مملكته ليشمل (مكة) و هو إسم يتجانس لفظاً و دلالةً مع الإسم الهندوسي (ماكها / makha) بمعنى المكان الذي تقام فيه التماثيل لعبادة النار كموضع مقدس تابع لإله كوكب زحل المُخيف الإله شيفا، و من المُلفت للنظر التشابه الكبير بين طقوس الحج الإسلامي و طقوس العبادة البوذية، كالطواف سبع مرات حول المعابد و الهياكل الهندوسية المقدسة، و الإغتسال و حلق شعر الرأس، و ملابس الإحرام المُتطابقة مع ملابس الرهبان البوذيين مما يدل على أن الكعبة كانت بالأصل معبداً هندوسياً للإله شيفا و أن طقوس حج بيت إل-مقة لعرب ما قبل الإسلام تأثرت على نحوٍ كبير بالطقوس الهندوسية لعبادة الإله (شيفا) كما يقول الكاتبان الهنديان أوبروي و أوك في مؤلفهما المُشترك [نظرة سريعة على بلاد العرب قبل الإسلام]، خاصةً و أنه مع مُنتصف الألفية الميلادية الأولى أصبحت معظم تجارة الهند المتجهة غربا تمر بشبه الجزيرة العربية و أصبحت مكة مركزاً تجارياً رئيسياً (لتجارة الترانزيت) و مُلتقى للتجار من الشرق و من الغرب حيث استقرت أعداداً مُتزايدة من التجمعات الهندية في البحرين و على مشارف البصرة في شمال الخليج الفارسي حاملين معهم عقائدهم البراهمية / الهندوسية و البوذية، و منها عبادة الإله شيفا، الذي تقول هذه الدراسة أن زعيم الهجرة الجماعية الهندوسية من السند إلى اليمن (الكاهن أبراهام) هو من بنى له الحرم المكي و الحرم (Hariyam) هي كلمة سنسكريتية تعني في العربية: "معبد الإله أو بيت الله". و قد ورد في كتاب [الأصنام للكلبي]: يظهر إله القمر في مقارنة تفضيلية، بما يفيد أنه أكبر من اللات و العزى، في القَسَم الذي كان يردده أبناء قبيلة الأوس حيث كانوا يقولون: "و باللات و العزى و مَن دان دينها، و بالله، إنّ الله مُنهنّ أكبرُ"، لاعتقادهم بأنّ القمر أكبر من الشمس (اللات) و من كوكب الزّهرة (العزّى / العزّة)، و من هنا جاء التكبير الإسلامي المُختصر المعروف للجميع اليوم: "الله أكبر (من الشمس) و العزّة لله"!!إنخلص مما سلف إلى القول بأنه يمكن للدارس أن يستنتج أن الأصل فى كلمة مكة هو (إل

– مقة) الذي سجلته النقوش في آثار سبأ كتركيب لغوي يتكون من مقطعين: المقطع الأول (إل) (أو إيل) بمعنى إله / إله القمر، و المقطع الثاني (مقة)، بمعنى (معبد أو بيت)، و بالتبادل المعروف ما بين حروف الإقلاب لكل من حرفي الميم و الباء، و حرفي القاف و الكاف، في اللغات السامية، نرى أن كلمة (مقة) ليست سوى نطق مُختلف لكلمة (مكة أو بكة) حيث أطلق إسم العلم (مكة) على موقع المعبد الأسود المكعب الشكل (رمز كوكب زحل / الإله يهوه التوراتي المُتداخل مع الإله إيل او إل إله القمر الله / الإله شيفا البراهمي الهندوسي) المعروف بإسم (الكعبة المكية) تمييزاً لها عن سائر الكعبات التي كانت مقامة في أنحاء شبه الجزيرة العربية و العراق و بلاد الشام كبيوت لعبادة الآلهة الوثنية قبل الإسلام! المصادر مذكورة ضمن سياق النص أعلاه

براهما (إبراهيم) الشخصية الدينية التي ارتبطت بصحف الفيدا، بل بكثير من المصطلحات الدالة على الديانة المرتبطة بالفيدا هي الشخصية المسماة في النصوص السنسكريتية "براهما" التي عرفت في الشرق الأدنى بإسم النبي "أبراهام / أبرام" في التوراة و الاناجيل أو النبي "إبراهيم" في القرآن. بالتأكيد هناك من سيعترض على ربط هاتين الشخصيتين في شخص واحد؛ و سيرد هذا الإعتراض أولاً و قبل بآخرين من أتباع الديانة نفسها التي يُفضلون إطلاق مُصطلح "البراهمية" عليها بدلاً من مصطلح "الهندوسية" ، لأن الأول يدل على الأصل الذي يرد في النصوص المقدسة، فليس ل"هندي" أو "هندوسي" أي ذكر فيها، و لأن المُصطلح الأخير يشمل كل ما في الهند الحديثة و القديمة من أديان، بعضها ناشيء عن البراهمية و بعضها الآخر وافد من ثقافات أخرى. ثم سيعترض أيضاً أصحاب الديانات الإبراهيمية الأخرى خاصة اليهودية و إبنتها الوفية النصرانية (الإسلام) على ذلك، بسبب ادِّعاء كل من هاتين الديانتين ملكية شخصية "إبراهيم"، بوصفه السّلف الأول لكل من الشعبين الإسرائيلي و العربي و معتقداتهما اليهودية و الإسلامية، فلا يرضون بأن يكون أصله هندياً أو آرياً كما سيرد في تحليل النصوص السنسكريتية و الوقائع التاريخية و المواقع الجغرافية. إذاً سيتوجب علينا الإعتماد في هذا الربط على ناحيتين: ١. الأولى لغوية خالصة تتعلق باتفاق الأسماء الدالة على الشخصيتين في بلاد السّند و في بلاد غرب الرافدين (الشرق الأدنى)، و ٢. الثانية هي اتفاق الصفات المُلازمة لكل منهما حتى و إن اختلفت المؤهلات و المُصطلحات الدالة على الهوية - المصدر: كتاب صحف إبراهيم، جذور البراهمية من خلال نصوص الفيدا

Note that, while Hindus believe in many devas, many are monotheistic to the extent that they will recognize only one Supreme Being, a God or Goddess who is the source and ruler of the devas. الديفا هي كينونات روحانية قوية، تشبه إلى حد ما الملائكة في المفهوم الغربي، التي لها وظائف محددة في الكون و تعيش لفترات طويلة جداً. و بعض الديفات، مثل جانيشا) يعبدها المؤمن الهندوسي بانتظام. لاحظوا أنه بينما يؤمن الهندوسي بديفات متعددة فإن بعض الهندوس موحد لدرجة أنه لا يعترف إلا بكينونة أسمى واحدة، إله أو إلهة هي مصدر و حاكم الديفات كلها

يتساءل الصديق أحمد إ. من أم الدنيا قائلاً: أولاً أنا عايز أشكركم على الصفحة العظيمة دي، و اللي حقيقي بستفيد منها كتير، و فتحت آفاقي جداً من ناحية التاريخ و الأديان و الحضارات و اللغات، و بشوف حاجات كتير من اللي بتعرضوها تبدو منطقية جداً على الأقل أكتر منطقية بكتير من التراث (الرسمي) اللي كنا بنتلقنه منذ نعومة أظفارنا، و خصوصاً موضوع أن الدين الإسلامي مبداش فعلياً في شبه الجزيرة العربية إنما كانت نشأته على الأرجح فيما كان يسمى ببلاد فارس أو بلاد الرافدين، بس عندي سؤال بيلح عليا جداً و مش عارف أوصل لأي إجابة منطقية عليه، و أتمنى ألاقي عندكم ضالتي المنشودة؛ ليه اللي زوروا تاريخ نشأة الإسلام بالشكل ده، ادعوا أنه نشأ في شبه الجزيرة العربية؟، ليه مش في الشام أو العراق، و ليه تحديداً المكان ده، و إيه كانت مصلحتهم يعملوا كدة؟!!! و لكم جزيل الشكر .. صديقكم المحب

لنفترض الدين الاسلامي تأليف العباسيون
اما انه جنكيز خان هو نفس الناصر لدين الله
تاريخ جنكيز خان معروف لدى العالم كلها وليس فقط عند المسلمين
ثانياً اذا فعلا العباسيين هم كتبة الدين الاسلامي والناصر لدين الله هو نفسه جنكيز خان لماذا تم تشويه تاريخ خليفة عباسي مثل الناصر لدين الله وهو خليفة عباسي

لو سمحتم عندي تسائل:
عنوان البحث،
لماذا زور العباسيون تاريخ العرب و كتبوا لهم تاريخ جديد؟!

وتقولون : و يبقى العرب تحت الإحتلال السّني الطوراني الخوراساني الفارسي و الشيعي البرثي الخوراساني الفارسي أيضاً
كما جئتم : و بذلك يكون االفرس الطورانيين و البرثيين و الترك الطورانيين هم من أسّسوا الإسلام العباسي الخوراساني المتداول في العالم العربي و الإسلامي منذ ذلك الحين و إلى اليوم
للتذكير البرث هم نفسهم العرب الذين أسسسو الحضارة البرثية العظيمة والتي دمرها الاسكندر.... يعني الملخص حسب المقال أن البرث ساهموا في تزوير تاريخهم وكانوا شركاء مع الفرس الخراسانيون. ألا ترون أن هناك تناقض في العنوان؟
وشكرا على توضيح أو تصحيح حتى نفهم

ليس العباسيين هم فقط المسؤولين عن تزوير الموروث الاسلامي والتاريخي .
الجميع مسؤول من الصحابة والامويين وحتى العباسيين .

وما زوره الامويين وحرفوه في الموروث الاسلامي ونسبوا الى النبي الكريم كثير من الأحاديث والسير التي لا أساس ولاصحة لها وحاشى للنبي الكريم أن يمارس أو يقول ما نسب إليه .
لكن المعروف انه في العصر العباسي اخترع الورق وبدأ العباسيين بتدوين كل الموروثات الاسلامية وغير الاسلامية .
ومن يدون له حصة لا يبتهان بها بتزوير التاريخ وفقا لرأيه ورؤياه .

يفتقر هذا البحث إلى المنهج العلمي و فيه ثغرات بل فجوات لا يصلح معها أي نوع من الترقيع .. من بديهيات البحث العلمي هو الحياد و عدم انتقاء نصوص و أحداث معينة لإسقاط تواريخ و شخصيات عليها لمجرد التكهن و التخمين أو استخدام مفردات لغوية يتم تحريفها و قولبتها بشكل غير مقنع أقل ما يقال عنه أنه أسلوب ساذج .. الكل يعلم مدى قوة و صلابة اللغة العربية و هي الإرث التاريخي الأكبر الذي يشكل هوية العرب ليس كعرق بل كتراث و تاريخ .. من الجميل و الشيق العمل و البحث لكشف التلاعب و التزوير الذي لحق بالتراث لكن ليس لدرجة نسف عقائد كاملة .. يوجد لدى العرب أسماء لامعة جداً و مخضرمة في الأدب والثقافة منذ قبل الإسلام و بعد انتشاره و لكل اسم سيرة ذاتية مكتوبة من امرؤ القيس و عمرو بن كلثوم إلى حسان بن ثابت حتى الفرزدق و جرير و بشار بن برد حتى المتنبي و الجاحظ و أبو العلاء المعري .. فلماذا لم يتم المساس بأشعارهم و أدبهم و سيرتهم ؟ كما حدث مع الشخصيات في صدر الإسلام و في العهد الأموي ؟ يوجد تفاصيل دقيقة في السيرة النبوية و ما بعد وفاة الرسول و في العهد الأموي لا يمكن تأليفها بهذا الشكل دون وقائع !

هناك كمية تراث كبيرة و اشعار عربية لا اظن ان بعض المغول قادر على تأليفها , و سؤال اخر هل هناك فرق بين الاسلام في الاندلس و الاسلام العباسي؟ هل مؤرخين و شعراء و فقهاء الأندلس كانو يتكلمون عن دين اخر غير دين العباسيين؟

> The name Baphomet appeared abundantly during the trial of the Temple Order in 1307, under the reign of Philippe IV the Bel. The Templiers, in the fall of the Latin States of the East in 1291, were many exiled to France and represent a powerful military and financial force in the face of a debt-weakened royal power. They have, among other things, been accused of apostasy, for having in the East denied Christ and worshipped " Baphomet ". The name of the idol allegedly adored by the Templars appears both in the accusation and in some confessions obtained during interrogations led by the Inquisition.

Depuis leur disparition tragique au 14e siècle, les templiers n'ont cessé d'alimenter ce qu'il est convenu d'appeler l'Histoire mystérieuse : empilement d'énigmes et d'extrapolations, serpentant dans les failles de l'Histoire officielle et dans lequel il est malaisé de distinguer le vrai du faux. Aux templiers, on a tout supposé : la possession du Saint-Suaire, celle du Graal, la découverte de l'Amérique, la jouissance d'un trésor fabuleux (matériel ou spirituel), des secrets alchimiques, la perpétuation de l'ordre dans des confréries occultes, des mœurs indécentes, des initiations clandestines, jusqu'à l'adoration du Diable. Mystère des mystères, le Baphomet trône tout en haut de ce labyrinthe de conjectures. À l'origine, pièce parmi d'autres dans le procès, l'idole gagna le devant de la scène avec la naissance du templarisme maçonnique, vers le milieu du 18e siècle, alimentant à la fois le corpus mythique de la franc-maçonnerie et les thèses anti-maçonnique s. Mais c'est à Éliphas Levi que reviendra l'honneur de lui donner la silhouette plutôt inquiétante d'un androgyne à tête de bouc, un flambeau planté entre les cornes, le front orné d'un pentagramme. Tantôt diabolisé, tantôt réhabilité au gré des interprétations, Baphomet portera finalement toutes les couleurs du manteau bigarré que ses biographes lui ont tricoté au fil des siècles, en conservant toujours des bûchers templiers comme une odeur de roussi. S'efforçant de faire la part du mythe et de la réalité, cet ouvrage retrace la lente émergence du mythe. Remarquablement documenté, il fascinera les amateurs de mystère, mais également tous ceux que captivent les mythes jalonnant l'aventure humaine.

LES SOCIÉTÉS SECRÈTES :
LE CONTRÔLE OLIGARCHIQUE MONDIAL SUR LA POPULATION MONDIALE :

Beaucoup de juifs sentent que quelque chose ne tourne pas rond et fuient les organisations juives en masse.
Selon une enquête, 25% des quelque cinq millions de juifs américains s'identifient à une autre foi.
Les 1/4 sont laïques laissant que 51% dire qu'ils sont juifs par la religion.
La moitié de tous les juifs se marient aux États-Unis avec des non-juifs et les 3/4 d'entre eux, élèvent leurs enfants dans une autre religion.

La société secrète semble être le modèle d'organisation de la Franc-Maçonnerie, du sionisme et du communisme.
Seuls ceux qui sont corruptibles et aptes à exercer le chantage sont mis au courant de la véritable feuille de route et sont autorisés à progresser. Ce modèle s'applique maintenant au monde entier.

Les gens qui réussissent sont souvent ceux qui ont accepté le marché du diable : "Servez-moi et je vous donnerai le monde."
Le véritable objectif du sionisme et de toutes les sociétés secrètes, est de tromper les gens pour l'avancement du programme des super-riches. Les objectifs ésotériques de la plupart des sociétés sont toutes dirigés vers le même but, à savoir : la concentration du pouvoir politique, économique et intellectuel entre les mains d'un petit groupe d'individus, chacun d'entre eux contrôlant une branche de la vie matérielle et spirituelle internationale du monde d'aujourd'hui.

sociétés secrètesTempliersPrieuré de SionChevaliers de Malte
Le but secret du sionisme est le même que celui de la Franc-Maçonnerie.
Dans son encyclique humanum genus 1884, le pape Léon XIII a écrit que le but ultime de la Franc-Maçonnerie est de : "déraciner complètement tout l'ordre religieux et moral du monde auquel le christianisme avait donné naissance... Cela signifie que la fondation et les lois de la nouvelle structure de la société seront tirées du naturalisme pur."
Le pape Léon XIII a dit : "la franc-maçonnerie est la personnification de la Révolution permanente, elle constitue une sorte de société inversée dont le but est d'exercer une seigneurie occulte sur la société que nous connaissons, et dont la seule raison d'être consiste à mener une guerre contre Dieu et son Eglise."
Un expert sur les sociétés secrètes a écrit que la franc-maçonnerie : "a été utilisé comme... un filet pour attraper, tester et sélectionner les personnes pouvant être utilisées à des fins subversives... la direction révolutionnaire utilise dans la mesure du possible, des organismes inoffensifs comme leur manteau, et les gens innocents comme leurs agents inconscients..."- Miss Stoddard - Trail of the Serpent -

Ceci est confirmé par le fondateur des Illuminati, Adam Weishaupt qui a écrit : "La loge maçonnique sera notre pépinière. Tous ceux qui ne sont pas adaptés au travail devront rester dans la loge maçonnique et avancer sans rien savoir de l'autre système." Ces innocents ne peuvent pas concevoir qu'ils ont été trahis et s'accrochent à leur précieuse identité. Ils préfèrent un mensonge confortable à une vérité amère. Ainsi, Satan remplit ses rangs.

L’holocauste a dupé les juifs en prenant la Palestine pour y établir un foyer national.
Le véritable objectif d’Israël est d’être la capitale de la tyrannie mondiale de Rothschild.
Mais combien de juifs ont sacrifié leur argent et leurs vies pour cela ?
La tromperie est la méthode de Satan.

Stonehengecroix gamméefamille sataniquehumanum genus
Mais les hommes méchants et imposteurs avanceront toujours plus dans le mal, égarant les autres et égarés eux-mêmes.
Bible 2 Timothée 3 verset 13

L’objectif est de compromettre des gens, puis de les laisser récolter le blâme. Serait-il logique de dire aux juifs et aux francs-maçons moyens le réel ordre du jour ?
Bien sûr que non. Ils ne voudraient pas le soutenir. Au moment où ils le découvrent, il est trop tard.
Les Juifs sont maintenus dans l’obscurité au sujet de leur histoire et de la religion.
Entre le Ier et le début du XIXème siècle, pas un seul texte d’histoire juive n’a été écrit.
Dans le même temps, les juifs ordinaires sont pourvus de l’image flatteuse d’eux-mêmes, celle d’un peuple détesté non pour l’attaque de leurs dirigeants sur les institutions chrétiennes et musulmanes ou pour leur participation dans le Nouvel Ordre Mondial mais pour leur intelligence supérieure, leur industrie et leur dévouement à la cause de la justice sociale.

Néanmoins, il faut savoir que les sociétés secrètes sont comme un arbre muni de ses branches : plus vous enlever les écorces, plus vous comprenez que tout ceci est rattaché à un ensemble de choses qui ne finissent par faire plus qu’un – elle s’imbrique par les hommes car ils se servent des choses du passé pour construire leur avenir… Certains Hommes vivent en se cachant d’arrière une effigie tout en croyant que c’est une bonne chose, d’autres savent très bien ce qui se passe.
Les sociétés dites secrètes, peu importe le postulat, le symbole que chaque personne pourra avoir, tire toutes leurs croyances de l’Égypte, des sorciers, des satanistes, mais aussi des personnes qui ont toujours eu besoin des forces occultes pour appliquer leur philosophie.
Les personnes haut placées : médecins, ministres, magistrats, politiciens, présidents peuvent en faire partie - Tous les médias ne sont pas là pour vous informer mais pour maintenir le secret. Un secret codé depuis années et qui, pour la plupart à généralement tendance à être négligé par la population. La télévisons, les jeux, la politique, le travail ne sont que l’opium du peuple.

Poutine et BushDonald TrumpMacronfalse flag
Que ceux qui n'ont pas cru, ne comptent pas que ce délai que Nous leur accordons soit à leur avantage.
Si Nous leur accordons un délai, c'est seulement pour qu'ils augmentent leurs péchés.
Et pour eux un châtiment avilissant.
Coran sourate 3 verset 178

LE COMITÉ DES 300 :

Créé en 1729 par la B.E.I.M.C. (British East India Merchant Company) pour s’occuper des affaires bancaires et commerciales internationales et soutenir le trafic d’opium, le Comité des 300 est dirigé par la Couronne britannique.
Il représente le système bancaire mondial dans sa globalité et compte, en plus, les représentants les plus importants des nations occidentales.
Toutes les banques sont reliées aux Rothschild par le Comité des 300.

LES OBJECTIFS À ATTEINDRE :

Amener à la destruction totale de l’identité et de la fierté nationale, qui fut la première idée considérée si le concept d’un seul gouvernement mondial venait à fonctionner.
Travailler et amener à la destruction des religions, et plus précisément, la religion chrétienne, puis finir par l'Islam.
Établir un contrôle sur chaque personne à travers l’utilisation de contrôle d’esprit (via le MK-Ultra).
Destruction de la jeunesse par divers forme de drogue.
Encourager, et éventuellement légaliser l’utilisation de drogues et faire de la pornographie une priorité, qui sera largement acceptée, et qui éventuellement, deviendra quelque chose d’ordinaire.
Il est à savoir que les plans de génocide de Pol Pot ont été conçus aux États-Unis par une personne de la fondation de recherche du Club de Rome.
Démoraliser les travailleurs de la classe moyenne en créant un chômage excessif. Comme les métiers se réduisent au niveau de zéro-croissance après industrialisation, présenté par le Club de Rome.
Priver les gens de décider leurs propre destins par le moyen de créer des crises les unes après les autres puis ensuite gérer les crises, provoquant confusion et démoralisera la population jusqu’à qu'elle sera confrontée à trop de choix, et de la dépression en résultera à échelle massive.
Aux États-Unis, une agence pour les Gestions des Crises est déjà en place, elle est appelée 'Federal Emergency Management Agency' (F.E.M.A.).
Obtenir l'immunité historique pour renforcer l’état sioniste israélien (en Palestine) en préservant coûte que coûte le mythe des six millions.
Provoquer un effondrement total des économies mondiales et engendrer un chaos total politique.
Pénétrer et Corrompre tous les gouvernements, et travailler de l’intérieur afin de détruire l’intégrité souveraine des nations comme en Libye.
Organiser un système international terroriste et négocier avec les terroristes quand les activités terroristes doivent avoir lieu comme Daesh.
Prendre le contrôle de l’éducation avec l’intention et le but de l’anéantir et de la détruire complètement. Et prendre le contrôle de toutes les politiques étrangères.
LE CONSEIL DES 33 :
Livre Jaune N°6Livre Jaune N°5
Ils sont représentés les Francs-Maçons des rangs les plus élevés du monde de la politique, de l’économie et de l’Église. Ils sont l’élite du Comité des 300.
Le conseil des 33 est chargé de faire exécuter les ordres des 13.
Ils interviennent sur les quatre façades de la pyramide, soit :

Économique,
Socio-culturel,
Politico-militaire et Religieux.
L'on dit qu'à ce niveau et au niveau supérieur, les initiés doivent avoir fait un sacrifice humain ou avoir tué quelqu'un de sang-froid.
Ils transmettent les ordonnances au travers différents groupuscules comme : le Groupe Bilderberger, des loges francmaçonniques, des organisations politiques, organismes gouvernementaux, des Églises (sorcellerie), des commissions, des associations, les médias et autres.

L'autorité des 33 est indiscutable dans le monde. Ils infiltrent tous les secteurs décisionnels de la société ; et la font évoluer dans le sens qu'ils désirent.
Comme vous avez pu vous en rendre compte, le secteur le plus important à contrôler, le religieux.
Ils doivent à tout prix, empêcher la progression de la chrétienté, qu'ils considèrent comme une menace et bien pire.

Dans ce sens, les lois gouvernementales et différentes organisations, des collusions et des corruptions, les y ont aidés.
Notamment, différentes églises chrétiennes protestantes se sont vues paralysées dans leur mouvement de croissance, leurs leaders ayant été achetés.
Tandis que la tête de l'église catholique a été infiltrée par la Franc-Maçonnerie.

LE CONSEIL DES 13 :

C'est un grand conseil des druides.
Treize grands druides forment le clergé privé des Rothschild. Ils doivent passer leur pouvoir occulte d'une génération à l'autre, en tentant d'avoir des membres de sang pur.

Ils programment les membres de leur propre famille au travers de rituels sataniques comportant des sacrifices de sang.
Ils se considèrent comme des dieux depuis l'antiquité.
On apprend que certaines églises ont été construites sur des autels dédiés aux cultes sataniques des druides.
Ils sont liés aux chevaliers templiers, ont mené Hitler au pouvoir, et ont contrôlé toutes les guerres jusqu'à aujourd'hui.
Francs-Maçons et Illuminati sont indissociables.
Ils appartiennent aux 13 familles les plus riches du monde, et ils sont les hommes qui contrôlent vraiment le monde en étant derrière toutes les scènes (pratiquement que des hommes, avec quelques exceptions).

The Deciders, ceux qui donnent les ordres aux présidents et aux gouvernements, et ils sont souvent écartés de tous votes publics, car leurs actions ne pourraient pas vraiment être votées.
Leurs lignées sanguines remontent jusqu'à plusieurs milliers d'années, et ils sont très prudent de garder leurs lignées sanguines dans un état pur de génération en génération.
La seule manière est de s'engendrer est de le faire entre eux. Lors des présidentielles, ils sponsorisent les deux côtés afin d'avoir un jeu actif. Ils décident qui sera le prochain président, et ils font en sorte que leur homme gagne, même si ils ont à tricher comme ils l'ont fait en Floride quand le président George W. Bush a gagné contre Al Gore.

La plupart des campagnes présidentielles sont financées par l'argent de la drogue, ce qui est compréhensif si vous savez que les Illuminati contrôlent le trafic de drogue.
Ils réduisent les qualités de vies des pays développés comme l'Europe, à un niveau suffisamment bas, pour que les gouvernements puissent plus facilement être contrôlés.
Leur divinité est Lucifer, cela n'est pas important si vous ne croyez pas en cela mais eux y croient, et ils le pensent sérieusement.
En ayant contrôle de l'industrie du cinéma (Hollywood), de la musique (Universal) - ils savent comment influencer les jeunes à danser leurs musiques et à accepter cette sorte de réalité.

КАННИБАЛЬСКОЕ ПЛЕМЯ.
Откровения иудейского врача о людоедстве.
МАТАЕВ,ИУДЕЙ,ЧИТАЮЩИЙ В АМЕРИКАНСКОМ БРУКЛИНЕ ЛЕКЦИИ ДЛЯ ЕВРЕЕВ:ДРЕВНИЕ ЕВРЕИ ОХОТИЛИСЬ НА ЛЮДЕЙ,НО НЕ НА МАМОНТОВ.
В это можно было бы не верить, если бы библейские иудеи не начали открыто пропагандировать в США среди евреев идею, что они из рода "охотников на людей", что впереди предстоит война, в ходе которой должна погибнуть большая часть человечества, и что евреям не надо будет заботиться, где им взять еду – они должны стать людоедами....
Всё это рассказал на камеру не какой-то "городской сумасшедший", а официальный платный лектор, иудей, читающий в американском Бруклине для евреев лекции по "ОБЖ" ("Основы Борьбы за Живучесть"). Такие лекции проходят в США легально, а имя лектора хорошо известно как американским евреям, так и российским, — это Михаил Матаев, врач из России, ныне живущий в США.
Врач вещает о каннибализме с ухмылочкой, «человечина для нас, самое полезное мясо, чистый протеин», со знанием дела советует специалист , «здесь в ход идёт всё, даже кишки». Острит, пытается подвести теоретическую базу под свою иудейско-крысиную философию выживания «нормальных людей» в экстремальных условиях чрезвычайной ситуации. Лектор Михаил Матаев рисует сегодня американским евреям такую картину: когда привычный уклад жизни нарушится, когда в города Америки перестанут подвозить продовольствие, а магазины перестанут торговать продуктами питания, и это обязательно будет, это случиться, американские города превратятся в каменные джунгли, население которых начнёт сначала испытывать голод, а потом начнёт и умирать от голода. А это несколько сот миллионов человек! И от этой беды никуда не деться! Как же в этой ситуации должны выживать евреи?

Перед Михаилом Матаевым поставлена задача донести до евреев мысль, что по этому поводу им не нужно особо беспокоиться! Для них не будет проблем с едой, еда для них будет везде. Причём её будет в избытке при любых обстоятельствах!
Несколько сот миллионов американских гоев — чем не еда?
Чтобы хоть как-то смягчить шок в головах американских евреев от идеи будущего людоедства, каннибализма, Михаил Матаев объясняет им их прошлое.
"Кстати, вы знаете, из кого МЫ произошли? Были сильные племена, которые могли забить мамонта и сожрать его. А МЫ, евреи, произошли из слабых племён, которые не могли охотиться на мамонтов. Наши предки были вынуждены охотиться на людей. Сильные племена при охоте на мамонта посылали вперёд своих разведчиков — 3 или 5 человек. На них, на этих разведчиков, и охотились наши предки! Вот от этих охотников на людей мы и произошли!"
. Справка : В книге Чисел есть несколько мест, свидетельствующих о еврейском каннибализме. Человеческая плоть заменяла сынам Израилевым недостаток пищи в походных условиях. Перед вторжением в Ханаан еврейские вожди говорят такую речь народу: "Не бойтесь народа земли сей, ибо он достанется нам на съедение" (Числ. 14:9). Пророк Валаам говорит Валаку следующую характерную притчу об израильтянах: "Вот, народ как львица встает и как лев поднимается; не ляжет, пока не съест добычи и не напьется крови убитых" (Числ. 23:24). Всё это очень характерные места, указывающие на факт каннибализма у древних евреев. В ходе дальнейшей истории каннибализм у евреев был делом обычным, так что, по свидетельству пророка Иезекииля, даже возник демографический кризис: "Так говорит Яхве: "За то, что говорят о тебе (Израиле): "Ты – пожирающий людей и делающий народ твой бездетным", за то уже не будешь поедать людей и народа твоего не будешь впредь делать бездетным" (Иез. 36:13-14). Факты людоедства у евреев были также предсказаны и зафиксированы во время осады городов войсками неприятелей (Втор. 28:54-57; Лев. 26:29; 4 Цар. 6:24-30, Ис. 9:19-21, Иер. 19:9, Пл. 2:20, см. Вт. 28:53, Лев. 26:29). Еврейская Библия буквально переполнена свидетельствами о человеческих жертвоприношениях, совершавшихся евреями в рамках культа "Молох": Иер. 7:31, 19:4-6, 32:35; Пс. 106:36-38; 4 Цар. 16:3, 17:17, 21:6; Иез. 16:20-21, 23:37, 39; Ис. 57:5. Евреи объединили служение идолам со служением Богу, придали Богу кровавую атрибутику, будто ему были нужны жертвы, всякие "приятные благоухания" от горящей плоти, заколения, возлияния и т. д. Пророк Иезекииль говорит, что евреи были завоеваны Навуходоносором и отведены в плен в Вавилон именно за каннибализм. Причем пророк подчеркивает, что традиция людоедства у евреев практиковалась еще до египетского рабства и своим каннибализмом они причиняли вред всем окружающим народам.
То, что древние евреи были людоеды, в этом нет никаких сомнений. Это факт установленный.

НОВОСТЬ

Более половины богатств на планете принадлежит 81 миллиардеру

[17:20 17 января 2023 года]

Суммарное благосостояние 81 самого обеспеченного человека превышает половину совокупного мирового показателя, свидетельствует доклад благотворительной организации Oxfam.

За последние два года 1% богатейших людей планеты увеличили свои состояния на $26 трлн, при этом общемировой показатель возрос на $42 трлн. То есть на самых состоятельных пришлось две трети роста, в то время как оставшиеся 99% населения в совокупности увеличили свое состояние всего на $16 трлн, следует из отчета, представленного на Всемирном экономическом форуме в Давосе.

Это указывает на то, что темпы накопления средств самыми богатыми людьми ускорились, отмечает CNBC.

Исполнительный директор Oxfam International Габриэла Бухер призвала повысить налоги для сверхбогатых, заявив, что это “непременное условие для сокращения неравенства и возрождения демократии”. По ее мнению, изменения в налоговой политике помогут справиться с продолжающимися кризисами во всем мире.

“Налогообложение сверхбогатых людей и крупных корпораций — это выход из сегодняшних накладывающихся друг на друга кризисов. Пришло время разрушить удобный миф о том, что снижение налогов для самых богатых приводит к тому, что их богатство каким-то образом “просачивается” ко всем остальным”, — сказал Бухер.

На 1% богатейших людей приходится 45,6% общемирового состояния, на 50% с наименьшими доходами — всего 0,75%, согласно расчетам Oxfam. За последние два года богатство миллиардеров в среднем увеличивалось на $2,7 млрд в сутки.

Среди 1 тыс. самых богатых людей всего 124 женщины и пять чернокожих.

Верхние уровни ставок на доходы физлиц стали ниже и менее прогрессивными, отмечается в докладе. При этом средняя ставка налога на самых богатых в ОЭСР (включает 38 государств) снизилась с 58% в 1980 году до 42% в последнее время. Для 100 стран средний показатель находится еще ниже — около 31%.

В результате многие из самых богатых людей на планете почти не платят налоги. Например, реальная налоговая ставка у одного из самых богатых людей в истории Илона Маска, главы производителя электромобилей Tesla, составляет 3,2%. Другой богатейший человек — руководитель Amazon.com Inc. Джефф Безос — платит налоги по ставке менее 1%. Между тем один из рыночных трейдеров, с которым работает Oxfam в Уганде, Абер Кристин выплачивает 40% от доходов в виде налогов.

Вора делают государственным деятелем

2 дня назад

Представьте себе такую картину в США, Великобритании или Германии. Чувак с тремя судимостями не стесняясь говорит, «Я воровал деньги у страны?». И вместо еще одного уголовного дела сразу получает полный карт-бланш на медийное присутствие в информационном пространстве. Ему сразу дают статус общественного деятеля. Его профессиональное мнение (как кого? вора?) навязывают зрителям телевидение, потому что кто не может оказаться в студии. А он может! Так что слушайте его внимательно!

Что, не можете вообразить? Я тоже! А у нас оказывается, это просто! Боже, Украина! Куда ты катишься?

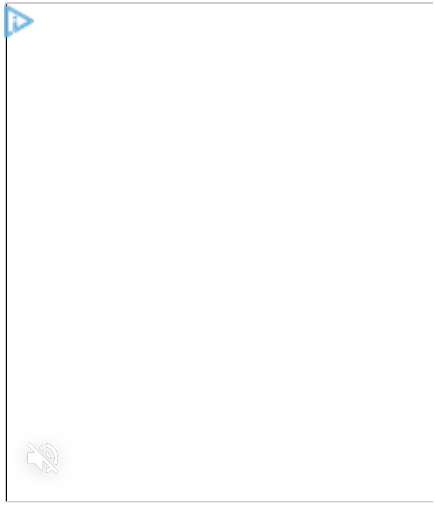
путину грозит древнее еврейское проклятие: в чем оно заключается

Василий Неплохой | 14 января, 17:58



ЧИТАТЬ НА УКРАИНСКОМ

Новость обновлена 14 января 2023, 21:27

Днепр вновь подвергся обстрелу несмотря на то, что главу кремля предупредили об ответственности

В субботу 14 января россияне в очередной раз совершили массированную ракетную атаку по территории Украины, одна из ракет упала в Днепре и частично разрушила многоэтажный дом. В сети же напомнили, что российскому диктатору владимиру путину ранее пригрозили страшным проклятием, если на территории города вновь упадут ракеты.

Как сообщила журналистка Соня Кошкина в своем telegram-канале, Геннадий Корбан во время предыдущего массированного удара по городу пообещал применить против главы кремля древнее еврейское проклятие "Пульса де-нура".

"Надеюсь, Корбан свое слово сдержит. И то, что он сейчас в Лондоне, с этой точки зрения, даже к лучшему", — написала Кошкина.

Она сообщила, что для проведения "ритуала" необходимо, чтобы некоторое количество раввинов собрались в одном месте в одно время. Кроме того, она подчеркнула, что человека, которого намерены проклясть, должны предупредить заранее, чтобы дать ему возможность исправиться.

"Считается, что проклятие сугубо еврейское, но якобы действует не только на евреев. Ждем. Не подведите, Геннадий Олегович", — написала журналистка.

Синто-рю

Синто-рю (яп. 新当流) или Касима Синто-рю (яп. 鹿島新当流) — древнее японское боевое искусство (корю), основанное Цукахарой Бокудэном (1490 — 1571) в период Муромати[1][2].

Синто-рю
新当流
Другие названия	Касима Синто-рю
Дата основания	около 1530 года
Страна	Япония
Основатель	Цукахара Бокудэн
Место создания	провинция Касима
Родоначальное БИ	• Тэнсин Сёдэн Катори Синто-рю
Производные БИ	• Ямагути-рю

Касима Синто-рю зачастую путают со школой Касима Син-рю. Эта ошибка довольно распространена из-за того, что эти два названия похожи, несмотря на то, что написание иероглифов позволяет увидеть разницу (яп. 鹿岛 新 当 流 и яп. 鹿岛 神 流) и во-вторых, Уэсиба Морихэй, основатель Айкидо, был вдохновлен занятиями Касима Синто-рю в своей практике с оружием, в то время как некоторые из его учеников и последователей включили элементы Касима Син-рю в Айкидо. Текущий глава школы — Ёсикава Цуэнэтака.

История

Касима Синто-рю — одна из старейших боевых традиций Японии[3]. По одной из версии школа была основана примерно в 1530 году Цукахарой Бокудэном, которого именовали «кэнсэй», что в буквальном переводе означает «Священный Меч»[3].

Цукахароа Бокудэн был мастером фехтования. Он обучался у своего отца и позже довел своё мастерство до совершенства, занимаясь муся сюгё (аскетической воинской тренировкой), путешествуя по Японии и тренируясь с наиболее искусными мастерами. Позднее он систематизировал местные боевые искусства области Касима и вывел их в единую систему — Касима Синто-рю[3]. В дальнейшем искусство формировалось в период Сэнгоку («Сэнгоку Дзидай» или «Период Воюющих Государств»), то есть во времена феодальных войн, благодаря чему техники школы основывались на опыте сражений того времени и вращались вокруг поиска слабых мест в защите противника. Свою технику Цукахара Бокудэн передал роду Такэда.

Касима Синто-рю, предположительно, имела ряд техник иайдзюцу в своей учебной программе, но они были утрачены со временем[4]. В арсенале используемого оружия школы находятся меч (катана), копьё (яри) и глефа (нагината).

В городе Касима, Япония, 12 июня 1994 года был построен памятник в честь Цукахары Бокудэна[5].

Without a doubt you have seen this video that made Shi Yamat Al-Boz inside Morocco and even outside, it is normal because it is always the speeches that play on emotion always like receiving the recitation and be a liar.

This is the betrayal of the world, you ignorant, so what to do with you, or you are a madlass.

The first lie is this video and all you can understand is that the Arabic language is eternal and that the languages of the world and European are the ones that will die in the near future

The second lie is that the Arabic language does not change with time, the opposite of European languages, and among them the English language given by our reader world, example in the video.

The thing that this reader didn't say and what he said to people is what the West means when he says in a language that it is dead or you will die.

The West when they say that a language will die as they mean that that language will not be spoken in their daily lives and Ga will only remain in the books, and as a French example, that after years the French in July, they need a French dictionary to understand their words. French means Ga Yuli Khaso reads French in school to understand it, so after years Ga Yuli is back to French, the problem we have is Hanaya, Ga Yuli in school as he reads a very different language and in his daily life he speaks a different language.

The second lie is Fash who says that the French language is the French language of the 18th century, and this indicates that the French language has changed the opposite of Arabic that is consistent over time.

The thing that this mad world didn't say is that in the 19th century European countries have circulated compulsory education, they saw the French language that people would speak at this time in the street and inside the house and in the school, they did it in the school, the language of the oven 11 or 12 and they started As they read it For the French.

The opposite of the Dakshi who introduced the Arabic systems that took the Arabic language of Yamat Quresh and started to read it to the people of their dialysis, and hadshi is normal, we regret to understand the Qur'an and wrote the Hadith, but they don't lie to us and tell us that the Arabic language does not change and does not die, see according to the concept A For the west of Rah The Arabic language has died and the saturation of death centuries ago because no one speaks it in the world anymore, but even in the quarantine they speak the Arabic language they call it the Easter

And without a doubt, any Moroccan has seen that he is a Fash Kimhi to Europe, enough to read the language of Dyal Dik for a country in school, and find it in the street, and learn it in the streets, while the western who is Kiji, we have Kikon, a reader of the Arabic language and Kiji for the street, how they are, despite the years of extortion in our country.

All languages and accents of the world change with time until you die and only books will remain to preserve the languages that have died while those that are not in the sofa as a final contradiction and Arabic language is no exception as they call these maddlesons under the abbey of Islam مازلنا نبحث عن جذور الصيام واول النصوص التي دونت بهذا الخصوص. وهنا أؤكد ان مايتم طرحه لحد الان هو الصيام الطوعي الغير واجب. اي الامتناع عن الطعام والشراب طوعا..

. صيام الحب

في البحث السابق تكلمنا عن ربما اول إشارة عن الصيام الطوعي الذي ينتج في حالة الحزن الشديد. كما حصل مع كلكامش والان بين أيديكم نص جديد عن صيام طوعي اخر

ويعتبر أغرب انواع الصيام هو (صيام الحب)

في المعهد الشرقي في شيكاغو هناك وثيقة مسمارية تقدم حال فتاه وقعت في الحب.
تصف نفسها بأنها غير قادرة على الاكل والشراب من شدة الحب وانها ترفض الأكل طواعيا لأنها مغرمة ووقعت بالحب.
رغم وفرة الطعام الا انها صامت طواعيا. وتصف حالها كيف انها تمر بمخازن الطعام دون ان تأكل
وانها تنام وهي صائمة عن الأكل.

للحديث تتمة ان شاء الله
للمزيد #pəɯɥɐ_ibrahim

وإليك النص الاكدي الذي يصف حال تلك الفتاة فقط لمن يهتم في الترجمة والبحث

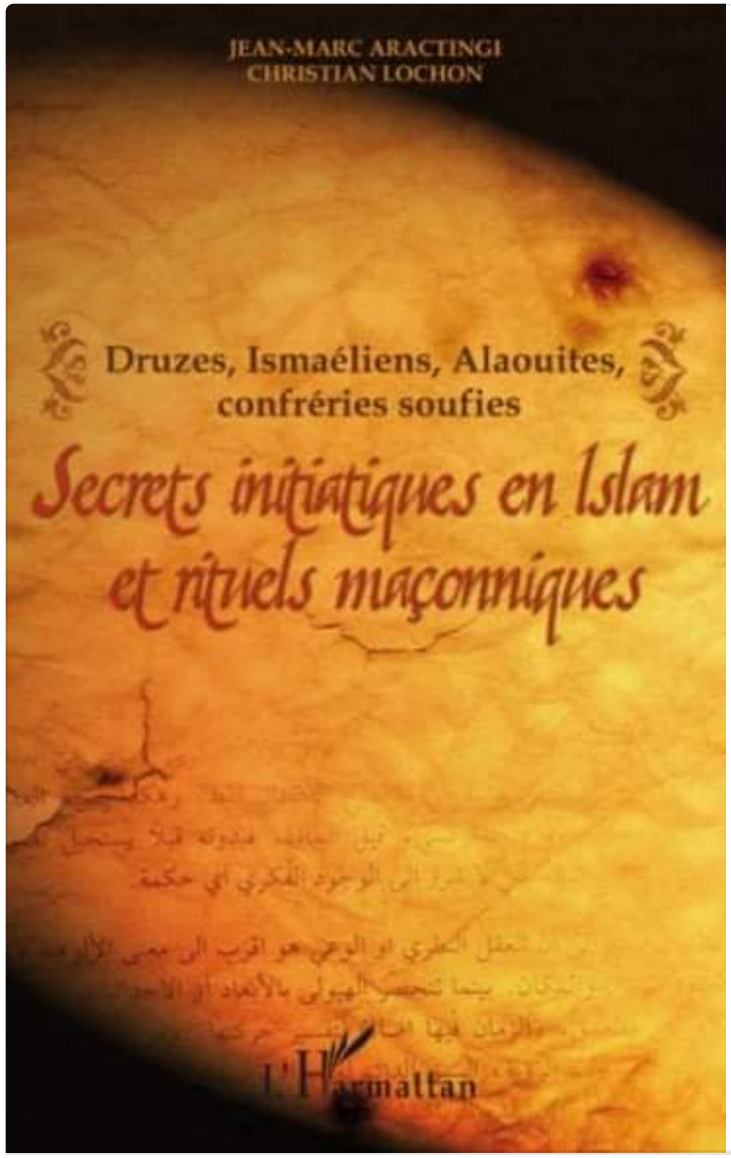
Les auteurs de secrets initiatiques en Islam et rituels maçonniques ont consacré, avec le concours des chercheurs Idriss Aberkane, Karim-Hervé Benkamla et le regretté Bruno Etienne, ces traditions ésotériques au passage du relais d'une génération à l'autre, d'une religion à l'autre et d'une société ésotérique à l'autre.



Depuis l'Antiquité, les peuples se sont réapproprié les mythes appartenant au monde méditerranéen. On retrouvera ainsi dans les travaux imposés à Gilgamesh le Mésopotamien ceux d'Héraklès le Grec, les symboles tenus dans ses mains par la déesse Ishtar, ceux d'Athéna et de Cérès, la représentation maternelle d'Isis portant dans ses bras Horus, celle de Marie et de Jésus ; les Mages de la Nativité avec leurs cadeaux précieux, témoignages de l'héritage spirituel de Zoroastre offert au Christianisme. Parfois le relais peut être inversé : les théologiens musulmans moutazilites appliquent sous les Abbassides la grille de lecture de la philosophie grecque sur les textes révélés. Le soufisme, savant ou populaire, comme dans les zaouïas algériennes aujourd'hui, ainsi que les traditions initiatiques chiites, ismaéliennes, druzes, alaouites, ont puisé dans la Gnose orientale un rituel antique que l'on retrouvera importé dans le compagnonnage médiéval occidental. Ce mouvement de va et vient de la pensée entre Orient et Occident assure l'unité de ce livre ; le fait que les religions juive, chrétienne, musulmane tout aussi bien que la franc-maçonnerie se déclarent « universelles » montre qu'avec patience et ténacité, nous nous devons de souligner que l'humanisme méditerranéen est bien notre substrat culturel commun malgré la diversité des appellations de nos croyances.
Aussi le franc-maçon occidental non seulement ne doit pas s'inscrire dans la rupture avec le passé mais il doit aussi admettre les connaissances initiatiques de son frère oriental pour lequel Hiram et Salomon sont de véritables grands ancêtres. Mythes et traditions constituent la mémoire des hommes éclairés à la recherche de l'initiation authentique.

Question : Pourquoi n'aborde t-il jamais le sujet dans ses conférences..

Абубакар II

Абубакар II (Абу Бакр II) — девятый правитель империи Мали в XIV веке (1310 г.). Являлся преемником своего племянника Мухаммеда ибн Гао и предшественником Мансы Мусы. Абубакар II отрёкся от престола для исследования «океанских просторов», но его экспедиции оказались безрезультатными, и он не вернулся в свою страну.

Дата рождения	XIII век
Дата смерти	XIV век
Страна	Мали
Род деятельности	путешественник-исследователь, суверен

Описание

Известная информация об Империи Мали берётся из трудов арабских учёных, включающих аль-Омари, Абу Саида Усмана ад-Дуккали, Ибн Хальдуна и Ибн Баттута. Отсутствие надёжных источников является серьёзной проблемой этого исторического периода, и обобщённая история правителей империи Мали не указывает Абубакара II в качестве мансы Мали[1].

Абубакар II, иногда называемый Абу Бакром II или Абу Бекром II, или Мансой Мухаммедом, был одним из двух сыновей от Колонкан — сестры Сундиаты Кейты, основателя империи Мали. Он был последним из короткой династии внутри клана Кейта, ведущей свою историю от Колонкан. После его отречения в 1311 году империю стала контролировать другая ветвь Кейта, династия Фага Лайе.

Правление

Практически всё известное об Абубакаре II написано в работах Аль-Омари во время исторического хаджа в Мекку Канкана Мусы. Находясь в Египте, Муса объяснял, что он унаследовал трон после отречения предыдущей династии. Он сообщил, что в 1310 году император финансировал строительство 200 судов для людей и ещё 200 направлялось на исследование пределов морей, которые являлись западной границей империи. Миссия оказалась безрезультатной, и информация пришла лишь от капитана одной лодки, отказавшейся плыть за другими судами, когда они достигли места впадения реки в море и водоворота. По словам Мусы I, его предшественник был неудержим и отправил флот, сам став во главе экспедиции. В 1311 году предыдущий правитель временно уступил власть Мусе, назначив его визирем, и отправился с тысячами судов с людьми и большим числом припасов. После невозвращения прежнего императора Муса сам стал императором.

Заявление о трансатлантическом переходе

Небольшое число учёных, в том числе Иван ван Сертима, ранее работавший в Ратгерском университете, и малийский учёный Гауссу Диавара, заявляли, что Абубакар II успешно прибыл в Новый Свет[2][3][4].

Консенсус основных археологов, антропологов, этноисториков, лингвистов и других современных учёных, специализирующихся на доколумбовой эпохе, утверждает, что нет никаких свидетельств ни о каком подобном путешествии в Америку и что нет достаточных оснований, доказывающих контакт Африки с Новым Светом в какое-либо время доколумбовой эпохи[5]. Статья BBC под заголовком «Величайший исследователь Африки» резюмирует споры с точки зрения учёных и историков в Мали[4].

قراءة في ملف أراضي "بني حريزة" الجماعية باسنادة

8 يناير 2016 - 20:09

لكن الأهم في الموضوع أن الساكنة بقيت يقظة رغم الحصار المضروب على هذا الملف في تصديها لأية محاولة للاستيلاء على هذه الأراضي وأخرها سنة 2008 لما فوتت مصالح المياه والغابات صفقة لأحد المقاولين بغرس شجر الخروب على مساحة محدودة من هذه الأراضي على جنبات الطريق الساحلي ، فتصدت له الساكنة عبر تنظيم وقفة احتجاجية بعين المكان على الطريق الساحلية ببني حريزة ، وصادف ذلك اليوم مرور والي الجهة (امهيدية) ، وأمر المقاول بالتوقف ، وأعطى الوعد للمحتجين بالبحث في ملف هذه الأراضي ووعدهم بتنظيم لقاء معهم بمقر ولاية الحسيمة ، وفعلا تم اللقاء بعد يومين بعد ذلك بحضور لجنة من السكان ومسؤول المياه والغابات بالحسيمة، وصرح الوالي أمام اللجنة بان الأرض في ملك ساكنة بني يطفت ولهم حرية التصرف والتفكير في إبداع أشكال الاستغلال التي يرونها مناسبة . ومع جهل بالأمور القانونية المنظمة للأراضي السلالية وكيفية استغلالها ، وعدم تنظيم السكان في إطار قانوني معين . تم الاهتداء إلى خلق لجنة محلية مؤقتة كحل أولي بمقر جماعة اسنادة بحضور جمهور غفير من السكان مكونة من ستة أفراد أوكل لهم أمر البحث في موضوع هذه الأراضي والاتصال بمصالح الشؤون القروية بعمالة الحسيمة ووزارة الداخلية والسلطة المحلية والبحث في الأمور الغامضة بخصوص هذا ملف ، لكن لم تكن هذه اللجنة في مستوى تمثيل الساكنة وأخفقت في عملها ، ربما لنقص في المعرفة والتجربة أو لأسباب أخرى.

والحلول المقترحة حسب فهمي الشخصي لاسترجاع هذه الاراضي المهمة هي :

- تجديد نواب الجماعة السلالية ، طالما أن السلطة المحلية لم تعمل على ذلك ، رغم أن العضوين من اللجنة السابقة قد ماتا ومنذ مدة طويلة . وكان من واجبها إخبار السكان لاختيار أعضاء جدد وأكفاء وفق المسطرة المنظمة في هذا الإطار.

- يتعين على السلطة المحلية و قسم الشؤون القروية بالعمالة ومديرية الشؤون القروية بوزارة الداخلية القيام بدورها الدستوري وإحاطة علما السكان حول ملف هذه الأراضي بكل شفافية ووضوح .

- على المجلس الجماعي القروي إن كان يسمح له القانون المنظم للجماعات الترابية بالوقوف إلى جانب الساكنة في الموضوع عبر عقد دورة للمجلس بحضور السلطات الوصية. لاستجلاء الأمر واستقصاء ملف الجماعة السلالية ببني يطفت والطرق التي أدت إلى تدخل مصلحة المياه والغابات ومؤسسات أخرى لاحقا ، ومع من تم التعاقد وبأي التزامات وشروط ?.

- إن قيمة هذه الأراضي في تنمية الاقتصاد الوطني والمحلي عبر إقامة مشاريع كبرى ذات طابع سياحي وفلاحي ودعم التجهيزات المؤسساتية، لا يمكن إنكارها وتجاهلها وترك الحابل على النابل ، بل هي مسؤولية الجميع من المجتمع المدني والهيئات السياسية والحقوقية لإسماع صوت الساكنة وإرجاع الحق لأصحابه.

ملاحظة : هذه قراءة شخصية لملف أراضي بني حريزة ، ومن المؤكد أنني قد أغفلت بعض المحطات وألاحداث والوقائع في هذا الموضوع ،نظرا لشح المعلومات المتداولة بين الناس ، ويمكن اغناء هذا الملف بمقترحات أخرى وجيهة.

about what the book:JUJU AND STATECRAFT OCCULT RUMORS AND POLITICS IN GHANA
"Juju and Statecraft: Occult Rumors and Politics in Ghana" is a book written by Ivor Wilks, an Emeritus Professor of African History at Northwestern University. The book was first published in 1987 and has since become a classic work in the study of African politics and culture.

The book explores the role of rumors, myths, and beliefs in the political and social life of Ghana. It examines the ways in which occult practices and beliefs, such as juju, have been used by politicians and other powerful figures to gain and maintain power, as well as how these beliefs have shaped popular perceptions of politics and leadership.

Wilks draws on a wide range of sources, including oral histories, newspapers, and government reports, to trace the evolution of juju in Ghanaian politics and society. He argues that juju has played a significant role in shaping political culture in Ghana, and that understanding its role is essential to understanding the country's history and politics.

Overall, "Juju and Statecraft" offers a fascinating look at the intersection of politics and culture in Ghana, and sheds light on the complex ways in which beliefs and practices shape our understanding of power and authority.

Qu'est-ce que la geometrie sacree

La geometrie sacree est une notion qui se refere a l'utilisation de formes et de motifs geometriques dans des contextes religieux, spirituels ou mystiques. Elle est souvent associee a des cultures anciennes et traditionnelles, telles que les Egyptiens, les Grecs, les Mayas et les Hindous.

La geometrie sacree suppose que certaines formes geometriques ont des significations symboliques et energetiques particulieres, et qu'elles peuvent etre utilisees pour equilibrer et harmoniser les energies dans l'environnement ou dans le corps humain. Elle est souvent associee a des pratiques telles que la meditation, le yoga, la guerison energetique et la construction de batiments sacres.

what does it means deep state

The term "deep state" typically refers to a theory or belief that there is a hidden or secretive network of powerful individuals or organizations within a government or other institution that operate outside of the democratic process and exert a disproportionate amount of influence over policy and decision-making.

The concept of a "deep state" is often associated with conspiracy theories and is not a well-defined or accepted concept in political science or other academic disciplines. Proponents of the idea often claim that the deep state is responsible for a range of secretive and nefarious activities, such as manipulating elections, controlling the media, and pursuing secret agendas that are at odds with the interests of ordinary citizens.

However, critics of the notion of a deep state argue that it is a vague and unsubstantiated concept that is often used to promote political agendas or discredit legitimate institutions and processes. They maintain that the idea of a deep state ignores the complex realities of democratic governance and the checks and balances that are designed to prevent any one group or individual from exerting unchecked power.

omari razak
can you tell me about ancient deep states of for examle in the medivial period
The concept of a "deep state" is a relatively modern one, and the term itself was not used in ancient or medieval times. However, there were certainly examples of powerful individuals or groups exerting influence and control over political and social systems in these periods.

In medieval Europe, for example, the Catholic Church wielded enormous power and influence over both religious and secular affairs. The Pope and the bishops were able to shape laws, influence wars, and control access to education and other resources. Similarly, in feudal societies, the nobility held significant power over their vassals and serfs, and were able to use this power to influence political decisions and control resources.

In other parts of the world, there were also examples of powerful dynasties or ruling classes that exerted control over the state. For example, in ancient China, the imperial court and the eunuch class held significant power and influence over the government and society, often to the detriment of the common people.

It is important to note, however, that the structures of power and influence in these societies were often different from those of modern democracies. In many cases, there was little or no separation of powers, and democratic institutions such as representative government and the rule of law were not yet established. Therefore, while these examples may be seen as precursors to modern concepts of the deep state, the dynamics of power and influence were quite different from those of today.

can we consider that secret societies played a role as deep states
It is possible that some secret societies have functioned as deep states, but it would depend on the specific organization and the context in which it operated. Secret societies are typically defined as groups that operate outside of the mainstream and often engage in secretive or clandestine activities. While some secret societies have been associated with political and social power, not all of them have been involved in efforts to influence or control the government.

Some examples of secret societies that have been accused of acting as deep states include the Illuminati and the Freemasons, both of which have been the subject of various conspiracy theories over the years. However, there is little concrete evidence to support these claims, and most scholars view them as unfounded speculation.

It is worth noting that not all secret societies are necessarily nefarious or subversive. Some, like the Order of the Eastern Star or the Knights of Columbus, are primarily social or philanthropic organizations that are open about their membership and activities. Others, like the Skull and Bones society at Yale University, are more secretive but do not necessarily engage in political or social control.

Overall, while it is possible for a secret society to function as a deep state, it would depend on the specific organization and the context in which it operates. The concept of the deep state is complex and multifaceted, and requires careful analysis of the power structures and dynamics that exist within a given society or institution.

in islamic world secret societies are linking to secret political forces Like any other part of the world, there have been secret societies in the Islamic world, but it is important to note that not all secret societies in the Islamic world are linked to secret political forces. Some secret societies are purely religious in nature and are focused on spiritual and religious teachings, while others are focused on social or charitable work.

That being said, there have been instances in the Islamic world where secret societies have been linked to secret political forces or have engaged in political activities themselves. For example, in the early 20th century, there was a secret society in Egypt known as the Muslim Brotherhood, which was founded with the aim of promoting Islamic values and combating Western influence in the region. Over time, the Muslim Brotherhood became increasingly involved in politics and was accused of engaging in violent and subversive activities.

Similarly, in Iran, there is a secretive and powerful religious order known as the Hojjatieh Society, which has been linked to hardline political forces in the country. The Hojjatieh Society is known for its extreme views and has been accused of trying to undermine the moderate elements in Iranian politics.

It is important to note, however, that not all secret societies in the Islamic world are linked to secret political forces, and many are focused on non-political activities such as spiritual and religious teachings or charitable work. As with any secret society, it is difficult to know the full extent of their activities and influence, and it is important to approach any claims about their activities with a healthy dose of skepticism.

but the aim always is the political power over

While it is true that some secret societies may have a goal of gaining political power over the population, it is important to note that not all secret societies have this aim. Some secret societies may focus on spiritual or religious teachings, while others may be focused on social or charitable work. Additionally, not all secret societies are necessarily nefarious or subversive, and some may have benign or even positive goals.

That being said, there have certainly been instances where secret societies have sought to gain political power or control over the population. This may involve clandestine activities such as propaganda, subversion, or even violence. However, it is important to note that such activities are generally considered to be outside of the boundaries of acceptable political behavior in modern democracies.

It is also worth noting that not all attempts to gain political power or control over the population are necessarily carried out by secret societies. In some cases, this may be done through legal or semi-legal means such as lobbying, media manipulation, or campaign finance.

Overall, while it is true that some secret societies may aim to gain political power over the population, it is important to avoid making blanket assumptions about all secret societies, and to approach any claims about their activities with a healthy dose of skepticism.

can you define with examples what is Behavioral Medicine

Behavioral Medicine is an interdisciplinary field that combines knowledge and practices from psychology, medicine, and other health sciences to understand how behavior, emotions, and social context affect physical health and illness.

Here are some examples of Behavioral Medicine:

Cognitive-behavioral therapy (CBT) is a common form of Behavioral Medicine used to treat various health conditions. It involves identifying negative thoughts and behaviors that contribute to health problems and replacing them with positive ones. For instance, CBT can be used to treat anxiety disorders, chronic pain, and insomnia.

Health behavior change programs, such as smoking cessation or weight management programs, use principles of Behavioral Medicine to help individuals change their unhealthy behaviors and adopt healthy ones. For example, a program might use motivational interviewing techniques to help smokers quit by focusing on their personal motivations and reasons for quitting.

Mind-body interventions, such as mindfulness meditation or yoga, are also used in Behavioral Medicine to help manage physical symptoms and improve overall health. These interventions are based on the idea that the mind and body are interconnected, and that by managing thoughts and emotions, physical health can be improved. For example, mindfulness meditation has been shown to reduce symptoms of depression and anxiety, as well as improve cardiovascular health.

then Lord Loudoun undertook to sift suspects. They found nobody who seemed to have the position the anonymous writer asserted to be his. At length, on Jan. 1, 1757, Samuel Vanhorne, a New York merchant, residing on Wall Street, came to Sir Charles Hardy, Governor of New York, and explained that business often took him to Philadelphia where friends frequently asked him to inquire if there were letters for them in the New York Post Office and, if so, to forward the communications. During a visit from which he had just returned, said Vanhorne, a man dressed like an officer had accosted him and had asked if there was in the New York office a letter for Pierre Fidel. Doubtless having been informed of the decoy, Vanhorne answered that such a letter was awaiting its addressee. The man in military dress replied that he wished he had it, as "the man for whom it was intended was on the frontier." [42]

Sir Charles immediately notified Lord Loudoun, who went that same evening with Colonel Stanwix to the Governor's quarters to interview Vanhorne. The merchant repeated his story. With some difficulty and much persuasion, Loudoun won Vanhorne's promise to go back to Philadelphia with Colonel Stanwix. The Colonel was ordered to arrest the suspect, if Vanhorne pointed him out, and to secure all his papers.[44] Vanhorne's description was fairly specific and might be useful: the man who inquired about the letter was tall, dark, with a red coat and a sword and appeared to be a stranger.[45]

Search by the Colonel and the merchant was to no purpose; the man had disappeared. Loudoun had then to attempt to identify "Pierre Fidel" on the basis of Vanhorne's description, added to what the traitor had said casually in his letter of himself and of his military position: What tall, dark officer was there in America, thirty-eight years of age, unmarried, who had an aide-de-camp and was going to participate in the expedition against Fort DuQuesne?

The only officer who was known to Lord Loudoun's informants as in any way answering to this description was Colonel Washington. He was single; he had an aide; he was to share in the next march to the Ohio. As it chanced, Lord Loudoun had close at hand Capt. David Kennedy, who had seen Washington in New York in March, 1756,

[42] So Dr. Douglas Brymner transcribed Loudoun's dispatch of Jan. 4, 1757, in Report A.H.A., 1896, v. 1, p. 700; the execrably written entry in Loudoun's Memorandum may with like probability be read as "the man it is from is now on the Front'r."

when the Colonel was returning from the visit to General Shirley in Boston. Loudoun consequently asked Kennedy for a description of the Virginian. Washington, said the Captain, was "a man about six feet high of a black complexion, [with] black hair which he then wore in a bag—looks like a foreigner, a strong man." Kennedy remembered Washington's companions, Mercer and Stewart, and recalled that Washington's uniform was "blue, faced with red and laced." [46]

Loudoun was not sufficiently impressed by this to order Washington's arrest, but he was eager, no doubt, to see the man who perhaps in some vengeful, incredible madness, had turned traitor. When the Colonel at length stood before the General, Loudoun must have observed at once how far Washington failed to fit Kennedy's description, with brown, not black hair, in his twenties and not thirty-eight, having none of the "foreigner" in his countenance—and pockmarked besides, which certainly would have been observed if Washington had been the officer Vanhorne had seen in Philadelphia. Washington was eliminated; "Pierre Fidel" continued to be a mystery.[47]

George may not have known then or thereafter of a suspicion he would have regarded as the worst of disgraces; but he heard of some of the decisions made by the council of Governors, who sat with Lord Loudoun through March 23. Loudoun told the council virtually nothing concerning his plan of operations in the North—he was "very reserved and secret" Dinwiddie said, in half praise and half grumble [48]—but he and the Governors agreed confidentially that no offensive could be undertaken in Pennsylvania or to the southward during 1757. A defensive must be maintained there, by an enlarged force, and particularly in South Carolina where a French attack from Santo Domingo or from the Alabama fort in the Creek country was apprehended. Contingents from North Carolina, Virginia and Pennsylvania must be sent to Charleston to strengthen the regulars and the South Carolina forces.[49] This plan had the endorsement of the Governors, and, in particular, of Dinwiddie, who regarded the defence of South Carolina as an idea almost his own [50]—in sharpest contrast to his feelings about that Colony when James Glen was Governor.

Washington knew nothing of the situation in South Carolina and comes from literary texts recorded on cuneiform clay tablets and most of this material is Sumerian.

According to the Sumerian belief, after death, people would take a journey to the Underworld, a gloomy and unpleasant realm.

Underworld was not a pleasant realm of existence, a dark, dusty land, where the bread did not taste good, their garments were only feathers to protect them from the cold, and water to drink was brackish.

Many different graveyards have been unearthed and they give us an idea about how the Sumerians lived and died.

Sumerians respected death and when life came to an end, they took the burial of the dead as seriously as people in other cultures.

However, the Sumerians had no cemeteries except for the king and his most important nobles. In Sumer tradition, the body was frequently buried in the family tomb within the house. The body was usually laid to rest curled up and placed in a large jar, a casket, stone sarcophagus, or simply ordinary cloth wrapping. Whether the burial was lavish or rather poor depended mostly on the economic status of the deceased.

All poor deceased were buried with the possession they mostly treasured in life; rich ones usually went on their journey to the afterlife with grave goods specially prepared for their burial.

Most impressive and valuable grave goods have been revealed in excavations of royal burial sites.

One of the most spectacular and relatively untouched by robbers was the tomb of a mysterious Queen Puabi with some beautiful objects such as gold ribbon headdresses, a wooden lyre, a beautifully decorated royal sled, precious jewelry, and a large number of slaves and servants who were sacrificed to accompany Puabi on her journey to the afterlife and serve her there, as we described in our article about Puabi.

What Was Sumerian View Of The Underworld?

This view was definitely gloomy. It was not a pleasant realm of existence, a dark, dusty land, where the bread did not taste good, their garments were only feathers to protect them from the cold, and water to drink was brackish.

In her book "Sumer and the Sumerians", Harriet Crawford writes that "based on evidence, there is the impression that their condition in the underworld reflected their social status on earth, not their virtue. Goods that people took to their graves were considered comforts that they could take with them into the afterlife. When a king died, people who worked for him and many of his possessions were buried with him, including wagons and animals."

Most Sumerian people lived hard lives, and their ideas about the afterlife resembled their earthly existence so they "wasted no time" preparing for the afterlife. Man - as the work of the gods – had a soul, which after the death of the body, continued to this sad, underground realm of the goddess Ereshkigal, the sister of Inanna (Ishtar).

An interesting concept of sin and punishment existed among people of Mesopotamia, but it only related to earthly life and therefore it could be prevented by confession, sacrifices, and prayers. Interestingly, these people were extremely conscious of their sinful nature so they frequently asked for their deity for forgiveness:

"O goddess whom I know or do not know, (my) transgressions are many; great are (my) sins. "The transgressions which I have committed, indeed I do not know; "The sins which I have done, indeed I do not know..."

"O god whom I know or do not know, (my) transgressions are many; great are (my) sins..."

The existence of the soul in the afterlife, on the other hand, depended only on the splendor of the burial and sacrifices submitted by the family to the deity.

afterlife.

Accompanied by seven judges sitting in front of her, Ereshkigal, the goddess of the underworld presided over the dead, and the sentence of death was announced when the deceased the underworld.

According to the Sumerian poem "Gilgamesh, Enkidu, and the Nether World," mortals were also allowed to enter the realm of death but they had to follow certain rules, for example, they were not allowed to wear clean clothes, carry a weapon and make noise, among other things. Breaking any of these rules resulted that the person was forever submitted to the world of shadows and not allowed to return.

We can cite Gregory Shushan, in his “Conceptions of the Afterlife in Early Civilizations”, who gives an example of what Enkidu - EN.KI.DU ("Enki's creation"), a central figure in the "Epic of Gilgamesh" - saw in the realm of the dead:

“...Enkidu reveals how the man with one son weeps because of the loss of his home. The man with two sits on bricks and eats bread. The man with three drinks water from a skin on his saddle, while the man with four, rejoices ‘like a man who has four donkeys’. The man with five, is allowed entry into the palace, ‘like a fine scribe’... The man with seven, sits on a throne with the gods and hears proceedings/judgements. Those with no heir eat bread like bricks. ...”

“The man who died in battle has his head cradled by his parents, while his wife weeps. Those without funerary offerings eat crumbs and table scraps. The man who died an early death lies ‘on the bed of the gods’. The man who was burned to death rises to the sky: ‘his ghost was not there, his smoke went up to the heavens’...

Apparently, Sumerians, Babylonians, and Assyrians did not believe that something good was waiting for them on the other side. They did not believe it was worth wasting time to prepare for the afterlife. Ancient Egyptians' beliefs in death and the afterlife were different, and they prepared for their journey to the other side.

Deciphering the Truth Behind the Moors in Spain

READ LATER PRINT

Al-Andalus is the name given to the Iberian Peninsula when it was under Muslim rule. Islam arrived in that region with the arrival of the Moors during the 8 th century AD, and succeeded in conquering almost the entire peninsula in less than a decade. The rule of the Moors in Spain lasted until 1492, when the last surviving Muslim state in the Iberian Peninsula, the Emirate of Granada, was conquered by the Christians.

Between the beginning and the end of Moorish rule in the Iberian Peninsula, Al-Andalus underwent much political change, transforming from a province of the Umayyad Caliphate into an independent emirate, and then fragmenting into smaller independent principalities known as taifas. The period of Muslim rule in the Iberian Peninsula is often described as La Convivencia (meaning 'The Coexistence'), a time when Muslims, Christians and Jews were living peacefully side by side. The reality, however, may be a little more complicated than this.

The Moors' Very Own Conquista

Prior to the coming of Islam, Al-Andalus was known by its Roman name, Hispania. At the beginning of the 5 th century AD, much of the Iberian Peninsula had been conquered by the Visigoths. Only the westernmost and northernmost parts of the peninsula were not under their rule. By the beginning of the 8 th century AD, the Visigothic Kingdom had been weakened by disputed successions, rebellions, and problems with the nobility. As a consequence, the Visigoths were not in the best position to defend their kingdom when the Umayyads invaded the Iberian Peninsula in 711 AD.

With regards to the sources from the time of the Umayyad invasion, no Muslim accounts are available, whereas the only Christian source, the so-called Chronicle of 754 , is rather vague about the events that occurred. A 9 th century AD Muslim account, written by the historian Ibn Abd al-Hakam, provides a rather interesting story regarding the cause of the Umayyad invasion.

According to Ibn Abd al-Hakam, a Visigothic nobleman by the name of Count Julian had approached Tariq ibn Ziyad, an Umayyad commander for his help. One of the count's daughters had been raped by Roderic, the Visigothic king. Since the count could do nothing to punish the king for his crime, he decided to invite the Umayyads to invade the kingdom. Therefore, Julian provided ships to carry the Umayyad army across the Strait of Gibraltar.

Engraving of King Roderic, the last Visigoth king of Hispania. (Public domain)

Since Ibn Abd al-Hakam was writing more than a century after the Umayyad invasion of the Iberian Peninsula, it is quite likely that facts and legends were mixed up. It has been suggested that the story of Count Julian's grudge against Roderic belongs to the latter. There are other legends about the Umayyad invasion as well. One of these alleges that the invaders received help from Jews living in the Visigothic Kingdom. In return for less restrictions under the Muslims, the Jews of certain Christian cities agreed to open the gates for them. This story has been used by Christians later on to blame the Jews for collaborating with the Muslims.

Even today, it is not entirely clear as to the nature of the Umayyad invasion of the Iberian Peninsula in 711 AD, and historians have put forward a number of different hypotheses. The first view is that the Umayyads had sent troops into the Iberian Peninsula to aid one of the factions in a Visigothic civil war, with the hopes of plunder and a future alliance. The second is that the Umayyads had intended to use the invasion to test the military strength of the Visigoths. The third is that this was a an unusually large Umayyad raiding party, which did not have any strategic intention. The last is that it was the first wave of a full-scale invasion.

In any case, when Tariq ibn Ziyad crossed from North Africa into the Iberian Peninsula, he brought with him between 10,000 and 15,000 men, which was not a very large force. According to Ibn Abd al-Hakam, the Visigoths did not pay attention to the Umayyads, since they assumed that the vessels carrying them, which were crossing and re-crossing the strait, were merely trading vessels. In 711/2 AD, the Umayyads inflicted a crushing defeat on the Visigoths at the Battle of Guadalete.

Visigothic King Roderic haranguing his troops before the Battle of Guadalete, which was against the invading Moors in Spain.
(Bernardo Blanco y Pérez / Public domain)

In addition to Roderic, most of the Visigothic nobles lost their lives on the battlefield. As a consequence, the Visigothic Kingdom was left largely leaderless and disorganized, which greatly aided the Umayyads in their conquest of the Iberian Peninsula. Although 711/2 is commonly regarded as the year the Iberian Peninsula fell to the Moors, it has been suggested alternatively that the conquest took several years to accomplish.

Consolidation and Expansion

In any case, by 718 AD, the entire Iberian Peninsula, with the exception of the northernmost region, was under Moor rule. At this point of time, Al-Andalus was a province of the Umayyad Caliphate, and was therefore under the rule of governors.

It has been pointed out that almost all of these governors, lasted no longer than two years. Although the governors were appointed either by the Governor of Ifriqiya, or by the caliph himself in Damascus, their authority was in fact undermined by local rulers, who were often the descendants of the initial conquerors. The local lords extended their control over different parts of the peninsula, which in turn enabled them to build up their wealth. As a result, they had the means to oppose the governor if necessary.

Rise of Muslim Spain (History of al andalus)

Although the Umayyad governors had little success in imposing their authority on the local lords of Al-Andalus, they were somewhat more successful in extending Moor rule beyond the peninsula. As an example, in 719 AD, Al-Samh ibn Malik crossed the Pyrenees, and conquered Septimania (in modern-day southern France). The Moors would remain in that region until 759 AD.

Muslim incursions into Western Europe lasted until 732 AD. In that year, an invading Muslim army, led by Abd al-Rahman al-Ghafiqi, was defeated by the Franks under Charles Martel at the Battle of Tours. Nevertheless, it was the great rebellion of the Berbers, which broke out in North Africa in 739 AD, and subsequently spread to Al-Andalus, that was largely responsible for preventing the Muslims from carrying on further campaigns into France.

The Fall of the Umayyad Dynasty and the Al-Rahmans' Rise in Iberia

In 756 AD, Al-Andalus' status changed from a province into an independent emirate. This was due to the collapse of the Umayyad Caliphate in 750 AD. A year before that, Abu al-Abbas al-Saffah was proclaimed as caliph by his supporters, in opposition to the reigning Umayyad caliph, Marwan II. At the battle of the Great Zab River in 750 AD, Marwan was defeated, and the Abbasid Caliphate was established.

The Abbasids ruthlessly hunted down and killed the surviving members of the Umayyad Dynasty. One of them, Abd al-Rahman, however, managed to escape to Al-Andalus. At the time of Abd al-Rahman's arrival, the former Umayyad province was divided between two rival factions, the Qays and the Yaman, which the fugitive Umayyad prince saw as an opportunity to exploit.

Abd al-Rahman skillfully navigated the politics of Al-Andalus, shifting his allegiance from one faction to another. In addition, he bolstered his position by hiring mercenaries to fight for him. By 755 AD, Abd al-Rahman felt that he had attained a strong enough position, and attacked the Governor of Al-Andalus. Abd al-Rahman emerged victorious, made Cordoba his capital, and established the independent Emirate of Cordoba.

Portrait of Abd al-Rahman I, who was one of the most historically significant Muslims in Spain during the Middle Ages. (Public domain )

Abd al-Rahman ruled for about three decades, during which he had to face external threats, such as armies sent against him by the Abbasids and the Franks, as well as internal ones, such as rebellions. Still, Abd al-Rahman was a capable ruler, and successfully defended his realm from his enemies.

The successors of Abd al-Rahman continued his legacy, and the Emirate of Cordoba reached its zenith during the 10 th century. In 929 AD, Abd al-Rahman III, widely considered to be the greatest Umayyad ruler of Al-Andalus, adopted the title 'caliph', thereby turning the Emirate of Cordoba into the Caliphate of Cordoba. Abd al-Rahman had succeeded his grandfather, Abd Allah, as emir in 912 AD, when he was only 21 years old.

Muslim In-Fighting, While the Christians Seize Their Chance

The Emirate of Cordoba had, at times, only nominal rule over Al-Andalus, and depended on the loyalty of local Muslim rulers. As a result, there were often pockets of resistance to Cordoban hegemony. Abd al-Rahman was a competent military leader, and campaigned successfully against a rebellious lord, Umar ibn Hafsun, his greatest adversary. The rebellion largely collapsed after the death of Umar ibn Hafsun in 917 AD. Nevertheless, his capital, Bobastro, only fell to Abd al-Rahman in 928 AD.

Prior to 929 AD, the Umayyads of Al-Andalus recognized the Abbasid caliph as the rightful head of the Muslim community. Thus, when Abd al-Rahman declared himself caliph, it was, in a way, a declaration of independence from the Abbasids. At the same time, this declaration served as a response to the Fatimids, whose rulers also claimed the title 'caliph'. Whilst the Abbasids would have perceived this as a challenge, they were not able to do anything about it.

The Fatimids, who were occupying the North African coast, on the other hand, were perceived by Abd al-Rahman as the greatest threat, as they challenged Umayyad influence in Northwest Africa. Abd al-Rahman was not able to crush the Fatimids, and the struggle between the two caliphates continued throughout the 10 th century.

Umayyad rule in Al-Andalus ended in 1031, when the caliphate fragmented into a number of independent principalities, or taifas. During this period, the various taifas fought against each other, weakening each other during the process. The Christian states to the north were aware of the state of affairs in Al-Andalus, and seized the opportunity to increase their own power. Whilst some taifas lost land to the Spanish Christians, others were forced to pay an annual tribute in exchange for peace.

In 1085, the conquest of Toledo, the key to Al-Andalus, by the Castilians alarmed the taifa chiefs, who requested the help of the Almoravids of Northwest Africa. The Almoravids managed to halt the Christian advance, but soon turned against the taifas, overthrew their rulers, and united Al-Andalus under their rule.

The Almoravids, were deposed by a new power, the Almohads, in Northwest Africa, around 1145. Subsequently, the Almohads invaded Al-Andalus, and succeeded in conquering the territory of their predecessors. Although some taifas were formed as a result of the fall of the Almoravids, these too fell to the Almohads. The greatest threat to the Almohads were the Christian states, who were becoming increasingly powerful.

During the first half of the 13 th century, the Almohads were gradually pushed southwards. For instance, Beja fell to Portugal in 1234, Cordoba to Castile in 1236, and Seville, the Almohad capital, in 1248. Once again, some local Moor rulers saw the weakening of the Almohads as a chance to establish their own taifas. They were however, unable to defend them from the Christians.

Collapse of Moorish Muslims in Spain and Their Legacy

The last Muslim stronghold in Al-Andalus was the Emirate of Granada, which was ruled by the Nasrid Dynasty. This emirate was established by Muhammad ibn al-Ahmar in 1238. Since the Christians did not perceive the Nasrids as a serious threat, they were content to collect tribute from them, and to attack them from time to time. Although Muhammad ibn al-Ahmar was a vassal of Castile, during the 14 th century, the Nasrids formed an alliance with the Marinids of Northwest Africa against the Christians.

The Nasrids and their allies suffered a decisive defeat at the hands of the Castilians and Portuguese at the Battle of Rio Salado in 1340, however, the Christians did not press their advantage after the death of Alfonso XI of Castile in 1350. The Nasrids remained in power until 1492, when Granada was conquered by Ferdinand II of Aragon and Isabella I of Castile . This marked the end of Al-Andalus.

Moorish rule of the Iberian Peninsula is best remembered today as La Convivencia , during which Muslims, Christians, and Jews lived together in harmony, contributing to Al-Andalus' status as one of the most enlightened areas in medieval Europe. Under Moorish rule, Christians and Jews were not forced to convert, but were allowed to follow their faiths. Apart from that, they were not slaves, were allowed to work in the civil service of the Muslim rulers, and were not required to live in ghettos, or other special areas.

At the same time, however, this tolerance had its limits. For instance, Jews and Christians were treated as second-class citizens, proselytizing to Muslims was not allowed, and restrictions were placed on the building of synagogues and churches. Neither was this tolerance constant throughout the entire period of Muslim rule. The Almohads were fundamentalists, so many non-Muslims went into exile after Cordoba was conquered by them in 1148. Still, compared to the treatment of Muslims and Jews by the Christians following the Reconquista, the rule of Muslims in Spain would seem to have been comparatively tolerant.

L'histoire du Maroc

7 - Les chérifs hasani (depuis ca. 1664)

Aperçu	1- L'Antiquité	2 - La conquête musulmane	3 - Les Almoravides
4 - Les Almohades	5 - L'empire mérinide	6 - Les chérifs saadiens	7 - Les chérifs hasani

Après la mort de Maulay [Moulaï]-Ahmed-el-Abbas, dernier prince saadien, Er-Rechid, un des fils de Maulay-Ali-Chérif, le chef de la zaouïa de Sidjilmassa, dans l'oasis du Tafilalet, se fait proclamer sultan à Oudjda; il combat et tue son frère Maulay-Mohammed et s'empare ensuite du Tafilalet en 1665. C'est là le commencement de la dynastie des chérifs filali. En 1667, Er-Rechid s'empare de Taza et ensuite de Fès qui obéissait à un certain Ed-Dreïdi, puis il s'occupe de combattre un agitateur du nom de Ghilan, maure d'origine andalouse, qui avait réussi à établir sa domination dans toute la province d'Alkasar, dans celle de Tanger et aux environs de Tétouan et qui venait de conclure une sorte de pacte d'alliance avec lord Bellasis, le gouverneur anglais de Tanger. Ghilan, battu, s'embarque à Asilah et se réfugie à Alger. Au retour de cette campagne, le sultan soumet les Beni-Zeroual et toute la majeure partie des Djebala, puis il s'empare dans le centre de L'empire de la fameuse zaouïa de Dela qu'il détruit en en dispersant les marabouts, et, l'année suivante, il franchit l'Atlas pour ranger sous son autorité les Aït-Aïach. Rentré à Fès, il embellit cette ville; on lui doit notamment le grand pont sur l'oued Sebou et la kasba dite d'El-Khemis actuellement en ruine, mais qui avait été construite pour assurer la sécurité de la route de Fès à Mequinez. En 1670, Maulay-er-Rechid conquit le Sous et s'empara de Taroudant. Il mourut à Marrakech, en 1672, d'un accident de cheval. L'oeuvre de ce souverain est considérable, et avec lui commence réellement la période moderne de l'histoire du Maroc; on voit déjà y figurer les tribus de nos jours.

Er-Rechid, en détruisant l'autorité des marabouts et des petits chefs qui rendaient toute action gouvernementale impossible, avait étendu sa puissance d'Oudjda à l'oued Sous, préparant ainsi le grand règne de son frère Maulay-Ismaïl. A peine monté sur le trône, ce dernier eut à combattre plusieurs compétiteurs : son frère Maulay-el-Harran, qui se fit proclamer sultan au Tafilalet en étendant son autorité sur les régions sahariennes, puis son neveu Ahmed-ben-Mahrez qui était reconnu à Marrakech et dans les environs, enfin le fameux Ghilan, revenu d'Algérie, avait reparu dans le Rif, aidé par un corps de Turcs. Grâce à la vaillante énergie qui est le trait saillant de son caractère, Maulay-Ismaïl ne tara pas à venir à bout de toutes ces difficultés. Ghilan est tué à Fès en 1673; la ville est frappée d'une lourde imposition; les troupes de Ben-Mahrez sont défaites dans le Tadela et, après trois années de luttes acharnées, le nouveau sultan entre à Marrakech, tandis que Maulay-el-Harran était pris au Tafilalet et interné. Maulay-Ismaïl s'occupa alors avec une grande activité, devenue légendaire au Maroc, des affaires de son empire. Il embellit et transforma complètement Mequinez dont il fit sa résidence favorite. Il s'appliqua à resserrer ses relations avec la France; l'ambassade qu'il envoya à Versailles sous la conduite de Ben-Aïssa pour demander à Louis XIV la main de la princesse de Conti est restée célèbre; il reçut en 1682 la mission du baron de Saint-Amand. Tout en maintenant un étroit blocus autour de la place de Tanger, il entretint de bonnes relations avec les marchands de Londres. Il organisa son armée d'une manière solide et nouvelle; ayant fait venir de grandes quantités de Soudanais, il créa de véritables colonies agricoles qui constituaient en même temps le personnel de sa garde.

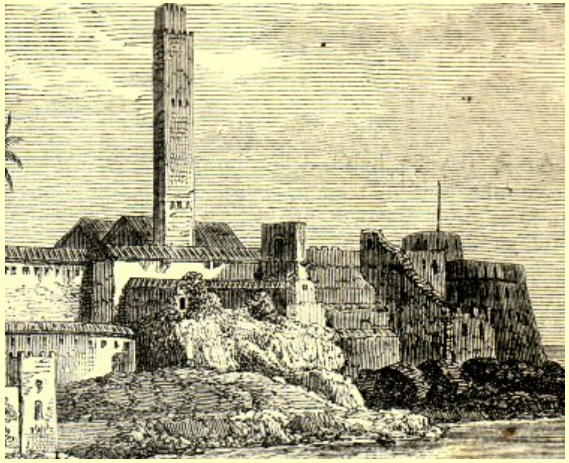
Ces cavaliers placés sous le patronage d'un saint commentateur du Coran, Sidi-el-Boukhari, conservèrent par la suite le titre d'Abid-Boukhari ou esclaves de Boukhari. A la fin de son règne, leur nombre atteignait 150 000; jamais le Maroc ne devait, retrouver semblable force militaire. Pour compléter l'organisation de sa domination, Maulay-Ismaïl fil élever sur tous les points stratégiques de son empire et le long de toutes les routes une série de kasba ou forts qui assuraient la tranquillité et dont on voit encore les ruines. Une expédition hasardeuse, qu'il conduisit lui-même jusqu'en Algérie, échoua sur les bords du Chélif de par la désertion des Arabes, mais un de ses neveux, Ahmed, réussit à mener ses troupes jusqu'au Soudan. Maulay-Ismaïl poursuivit avec la plus grande énergie la guerre contre les places que les chrétiens détenaient encore à cette époque, mais il ne put rien contre Ceuta après s'être emparé de la Mamoura. Enfin, en 1683, le Parlement anglais ayant résolu l'évacuation de Tanger, les troupes chérifiennes occupèrent la ville en 1684 dont les Anglais avaient détruit les principales fortifications ainsi que le môle, ouvrages qui leur avaient coûté, quelques années auparavant, tant de peines et tant d'argent. La joie des musulmans fut très grande, d'autant que, peu après, Larache et Asilah retombèrent aussi au pouvoir de Maulay-Ismaïl, dont la gloire se trouva portée comme à son apogée. Il ne demeurait plus entre les mains des chrétiens que Ceuta, Melilla et Mazagan.



Dégagée du fatras des racontars qui, longtemps, firent autorité sur ce prince et que nous ont légués les récits nombreux des esclaves ou des religieux qui se rendaient au Maroc, au XVIII^e siècle, y racheter des captifs, la vie de Maulay-Ismaïl est la plus grande page de l'histoire du Maroc. Dans la dynastie des Filali, il tient une place qui ne le cède en rien comme importance à l'oeuvre accomplie à celle d'El-Mansour, des chérifs saadiens. Il mourut à Mequinez le 22 mars 1727 à l'âge de quatre-vingts ans, après un règne de cinquante-sept ans. Si l'on en croit les récits populaires, Maulay-Ismaïl aurait eu 528 garçons et un nombre égal de filles; les prisons contenaient 25 000 captifs chrétiens et environ 30 000 criminels; le jour, tous ces prisonniers étaient employés aux immenses travaux que ce souverain ne cessa de faire entreprendre durant sa vie. A sa mort, il laissait le pays dans la plus grande prospérité et dans la tranquillité la plus parfaite; d'Oudjda jusqu'à l'oued Noun il en était ainsi. Maulay-Ismaïl, pour reprendre et développer l'oeuvre politique des Saadiens, n'avait cessé de combattre et de détruire les influences locales acquises par certains chefs et marabouts; pour augmenter son autorité religieuse, il favorisa la confrérie de Maulay-Taïeb et fut le premier à lui donner l'importance qu'elle conservera pendant les siècles suivants.

Son fils, Ahmed, surnommé El-Dehebi, à la suite de son expédition au Soudan, lui succéda, mais le mécontentement que provoqua la rapacité des nouveaux gouverneurs de province ne tarda pas à amener la rébellion dans l'empire. La garde noire elle-même se révolte; le pacha de Fès est massacré; Maulay-Abd-el-Malek en profite pour se faire proclamer à Marrakech, puis entrer à Mequinez, tandis qu'Ahmed est déchu. L'agitation est alors générale; Ahmed qui s'était réfugié au Tafilalet est rappelé; le pays se trouve partagé entre deux souverains. A sa mort, le Nord est disputé entre son fils Abou-Farés et Maulay-Abdallah, frère d'Ahmed, né d'une esclave anglaise. Abdallah l'emporte et, après six mois d'un siège assez rigoureux, s'empare de Fès. Sur ces entrefaites, une grande révolte des Berbères se déclare et ajoute encore à la confusion. Abdallah, se défiant de la fidélité de la garde noire, veut l'amoindrir, mais les chefs des Abid-Boukhari préviennent ses desseins en le déposant en septembre 1734 au profit de son frère Maulay-Ali. Ce dernier arrivait du Tafilalet, mais à soit tour il est chassé par la garde, qui reprend Maulay-Abdallah pour peu de temps, car des intrigues remettent bientôt en disgrâce ce dernier. Cette situation se prolonge; on voit successivement arriver Maulay-Mohammed qui, jusqu'alors, était assiégé dans Fès, puis à nouveau Maulay-Abdallah jusqu'au moment où Maulay-Mostadi, dont la mère passait pour avoir des relations avec le chef des Abid-Boukhari, se fait proclamer. L'empire se trouve à nouveau divisé; Mostadi, soutenu par les provinces des Beni-Hasan et par le Gharb, est battu par Maulay-Abdallah, qui regagne des partisans dans la garde et surtout dans la grande tribu des Oudaïa. Maulay-Abdallah, maître du pouvoir pour la sixième fois vers 1742, peut régner dans une paix relative, grâce à l'affaiblissement des Boukhari décimés dans cette suite de révolutions. Il mourut en 1757 à Fès.

Son fils Sidi-Mohammed parut surtout s'attacher à développer et à définir les relations commerciales avec les pays d'Europe; le Danemark, la Suède, les États-Unis, la France passèrent des traités. Sous son règne put lieu l'affaire dite de Larache, au cours de laquelle une escadre française, commandée par Du Chaffaut et qui venait de bombarder Salé et Rabat, dont les corsaires avaient insulté le pavillon français, perdit 450 hommes dans la rivière du Kous. Le comte de Breugnon vint en 1767 racheter à la cour les captifs et signer. un traité de commerce qui servit de base, jusqu'au début du XX^e^ siècle, aux relations de la France avec le Maroc. Breugnon laissa comme consul Chenier qui s'installa à Salé et qui, plus tard, devait être envoyé à Constantinople. Le sultan Sidi-Mohammed, le premier, autorisa l'exportation des grains, condamnée auparavant et maintes fois dans la suite par le fanatisme intransigeant de la cour chérifienne qui refusait, comme illicite et impure, la vente de céréales aux infidèles. C'est à ce souverain que l'on doit la fondation de Mogador, construite sur les plans de l'ingénieur français Cornut. Il entreprit le siège de Melilla, opération stérile à laquelle on raconte qu'il consacra une fortune; sous son règne, les Portugais évacuèrent la petite ville de Mazagan en 1769, dernier vestige de leurs anciennes possessions. En 1777, fut signé un traité avec la Hollande, qui mettait fin à des difficultés survenues entre les deux pays et au cours desquelles la flotte hollandaise avait brillé des bâtiments marocains à l'embouchure du Kous et du Sebou.

Rabat sur une ancienne gravure.

Le sultan Sidi-Mohammed licencia durant son règne la plus grande partie de la garde noire, et lorsqu'il mourut, le 11 avril 1790, il laissa une grande réputation de sagesse et de modération. Le Triestin Petrobelli, le Toscan Petro Muti, le Gênois Chiappe furent parmi ses principaux ministres. 800 transfuges espagnols et portugais étaient distribués dans les places de l'empire, et Boisselin, fils d'un chapelier de Paris, commandait à Mogador une troupe de 250 transfuges français. D'une de ses femmes, fille d'un renégat irlandais, il eut Maulay-Yezid ; il employa aussi un juif de Marseille, et le caïd Driss, qui était son premier chambellan, était un transfuge mahonais. Au moment de sa fin, il se disposait à aller châtier son fils qui était entré en rébellion. Maulay-Yezid régna peu de temps. D'abord proclamé à Tétouan, puis à Rabat et à Salé, il se signala par son extrême cupidité; obéissant à ce sentiment, il fit piller les juiveries. Il était fanatique et signa en 1791, néanmoins, avec les Anglais, un traité qui leur accordait de très grands avantages. L'article III leur reconnaissait le droit d'aller, venir, vendre, résider, voyager, louer ou bâtir des maisons et magasins dans ses États. A la mort de Maulay-Yezid, la lutte s'engage entre ses frères; ce fut Moulay-Seliman qui l'emporta. Proclamé à Rabat et à Tanger, il se hâte d'affermir son pouvoir en ouvrant des relations avec les puissances étrangères et par un gouvernement empreint de justice et de douceur.

En 1795, la République française décida de transférer le consulat de Salé à Tanger afin de mieux surveiller la politique des Anglais et des Espagnols. Plus tard, la bataille de Trafalgar porta un coup sensible à la situation de la France au Maroc et fit passer la suprématie relative, qu'elle y exerçait depuis Louis XIV, aux mains de l'Angleterre. Maulay-Seliman envoya cependant une ambassade à Saint-Cloud, dont le chef, Hadj-Driss-Errâni, dans une audience solennelle, le 6 septembre 1807, décerna à Napoléon le titre de sultan des sultans; mais une mission confiée peu après au capitaine Burel, pour faire sortir le chérif de sa neutralité bienveillante vis-à-vis des Anglais, échoua. Ce fut durant ce règne que se fonda, au Sud du Sous, le petit État indépendant de Sidi-Hécham. Le grand honneur de Maulay-Seliman fut de mettre fin à la piraterie qu'exerçaient ses populations maritimes; il prit même l'engagement, qu'il tint religieusement, de racheter les captifs qui seraient faits dans l'extrême Sud à la suite des naufrages. Les dernières années de son règne furent attristées par une grande révolte des Berbères du centre de l'empire. Les Aït-Iousi, les Beni-Meguiled, les Zaïan surprirent le camp impérial, le pillèrent, et le sultan lui-même ne dut le salut qu'au dévouement d'un berger qui, en le couvrant de son burnous, l'aida à fuir. Assiégé ensuite dans Mequinez, il voit Fès tomber aux mains de son neveu, Maulay-Brahim, que les intrigues et l'influence des chérifs d'Ouazzan y avaient fait reconnaître pour quelque temps. L'insurrection passe ensuite aux mains de Maulay-Saïd, prince énergique que Maulay-Seliman parvient néanmoins à exiler au Tafilalet. Avant de mourir, le 28 novembre 1822, le sultan avait désigné comme son héritier son neveu Maulay-Ahderraman.

Les commencements du nouveau règne furent, comme d'habitude, au Maroc, assez troublés. En 1825, arriva à Fès une ambassade française, et, peu après, le sultan eut des difficultés avec l'Angleterre qui bloqua les côtes, puis avec les Autrichiens qui bombardèrent quelques ports, mais subirent un échec assez grave près de Larache. La prise d'Alger et l'occupation d'Oran devaient avoir un profond retentissement au Maroc et à la cour chérifienne en particulier. On sait que Maulay-Abderraman essaya alors de s'emparer de Tlemcen : il y était également poussé par l'orgueil fanatique de son entourage et par les intrigues étrangères. La mission du comte d'Auvray envoyée à cet effet à la cour de Fès pour faire renoncer le chérif à ses visées ne paraît pas avoir eu grand effet, car Abderraman n'en persista pas moins à charger son neveu Maulay-Ali de garder le royaume de Tlemcen, et il envoya lui-même des agents jusqu'à Médéa et à Miliana se faire reconnaître par les populations comme gouverneurs au nom du Makhzen marocain. Il fallut la mission spéciale de Mornay qui, en 1832, se rendit à Mequinez lui porter un ultimatum très net pour le faire renoncer à ses prétentions. Dans la suite, la cour chérifienne n'en devait pas moins aider de toute son influence Abd-el-Kader qui reçut même, dit-on, à Taza, un burnous d'investiture d'Abderraman. Ce fut, du reste, par la voie du Maroc qu'Abd-el-Kader tira tous ses approvisionnements et munitions durant sa lutte contre les Français en Algérie. On en eut les preuves les plus décisives, et le colonel de Larue fut envoyé à Mequinez afin de rappeler le sultan à l'observation de sa neutralité. La révolte des Oudaïa qui arriva sur ces entrefaites devait l'y forcer tout naturellement : mais, peu après, les difficultés augmentèrent le long de la frontière oranaise que les Marocains voulaient reculer à la Tafna.

Le sultan avant concentré des troupes considérables à Oudjda, l'audace guerrière des populations ne cessa d'augmenter; la situation devint difficile jusqu'au moment où les agressions se multiplièrent. Le maréchal Bugeaud dut engager l'action, prendre Oudjda et enfin, le 14 août 1844, l'armée marocaine commandée par Sidi-Mohammed, fils d'Abderraman, fut complètement défaite à la bataille de l'Isly. Pendant ce temps, le prince de Joinville bombardait Tanger et Mogador. La paix fut ensuite conclue; la France obtenait du gouvernement marocain la mise hors la loi d'Abd-el-Kader et comme frontière celle qui était reconnue à l'époque de la domination turque. Vers 1850, des difficultés s'élevèrent à nouveau avec la cour de Fès, à la suite du refus du sultan d'admettre la correspondance directe entre lui et notre chargé d'affaires de France. Le bombardement de Salé en 1851 par une escadre française inspira au chérif une appréciation plus prudente des choses. Maulay-Abderraman mourut le 6 septembre 1859. Son fils, Sidi-Mohammed, lui succéda au moment de graves difficultés survenues avec l'Espagne. Les délimitations défectueuses des présides et, en particulier, du territoire de Ceuta, avaient amené une série d'incidents graves. Le gouvernement de Madrid résolut alors l'expédition dite de 1859 ou de Tétouan qui dura six mois, nécessita une armée d'environ 40 000 hommes, se termina par la prise de Tétouan et par le traité de l'Oued-Ras. On connaît l'action diplomatique toute-puissante à cette occasion de l'Angleterre, les engagements exigés du cabinet de Madrid avant le commencement de la campagne et enfin l'arrêt brusque de l'armée d'O'Donnel et de Prim sur le chemin de Tétouan à Tanger. Pendant cette expédition, la France avait prêté à l'Espagne un matériel de guerre assez considérable, et une escadre française avait bombardé les forts marocains de l'embouchure de la rivière de Tétouan. Par le traité qui mettait fin à cette guerre, l'Espagne obtenait de grandes satisfactions et entre autres le paiement d'une indemnité de 100 millions. Après cette rude défaite, le sultan Sidi-Mohammed régna en paix jusqu'en 1873 et, éclairé par l'expérience, résista aux intrigues des rivaux de la France qui le poussèrent en 1870 à profiter de la guerre franco-allemande pour semer la révolte dans la province d'Oran.

A sa mort, qui survint à Marrakech, un de ses fils, Maulay-el-Hasan, fut nommé en 1873 à l'exclusion de son frère aîné, Maulay-Othman. Très aimé par l'armée, il ne rencontra pas d'opposition violente dans sa famille ; il n'en fut pas de même dans le pays, et il lui fallut d'abord se transporter à l'extrémité orientale de son empire, à Oudjda, où un de ses caïds, l-Hadj-Mohammed-ould-el-Bachir, lui causait de graves embarras avec les autorités algériennes. Durant la route, le sultan essuya une véritable défaite aux environs de Taza, de la part de la tribu des Ghyiâtsa. Rentré à Marrakech, Maulay-el-Hasan résolut d'asseoir son gouvernement dans la province du Sous; cette opération considérable et des plus difficiles nécessita deux expéditions. En somme, les premières années de ce règne furent consacrées de 1873 à 1888 à faire reconnaître, puis à consolider son autorité dans les régions accessibles de l'empire qu'il parcourait sans cesse et presque chaque année, de Maroc à Fès, de Fès à Oudjda, pour ensuite revenir au coeur de ses États. Par deux fois, il se rendit au Sous, tandis que, par une habile politique de rapprochement, puis d'alliance avec les marabouts du Tadela, il s'assurait le concours précieux et indépendant d'un chef tout-puissant, le caïd Mohammed-ou-Hammou, de la grande tribu des Zaïan. Vers la fin de 1887, Maulay-el-Hasan consacra les ressources que lui avaient données sa diplomatie intérieure et la domination des territoires qui lui étaient soumis pour entreprendre la lutte contre l'influence de la secte religieuse des Derkaoui, et il ne cessa aussi de combattre l'hégémonie berbère.

L'expédition chez les Beni-Meguiled, au Sud de Mequinez, n'avait d'autre but; enfin et après la mort du chérif El-Arbi-el-Derkaoui dont la zaouïa était dans le Medaghara, sur la limite des oasis de Tafilalet, le sultan se rendit lui-même, à la tête d'une armée nombreuse, dans ces régions méridionales. Il tenta de développer son influence dans toutes les contrées sahariennes environnantes, mais des difficultés très graves survenues aux environs de Melilla avec le gouvernement espagnol le forcèrent à rentrer à Marrakech où il reçut l'ambassade du maréchal Martinez Campos. Il signa un traité qui mettait fin à ces difficultés et qui accordait à l'Espagne une indemnité de 20 millions de pesetas. Au printemps de 1894, Maulay-el-Hasan se mit en route pour gagner le Nord de son empire, mais il mourut en route entre Marrakech et Rabat, au campement de Dar-ould-Ziddou le 6 juin. Durant tout son règne, ce souverain, d'une activité infatigable, et qui, presque chaque année, prenait la tête de ses troupes pour quelque expédition, s'attacha d'autre part, grâce à sa diplomatie que secondèrent les jalousies des puissances occidentales, à maintenir la barrière qui ferme jusqu'au début du XX^{e} siècle le Maghreb el-Acsa à l'activité européenne. Les traités de commerce qu'il signa témoignent de cette volonté par le peu de concession qu'il fit. En 1881, avait eu lieu à Madrid une conférence internationale pour les affaires du Maroc; aidé, conseillé, soutenu par la diplomatie anglaise, le gouvernement marocain rendit comme nul cet essai de modification à l'état de choses assez qui caractérise le Maroc.

Le jeune Abd-el-Aziz, fils d'une Circassienne, a succédé en 1894 à son père à l'âge de quatorze ans, son règne verra la mise sous tutelle de son pays à partir de 1907, avec un protectorat de la France officiel à partir de 1912, puis (pour la région de Tanger), de l'Espagne. Devenu colonie, de fait, le Maroc se soulève en 1926 dans le Rif, une rébellion qu'écrasera dans le sang le maréchal Pétain. Le sultan et futur roi Mohammed V contribuera ensuite, pendant la Seconde guerre mondiale à ranger le Maroc dans le camp de la France libre, contre le régime de Vichy. Des émeutes en 1952, durement réprimées viendront cependant rappeler les volontés d'indépendance du Maroc. Le sultan est déposé l'année suivante et exilé en Corse ; on le remplace par Mohammed ben Arafa. Le Maroc obtient finalement son indépendance en 1956, autant de la France que de l'Espagne quelques mois plus tard. Mohammed V retrouve son trône mais meurt en 1961. Après une période de troubles, le roi Hassan II, son successeur verrouille le pays d'une main de fer. A sa mort, en 1999, son fils, Mohammed VI, lui succède. C'est l'actuel roi du Maroc. Le 'Géant de Cuma' découvert en 1938 mesurait 24 mètres En 1938, lors de fouilles au sommet de l'acropole de Cumana, sur la façade ouest du temple dit de Jupiter, des ouvriers de l'archéologue Amedeo Maiuri ont découvert d'énormes fragments d'os qui appartiendraient à un être aux proportions énormes.

Le célèbre paléontologue Ralph von Koenigswald, déjà engagé dans la recherche du Gigantopithecus, a été averti de la découverte et s'est rendu sur place pour rejoindre les chercheurs et mettre les découvertes au jour.

Des restes squelettiques exceptionnels aux proportions énormes ont émergé du sol, et une fraction d'une dalle de pierre avec des restes de peinture rupestre qui a révélé une forme symbolique inconnue à laquelle von Koenigswald a donné le nom de Chaosmos. Et ce même élément peint, immédiatement associé à la taille des os de la main, a conduit le savant à considérer la créature nouvellement trouvée comme le plus grand artiste du monde.

Ces découvertes incroyables étaient prêts à être présentés dans une exposition qui aurait dû avoir lieu au musée napolitain en 1939 et qui n'a jamais eu lieu en raison des événements de la guerre, qui ont fait enterrer à nouveau l'homme sensationnel du passé, cette fois dans le sous-sol poussiéreux du musée.

Ils ont été conservés et oubliés pendant près d'un siècle jusqu'à la récente découverte inattendue de dossiers contenant des informations sur la fouille et des indications sur leur emplacement dans une partie éloignée des entrepôts du musée lors d'une fouille des Brigataes.

Le géant de 24 mètres était exposé au musée archéologique de Naples mais pendant très peu de temps, il est devenu si controversé qu'il a commencé à bouleverser les spécialistes de l'histoire officielle.
L'existence des restes du géant Cuma est actuellement inconnu.

Preface

The purpose of this book is to explore both the history and perceptions of the Undead, and whether legends concerning them have in their roots some form of reality. It also looks at how these perceptions have developed and deeply ingrained themselves within the human psyche. Through the years, both aspects have often become so inextricably intertwined that it is sometimes difficult to delineate the various strands that make up the beliefs and treat them separately. The concept of the Undead must be viewed as a cohesive whole. An understanding of such interconnected historical detail and perceptual development does not, therefore, readily lend itself to the piecemeal and fragmented entry system, which means that the reader has to "refer back" to other entries in order to understand the topic. So that full justice can be done to the areas considered, it has been decided not to follow what might be considered as the standard procedures for encyclopaedias or directories. Rather, the book follows a more "flowing" approach, so that the topic in question can be fully explored, but under a series of general subject headings that will guide the reader to the specific area which is being considered. In this way, we can get a much better picture of how perceptions of the Undead and supernatural creatures have grown and changed over the years. In this way, we feel that we can do the subjects covered a proper justice.

I am, nevertheless, well aware that some readers may require some form of listing in order to pick up on specialisms and topics of particular interest. To this end, I have placed a full A–Z listing at the back of the book. This approach, I hope, will give an ordered, comprehensive, and readable text whilst also providing specific points to which the reader can refer. I realize, of course, that this may not be the "normal approach" to such works but then, the subjects with which we are dealing are not "normal" either.

The concept of the Undead, and of the beings that haunt the deepest recesses of our minds, continue to both alternately terrify and fascinate us. They are complex, shifting entities, deriving their character and substance from a number of sources, both ancient and modern. I hope that, in both content and structure, this book has done them a frightening justice.

Introduction
A Carnival of Terrors

We see Agencies above the reach of our comprehension and things performed by Bodies seemingly Aerial, which surpass the strength, power, and capacity of the most robust Mortal.

—Richard Bovet, Pandaemonium

Stories concerning the Undead have always been with us. From out of the primal darkness of Mankind's earliest years, come whispers of eerie creatures, not quite alive (or alive in a way which we can understand), yet not quite dead either. These may have been ancient and primitive deities who dwelt deep in the surrounding forests and in remote places, or simply those deceased who refused to remain in their tombs and who wandered about the countryside, physically tormenting and frightening those who were still alive. Mostly they were ill-defined—strange sounds in the night beyond the comforting glow of the fire, or a shape, half-glimpsed in the twilight along the edge of an encampment. They were vague and indistinct, but they were always there with the power to terrify and disturb. They had the power to touch the minds of our early ancestors and to fill them with dread. Such fear formed the basis of the earliest tales although the source and exact nature of such terrors still remained very vague.

And as Mankind became more sophisticated, leaving the gloom of their caves and forming themselves into recognizable communities—towns, cities, whole cultures—so the Undead travelled with them, inhabiting their folklore just as they had in former times. Now they began to take on more definite shapes. They became walking cadavers; the physical embodiment of former deities and things which had existed alongside Man since the Creation. Some still remained vague and ill-defined but, as Mankind strove to explain the horror which it felt towards them, such creatures emerged more readily into the light.

In order to confirm their abnormal status, many of the Undead were often accorded attributes, which defied the natural order of things—the power to transform themselves into other shapes, the ability to sustain themselves by drinking human blood, and the ability to influence human minds across a distance. Such powers—described as supernatural—only leant an added dimension to the terror that humans felt regarding them.

And it was only natural, too, that the Undead should become connected with the practice of magic. From very early times, Shamans and witchdoctors had claimed at least some power and control over the spirits of departed ancestors, and this has continued down into more "civilized" times. Formerly, the invisible spirits and forces that thronged around men's earliest encampments, had spoken "through" the tribal Shamans but now, as entities in their own right, they were subject to magical control and could be physically summoned by a competent sorcerer. However, the relationship between the magician and an Undead creature was often a very tenuous and uncertain one. Some sorcerers might have even become Undead entities once they died, but they might also have been susceptible to the powers of other magicians when they did.

From the Middle ages and into the Age of Enlightenment, theories of the Undead continued to grow and develop. Their names became more familiar—werewolf, vampire, ghoul—each one certain to strike fear into the hearts of ordinary humans. They were no less fearsome than the vague, shapeless entities that had circled the fires of ancient people—only now they had a form and a definition. Now, they were set within a context of fear. And they reflected some of the cultural attributes of those who believed in them—the Semite, the European, the African, and later the West Indian. Thus, golems, afreets, zombies, djinni, and draugr wandered by night (and sometimes by day) causing fear wherever they passed. As in earlier times, they may have been seen as the physical manifestations of old gods and powers or the walking dead—those who lay in the churchyards. They also included demons—beings that had never been truly born but yet included elements of both the living and the dead. Is it any wonder, therefore, that such a caravan of horrors traversed the world on a daily and nightly basis? Such undead beings appeared everywhere and in all cultures.

The purpose of this book is to detail at least some of the entities previously mentioned and to examine their possible origins. It is not meant to dismiss them as fearsome beings, nor to explain them away, nor to deny the horror that they generate. Rather it attempts to present a picture of terrible entities that have frightened Mankind across the years, that have shaped common nightmares, and have inspired the darker elements of the literary imagination. It seeks to celebrate that which lurks in the shadows or which gazes from the darkness at the solitary passerby with a frenzied and hungry eye.

Look behind you down the darkened street! Is that a movement beyond the furthest streetlight? Peer out of your window into the gloom! Was that something, half-glimpsed, that moved away as you did so? Listen! Was that a cry or a voice speaking from amongst the shadows of the hallway? The ancient horrors of the Undead are perhaps far nearer than we would care to imagine. Turn the pages of this book, if you dare, and discover just what might be lurking out there in the gathering darkness.

Vampires

Robert the younger died and was buried in the churchyard, but used to go forth from the grave at night and disturb and frighten the villagers, and the village dogs would follow him, barking mightily.

—M. R. James,
Twelve Medieval Ghost Stories

Arguably no monster has imbedded itself so deeply in the human psyche than the vampire. The very word has the power to conjure up visions of ruined castles, perched on a crag somewhere amongst the Carpathian Mountains of Eastern Europe; of tall and saturnine Romanian noblemen, swathed in dark cloaks; and of terrified peasantry huddled in forest-bound huts and villages holding crucifixes or adorning themselves with garlic. The term is also suggestive of ruined churches, opened coffins, and wooden stakes. All this is, of course, the stock Hollywood image of the vampire that has been fed to us through the years by various celluloid representations. But how much of it is true? Just how accurate is our idea of this most familiar of monsters?

The idea of the vampire most probably has part of its origins in the ancient perceptions of the restless dead. These have been blended with stories of other night terrors to form the vampire motif with which we are all so familiar. Coupled with this are notions of how the dead conducted themselves and conduct how they interact with and react to the living.

Greece

During the Classical Greek Homeric period, (8th–7th centuries B.C.), the spirits of those who died in bed or who were slain in battle went flittering away like bats to some unspecified and hazy afterlife, usually known as Hades, to remain there forever. They spent their time murmuring quietly to each other in the eternal darkness, perhaps arguing over family pedigrees, giving endless descriptions of famous battles, complaining about unresolved wrongs in their former life, or simply making comments on the place in which they found themselves. They took little or no interest in the everyday world in which the living existed. Indeed, some perceptions from this period concerning the dead claimed that they actually forgot their existence in the world of the living and spent eternity drifting listlessly about along the shores of underground rivers—namely the Styx and the Lethe, murmuring and complaining to themselves.

River Lethe

It is said that as soon as the dead inhaled the fumes of the River Lethe, they forgot their former lives and became torpid and sluggish—giving us the words lethargy and lethargic today. This fits with the concepts of the Afterlife in some other ancient cultures. For instance, the early Semites believed that Sheol (the Hebrew Afterworld) was a dank and misty place through which the spirits of the dead wandered aimlessly, only dimly able to recall any aspect of their former lives. They were largely harmless, ineffectual entities about whom the living were not terribly bothered and who, in general did not interact at all with the material world. They might be called back through magical rites in order to pronounce on some aspect of their former world, such as when the spirit of Samuel was summoned to prophesy for King Saul by the Witch of Endor, a medium who dwelt in the country between Mount Tabor and the Hill of Moreh—but generally they were left to their own dark existence.

However, by the time Socrates was forced by the Athenian authorities to drink the hemlock that killed him in 399 B.C., the perception of the dead had changed dramatically, at least in Classical Greece. No longer were they the compliant, ineffective spirits; they were now robust and active, wandering about burial grounds late at night and making their presence known. They shouted abuse, they tormented and terrorized passersby, and they sometimes attacked the living and even killed them. They could threaten their descendants and maim former neighbours. Rather than ignoring the spirits as they had done in former years, the living now feared them. These returning spectres were not the insubstantial, wafting shades of Victorian melodrama with which we are familiar; rather these were the corporeal, substantial figures that they had been in real life. They crossed between the world of the dead and the world of the living for various reasons: to harangue their descendants for some misdemeanour (real or imagined); to claim conjugal rights; to complete unfinished business left over from their time in the living world; to offer often unwanted advice, to take revenge on those whom they disliked, despised, or who had done them wrong; or simply to cause trouble amongst those who survived them. Such a trouble did these returning phantoms present that the officials in some of the Greek city states viewed with intense suspicion the Cults of the Dead and the Cults of ancient Heroes who worshipped the honoured dead within their precincts.

Not only did these phantoms appear during the hours of darkness (although this was their favoured time in order to terrify people) but they also revealed themselves during the day, particularly at mid-day, which was an especially auspicious time as morning passed into afternoon. And as the years passed, such appearances often became more dangerous and malevolent as perceptions of the dead amongst the Classical cultures gradually began to change.

Coupled with the returning dead, there were other terrors that made the blood of the Greeks run cold. Many of them also ventured out during the hours of darkness and many of them maliciously attacked the living or sought to do them some harm. One of these horrors was Hecate.

Hecate

Hecate enjoys something of an ambivalent and confusing position because it is not extremely clear as to whether she was considered a night-demon or a dark goddess. Although some Greeks referred to her as Hecate, others knew her as Aragriope, meaning "savage face" hinting at a far older entity. She was the daughter of the Titans (giants) Perses and Asteria, although others record her parents as Zeus and Scylla (a nymph who was turned into a sea-monster by the enchantress Circe, devouring all mariners who passed by her rock). She was also considered to be the dark side of the goddesses Artemis, Selene (the moon goddess), and Diana and was regarded as the Queen of the Ghostworld and matriarch of all witches; the mistress of chthonic rites and black magic. As soon as it was dark, she emerged from the Underworld to do harm to those against whom she had taken spite against. In this she was accompanied by many other foul and dangerous creatures, denizens of the Phantom world over which she ruled. These were simply known to the Greeks as "The Companions" but they comprised a legion of hideous goblins and "watchers of the night"—ill-defined terrors, some of which may have had an appetite for human blood. As she passed their houses, Hecate induced nightmares and night fevers, which sapped the strength of many sleepers, leaving them tired and listless in the morning.

Mormo

Amongst her "Companions" were Mormo, terrible shadowy entity who was frequently used by Greek mothers to frighten unruly children, and the Empusas, hideous and terrifying beings that exhibited many of the characteristics that we now associate with vampires. Whilst Hecate passed by, these horrific entities would often enter the houses of the living in order to attack the sleepers, particularly small children and the old and frail. This phantom could take a thousand different shapes, each one, the Greeks believed, more horrid and loathlsome than the last. The writer Aristophanes declared that such a creature was "clothed all about with blood and boils and blisters" and described it as "a foul vampire."

Lamia

Besides Hecate and her hellish entourage, there were other creatures that stalked the Grecian night, terrifying sleepers and harming them as they rested. Such a being was the Lamia, who usually killed small children and attacked sleeping men. Similar to Hecate, the Lamia had her origins in Classical folklore and legend. She was, according to tradition, the daughter of Belus and Libya and was a beautiful queen of the Libyan country. She was in fact so beautiful that the god Zeus fell in love with her and visited her nightly. She bore him a number of children, angering Zeus's wife, the goddess Hera. In anger Hera slew all her children, driving Lamia mad and sending her to live in the caves of the desert. Soon her fabled beauty had drained away and she became an old and monstrous woman who preyed on small children, in retaliation for the loss of her own. Under cover of darkness she travelled between the Greek houses, killing whatever infants she could find and devouring their flesh. She had become almost similar to a wild animal and the mere mention of her name struck terror into the heart of every mother. The Lamia attacked the old who were unlikely to defend themselves and, in the guise of a beautiful woman (which she was magically able to generate), she copulated with men as they slept. The Lamia, it was said, was actually fuelled by unholy lusts. She drew the semen and bodily fluids, upon which she subsisted, from male sleepers, leaving them tired and exhausted in the morning.

Cercopes

The Greeks also believed that the darkness brought out beings known as Cercopes. These were malicious and malignant goblins that followed in the wake of both Hecate and the Lamia with the intent of doing harm. Plunder and thievery were their speciality, but they were also known to drink the blood of young children, which they drank from the arms and legs of sleeping infants. They were small, squat, and swift, and were incredibly dangerous if cornered. They went in and out of the Greek houses at will. With all of these monsters and the continual threat of the returning, antagonistic dead, it is a wonder that the Greek people got any sleep at all!

Rome

Many of these terrors transferred themselves to the later Roman culture. There were, however, certain additions to the carnival of monsters that emerged after the sun had gone down. For example, there were the Roman Striges.

Striges

The name Striges came from a Latin word meaning "screech-owl," and would later come to mean a "witch or evil sorceress." It was also a term of abuse for an ugly old woman. However, in their original form, the Striges were horrors that sometimes visited humans after dark. They had the faces of ancient women but the bodies of vultures, with large and ungainly breasts that were full of poisonous milk. Their claws dripped filth and were poisonous to the touch. Most interestingly, some traditions said that these creatures subsisted upon blood, whether it was the blood of animals or humans, and this was the reason for visiting humans as they rested. The idea of the blood-drinking night visitor or vampire was already starting to take shape. Not only did the Striges attack sleepers, they also spread plague and disease through the filth on their claws—the spreading of sickness would also become a characteristic of early vampirism and would remain a belief in some Western cultures to this day.

Incubi/Succubi

Other horrific night visitors that might also prey on Roman sleepers were the incubi and succubi In some cases, these two were said to be differing aspects of the same demon. But it was generally held that the incubi was male whilst the other, much more prolific and dangerous succubus, was female. The name succubus probably comes from the Latin succubare, meaning "to lie under" and it is possible that the demon was a variant of the Greek Mormo, who was sometimes considered to be both female and sexually voracious. Indeed, it was a sexually voracious appetite that characterised both the incubus and the succubus. Both demons (or various aspects of the one demon) had sexual intercourse with men and women as they slept. The succubus in particular drew the seed from sleeping men, sexually exhausting them, and might have even done so to do them harm. Although initially a terror in ancient Rome, the succubus was to assume greater attention in the early Christian period right through to the Middle Ages, when the demon was thought to plague monks in order to distract them from their holy vows. Monks often experienced erotic dreams and nocturnal emissions, which were credited to the attentions of the succubus during the night. In his Compendium Maleficarum, written some time in the 16th century, the Milanese monk and demonologist Francesco Maria Guazzo details succubi in his list of demons that torment the righteous. He states that these dreams are in fact real and the experiences of the monks, in the throes of their eroticism, were due to a completely physical manifestation of the demon whose desire was not only to break their vows of chastity but to do them actual harm. Guazzo was following the categories of demons, which had been established by the Byzantine thinker, Michael Psellus the Younger. It is thought that Psellus was born around 1018 in the city of Nicodema (now Izmit on the Gulf of Astacus) and that, as a child, he had been exposed to both Greek and Roman culture. Although more associated with the Platonist school of thought, Psellus did outline certain categories of demons, one of which was "terrors of the night" which included beings that both extracted semen and drank blood. This would undoubtedly prove the inspiration for Guazzo many centuries later.

Sumeria

The notion of the predatory spirit, especially a female spirit, found echoes in other cultures, especially the early Sumerian. Here there was a widespread belief in the demoness Lilith, who had allegedly been the first wife of Adam.

Lilith

During the 3rd century B.C. in Sumer, Lilith was known as Lil, the winged storm spirit, or spirit of vengeance. As such, she was greatly feared. This terror seems to have percolated down from ancient Sumeria into the early Hebrew tradition. The Semitic Zohar, or Book of Splendour (part of the Kabbalah and written around the 13th century allegedly using extremely ancient sources), states that she was born out of the k'lifah, "the membrane for the marrow" which in turn had been born out of the Primordial Light. It was the first century Talmudic scholar Jerimia ben Eleazar who linked Lilith with Adam, claiming that when he had been expelled from the Garden of Eden, he got on with the demoness in the wilderness and had "begot many ghosts and demons" who were called liln or lilm. These creatures accompanied Lilith on her nightly travels, just as "The Companions" had accompanied Hecate in ancient Greece, entering houses and attacking those within. Also in the second century, Rabbi Hanina ben Dosa stated: "One may not sleep alone in a house, for whoever sleeps alone in a house is seized by Lilith." The entity then, was strongly associated with attacks on the lonely and the vulnerable. There was a strong sexual element here as well, as the demon also sought intercourse with whoever it attacked—very much in the style of the succubus. In the morning, victims were found, exhausted and drained—some were even dead—setting the tone for later vampiric entities that absorbed energy, semen, or blood.

Ancient Slavic

Further notions of predatory nocturnal creatures were to be found in ancient Slavic beliefs. At night, sleeping men were visited by the rusalka, a water spirit that sometimes mated with humans. Although largely benign, this being was driven by powerful erotic impulses and was an insatiable lover. She physically drained those whom she encountered, sapping their youth and vitality and leaving them as old and withered husks.

Draugr

As the centuries passed, these ancient terrors began to merge with perceptions of the angry and volatile dead from other cultures. Viking belief, for instance, maintained the notion of a draugr, a corporeal revenant who wandered about the countryside, performing acts of great violence against former associates or against those whom it encountered. Many of these dead lay within tomb-like barrows which were scattered across the Scandinavian landscape. These resembled houses in which the dead might "live" and from which they would venture forth, during the hours of darkness, to engage in wicked acts.

Although many of the tales concerning draugr are thought to have originated in Iceland, they soon became known across the Nordic world and even further afield. There are accounts of them from Britain and France, recounted in both Latin and Anglo-Saxon script. From these coffin mounds, the spectres hurled abuse at passers-by and often pelted them with stones. And they attached themselves to any house that had been erected nearby, terrorising the inhabitants by appearing in front of them as soon as it was dark. The Icelandic Laxdoela Saga, written around the 13th century (although the contents reflect much earlier fragmentary writings), includes the story of one Hrapp, who wandered from his howe (tomb) each night, to create mayhem in the district and even to kill several of his former servants. The Eyrbyggia Saga, written at the monastery of Helgalfel, around the middle of the 14th century, recounts the story of the vicious ghost of Thorolf Halt-foot who, together with a group of Undead companions, terrorized and devastated the country round about his burial chamber. Many of the stories concerning them reflected the earlier tales of the unquiet dead of Greece and Rome. However, a certain Christian element, asserting the superiority of the Church, was now beginning to creep into Western stories of the restless dead.

For example, around 500 A.D., there is a record of a famous encounter in a haunted house by Bishop Germanus—a place frequented by a spectre who was especially violent. The account of this is given by Constantineus, a near contemporary of Germanus that hints back to the malicious ghosts of ancient Greece and Rome. The Bishop of Auxerre in France, whilst on an important journey with his retinue, was overtaken by darkness and sought shelter in a rather disreputable hovel, which locals said was haunted. As the party settled down for the night, they were suddenly disturbed by a horrific and malevolent apparition that rose up out of the ground in front of them and proceeded to pelt them with stones. The Bishop begged the ghost to desist but it hurled abuse at them and began to pummel them with handfuls of earth. Germanus called on the ghost to stop in the Name of God and, at the mention of the holy name, it ceased its violence and became very humble. It revealed its true form: the spirit of an evil man who had been buried there without the proper rites of the Church. The Bishop asked it to show where its bones were buried and instructed a grave to be dug. The bones were interred; the Bishop said special prayers and the hovel was no longer haunted. In this tale, the Church showed its power over the unquiet dead.

In fact, subsequent Christian folklore concerning the dead now increasingly emphasised the triumph of the forces of virtue over wandering cadavers. Those who died within the bosom of the Church were especially blessed, even though they were deceased and did not experience the anger or violence which beset those who had passed away unshriven. Much was made of a popular tale recounted by the early Christian writer Evagrius Ponticus (345–399 A.D.). The story concerns a certain holy Anchorite named Thomas who died in a suburb of the city of Antioch. Being destitute and having no possessions, the hermit was buried in a portion of the city's burying-grounds reserved for beggars and paupers. The following morning, however, it was found that the corpse had clawed its way through the earth and made its way to a mausoleum in the richest part of the cemetery. There it had laid itself down to rest. It was immediately removed and re-interred but the same thing happened on the following morning and it was noted that there were disturbances in several other graves around the area. The people summoned the patriarch Ephriam, who recommended that the body be carried in triumph to the city and placed in a shrine, with a special service to be held in honour of the Anchorite in the local church. Whether this was designed to exalt the hermit and to prevent him from walking about or to keep other cadavers in their graves is unclear. Similar stories exist concerning the lives of other hermits, monks, bishops, and saints. St. Macarius of Egypt, for instance, is said to have raised a man from his grave to testify to the innocence of a monk accused of killing him. The History of the Franks, speculated to be written by a group of monks, states how St. Injurieux, a notable senator of Clermont in Auvergne, rose from his tomb and went to lie with his wife Scholastica in an adjoining grave.

Celtic

Ancient stories of the restless dead and of the night terrors that wandered about as soon as darkness settled over the land gradually fused together to create legends of hostile cadavers who left their tombs in order to attack the living. In many of these legends, blood played a significant part. Blood, after all, had been recognized since the time of the Roman physician Galen as one of the central "humours" of the body—the life force without which none could live. It was also a source of heat which warmed the body—fevers, Galen taught, were brought about by a surplus of blood, which is why ancient and some early modern physicians bled their patients or applied leeches to suck the blood from them. After a time in the cold earth of the grave, it was suggested that corpses were in need of the warmth of blood to restore them to a semblance of vitality. Moreover, because their veins and arteries were seemingly withered and shrivelled after death, they needed blood coursing through their dead bodies to restore even a semblance of life. Initially it was perceived that such cadavers might take the blood of animals that they encountered, but later it was thought that they might look towards nearby humans for some form of vile sustenance.

The Yorkshire churchman and writer, William of Newburgh (1136–98 A.D.), tells of a revenant in Buckinghamshire, England, that created much restlessness amongst a cowherd, despite the attentions of several watchmen. It returned night after night, unsettling the animals in the byre in which they were kept and around a nearby house. Although not stated, the implication was that the revenant was trying to drink the blood of these cattle. It further entered the house where it had once lived and attempted to lie in bed with its former wife whom William describes as "an honourable woman." The matter was eventually placed in front of the Bishop, whose advisors suggested exhuming the body and cremating it. The Bishop himself, however, was opposed to this—it sounded too much like sacrilege—and instead advised opening the grave and placing a scroll of absolution on the chest of the corpse. This appeared to have the desired effect and the dead man walked no more.

William goes on to recount similar stories—such as that of the ghost in Berwrick on the Scottish borders, which (with the help of Satan himself, says William) wandered nightly from its tomb, attacking those who slept in the town beyond. At daybreak, the cadaver would return to its tomb to rest before rising to recommence its nocturnal attacks. In addition to the attacks, the wandering corpse spread disease and sickness throughout the entire countryside. In the end, ten sturdy men dug up the body, which was then dismembered and burned.

Later, however, a greater part of the population of Berwick was carried off by a great pestilence, which it was assumed, was Satan wreaking revenge on the town for its destruction of his agent.

William's tale may have given rise to a later legend that purportedly comes from Annandale, also in southern Scotland, and dates from the early 14th century. In this, the Scottish king, Robert the Bruce (Robert I) visited a local lord and whilst he was there, a wretched man was brought before the lord for poaching. The lord sentenced him to death, but the king, being in a good mood, commuted the sentence and pardoned the poacher. Robert then left the area and the local lord, in violation of the king's wishes, had the man rearrested and executed. From then on, the region was troubled by the man's walking corpse. This cadaver not only drank the blood of those whom it savaged but spread a virulent plague in its wake. Churchmen were brought in to lay the body to rest but to no avail. In the end, the matter reached the ears of King Robert, who returned to the area and punished the local lord for his disobedience of his Majesty's commands. On King Robert's instructions, the cadaver of the executed man was exhumed from its grave, cut to pieces, and burned. The village was not troubled again. The site where these events occurred was said to have been very close to Berwick and it is possible that one tale may have influenced the other.

Some variants of the story, however, state that it was the Bruces' themselves who were the perpetrators of the heinous act and place responsibility fore the hanging of the unfortunate man on Robert I's father—also named Robert but known as "The Competitor." This occurrence is said to have taken place in the village of Annan in Dumfries and Galloway, and was carried out in 1138 A.D. against the wishes of a visiting saint—St. Malachy O'More, Bishop of Armagh, in the north of Ireland. When he found out what had happened, the saint cursed the Bruces in anger and the dead man rose from his grave and wandered the countryside, drinking the blood of cattle and spreading plague and disease wherever he went. In the end, he was pinned down by two knights who, intriguingly, drove a javelin through his heart before they burned him. The curse of St. Malachy—"the finger of God"—lingered with the Bruces in the shape of a disease. Robert I's father suffered from leprosy and spent the last years of his life as a virtual recluse.

Leanan Shee

The story may also have had some connection with an ancient Celtic fairy belief. Stories of blood-drinking or energy-sapping fairies (usually female) had existed in both Scotland and Ireland since the earliest times. In Ireland one such being was known as the Leanan Shee (the fairy mistress), a creature with a special affinity for humans. She was drawn to warriors and poets and often magically provided prowess for the former and inspiration for the latter. But her attentions came at a price. As she made love to the warrior or poet whose mistress she inevitably became, she drew both the strength and life from them in the manner of the ancient Roman succubus. In the end, they were little more than an empty husk, which the fairy then discarded in favour of another lover. Although the Leanan Shee did not actually drink blood, there were other Irish fairies that were said to do so. Some were said to dwell in the Magillycuddy Reeks in County Kerry in the very south of Ireland. In a lecture given at Trinity College in Dublin in 1963, the former Archivist of the Irish Folklore Commission (a Government-sponsored body set up to preserve Irish tradition), Sean O'Sullivan, (himself a Kerryman) stated that he'd heard of a castle guarding a mountain pass, high in the Reeks, that was inhabited by blood-drinking fairy creatures. The name of this place was Dun Dreach-fhoula, significantly pronounced Drac-ola, and meaning "the fort of evil blood," sometimes translated as "the fort of the blood visage." Unfortunately, O'Sullivan did not make any further reference to the location of the place either in his lectures or books. For instance, it does not appear in his most famous book, Irish Wake Amusements—and he died without ever revealing where it might be. Several academics have tried to locate it but even the most minute examination of the sites of the Barony of Kilkerron in which the Reeks lie reveals nothing. And yet tales of blood drinking and flesh eating persisted in the region well into the 20th century. In the 1930s, a collector for the Irish Folklore Commission, Tim Murphy, detailed a story from the remote mountain parish of Sneem in County Kerry that contained vampiric references. A farmer in the area had married a woman who was said to have fairy connections, who refused to eat any food that was cooked in the house but at night, would rise from her bed and go to the local cemetery where she dug up the bodies, drank the blood, and consumed the flesh. The husband followed her to the churchyard where he confronted her as a vampire. "You would not eat the good meat or drink the good beer at your own table but you would come here at night to eat this foul dinner," he told her. At this point, Murphy's story became confusing and mixed with another tale and the fate of this vampire was unclear. However, it was apparently representative of a number of stories from that isolated upland parish and from the region in general.

Abhartach

An even older tale, supposedly dating from the 5th or 6th centuries, also comes from Ireland. This is the legend of Abhartach, which comes from what is now County Derry in the north of the country. Abhartach was allegedly an ancient ruler of a small kingdom that bordered upon what is now the town of Garvagh. He was small (possibly deformed) but said to be a mighty magician and a tyrannical monarch. He was hated by his subjects who wished to be rid of him, but were too frightened to kill him themselves because of his alleged magic powers. They brought another chieftain named Cathain from a neighbouring kingdom to do the job for them. Cathain killed the tyrant and buried him standing up as befitted a Celtic chieftain. But the next day, Abhartach was back, demanding a bowl of blood from the wrists of his subjects in order, says the tale, to "sustain his vile corpse." Cathain came again, killed him, and reburied him, but the next day the dreadful cadaver was back, demanding the same gory tribute. Cathain then consulted with either the druids (Pagan holy men) or an early Christian saint (depending on what version of the story is told) as to why this should be. He was told that Abhartach wasn't completely dead, nor could he be killed, because of his magic powers. He was one of the marbh bheo (walking dead) who would torment his people unless he was suspended. Cathain could do this by killing him with a sword made of yew wood, burying him upside down, placing thorns around his grace, and a great stone directly on top of him. Cathain did all this, even going so far as to build a leacht or sepulchre over the gravesite. This monument gave the townland outside Garvagh its name—Slaghtaverty (Abhartach's leacht). Today, the sepulchre is gone, although it is said that one massive capstone remains over the actual burial site. A tree has grown there, too—supposedly from the original thorns, although this growth is much younger. The land around is considered "bad ground" and has changed ownership several times and few locals will approach the place after dark, even today. In the region they still talk about "the man who was buried three times."

The previous story was at one time extremely well known throughout Ireland. Although most probably a folk legend, it was written down as actual history in Dr. Geoffrey Keating's Foras Feasa ar Eireann (A General History of Ireland) between 1620 and 1631, perhaps making it the oldest written vampire story in Western Europe. It was later reprinted in 1880 in A History of Ireland by Patrick Weston Joyce and, it has been suggested, the Celtic chieftain Abhartach may have been the prototype for Bram Stoker's classic vampire figure, Dracula. It should be borne in mind that the two most famous vampire stories—Dracula and Carmilla, were both written by Irishmen, Bram Stoker and Sheridan Le Fanu respectively.

Glestigs

Tales of blood-drinking fairies and cadaverous Celtic chieftains have made their way into Scottish folklore as well. Stories from the Western Isles of the Hebrides spoke of fairies that drank both the milk and the blood of cattle. These ancient sprites were often attached to ancient tumuli—the graves of prehistoric peoples with whom they were often associated. Creatures known as glestigs often inhabited such places or the ruins of former castles and abbeys, luring in passers-by by calling out to them and then attacking them. In some cases they were also known to drink the blood of passing wayfarers.

Banshee

Also in the Highlands, beings known as the Baobhan Sith annoyed, tormented, and sometimes killed shepherds and herders as they tended their flocks in their shielings (shelters) on the high moors. The name simply means "spirit woman" and refers to a type of fairy whose roots go back into the mists of antiquity. She (and the fairy always appeared to be female) was the last representative of a goat-footed race that had lived in the Highlands before the time of true men and she had a passion for human blood. The Baobhan

Sith was also a shapeshifter and could approach her victims, usually lonely herders, in the guise of their wives or sweethearts whom they had left behind. When alone, the creature revealed its true nature and drank their blood. In her book, The Supernatural Highlands, Francis Thompson recounts a tale of three hunters who were beset by these vampires in the hills around Kintail. Having had a disappointing day during which they had caught nothing, they passed the night in a lonely hut, high up in a glen. Whilst one of them played on a trump (Jews harp) to pass the time, another languidly wished aloud that their wives and sweethearts could be with them in these desolate hills. Almost at once, the door of the hut opened and three women came in who, in the dim light, resembled those women, and who sat down with two of them beside the fire. The musician, very uncertain, kept to his own side of the blaze. The other two sat with the women, talking softly with their sweethearts whispering into their ears. In the uncertain light, the musician saw to his horror a stream of blood snaking across the floor. And as he squinted more closely in the murky light, he saw that the feet of the women on the other side of the fire resembled those of a goat or deer. With a cry, he leapt to his feet and dashed from the hut. Running across the hills, he heard the women pursue him. One said: "Dhith sibha'ur curhaich fain ach dh'thag mo curhaich fein mise" ("You ate your own victims, but mine escaped from me"). At last he made it to the door of a mountain cottage and was taken in. The following morning, he returned with some other men to the hut where he found the bodies of his two companions, strangled, broken, and drained of blood. It was well-known, he was told, that the gloomy glens of Kintail were home to vampires and blood-drinking fairies.

Fairies, it was believed in many parts of the Celtic world, could also sometimes reanimate dead bodies and use them for their own purposes—often to torment the living. For this reason, the bier upon which a body was borne to the graveyard was sometimes ritually smashed before the mourners left the churchyard. In this way, it was thought malefic spirits were prevented from taking over the corpse of the recently interred. There are stories of this being done, right up until the early 20th century, in places such as Islay in the Western Isles of Scotland and in Counties Roscommon and Carlow in Ireland.

Italy

It was not only in the Celtic world that tales of animated corpses were told. In Italy, there were, in some areas, legends of people who quite simply, "refused to die," although their bodily functions were deemed to have stopped. A popular Roman tale tells that in 1583, the fourteen-year-old son of a prince of the city, Fabrizio Massimo, died of an unexplained fever. However, after he'd been buried, the boy was seen again but his appearance seemed to be accompanied by a bout of sickness or plague that swept through certain sectors of the city. Although the apparition did not drink blood, death accompanied each of its visitations. The Roman people became seriously alarmed and the boy's family summoned a holy man, St. Philip Neri, to investigate the appearance. The holy man went straight to the boy's tomb and opened it, finding the child's corpse in a perfect state of preservation although he had been dead for some time. St. Philip, laid a hand on the cadaver's forehead, and immediately the boy sat up and opened his eyes. "Are you unwilling to die?" asked the saint. "No," replied the youth. "Are you resigned to yield up your soul?" continued the holy man. "I am," came the answer. "Then go!" commanded St. Philip and he blessed the body whereupon the youth fell back with a serene look upon his face and expired for a second time. The city was troubled no more, either by the apparition or by the plague.

A similar, earlier story is told regarding the 6th century Byzantine saint, Theodosius the Cenobite, as recounted by Theodore of Petra. One of the Brethren at Theodosius's monastery, a monk named Basil, died and was laid in his tomb. But from time to time, several of the other Brothers saw him at prayer in the chapel. Some even heard the sound of his voice as he prayed, whilst others saw him in his accustomed place among the choir stalls. Coupled with these visions, periodic sicknesses swept through the holy house. The monks consulted with St. Theodosius, who suggested prayer and fasting. He himself prayed earnestly and continually that the apparition might be relieved and, according to the legend, on one evening during a service, all the monks saw the vision of Basil. The phantom advised them that, because of their prayers (especially those of the saint himself), that it would now depart from them to the Afterlife and that forthwith, the illnesses that had raged amongst them would cease. He offered them the blessing "God be with, my father and my Brethren" and he vanished from their sight. Shortly afterwards the sicknesses passed and the monastery was not troubled again.

Eastern Europe

It is, perhaps, amongst the Slavic and East European peoples that the notion of the vampire seems to have gained hold. Indeed, the word itself may come from an ancient Turkish word, oubir, that meant "a witch or malignant sorcerer." Others have argued that it comes from an obscure Greek word meaning "to drink."

It is thought that belief in the walking dead—cadavers who did not necessarily drink blood but may have done so—was fairly widespread. There was also a belief that for every vampire that was created, there was also someone born who could slay it. Thus in the late 13th century, vampire hunters flourished in various parts of central and Eastern Europe adding to the myth. In fact, the situation grew so bad that during the reign of Wenceslaus III, King of Hungary (1301–1305) and King of Bohemia (1305–1306), an edict was issued forbidding the digging up of graveyards in order to "slay" malefic corpses. Bohemia was a country that occupied most of what is now the Central and Western Czech Republic.

The Shoemaker of Silesia

One of the earliest tales from the region concerns "The Shoemaker of Silesia" and is dated from around the year 1591. Silesia is now to be found within the borders of present-day Poland and was inhabited by Slavic peoples. The shoemaker dwelt in one of its major towns and sometime in September 1591, he committed suicide in a neighbour's garden by cutting his throat with his shoemaker's knife. Because the sin was so grievous, his wife and family put it about the locality that he had died from some unknown disease. All the same, a number of busybodies put it about that there was more to the shoemaker's death than first appeared and the authorities decided to investigate.

Spectrum

Whilst these deliberations were going on, the shoemaker himself appeared, or at least some shape, (called a "Spectrum" in the account) resembling him did. And it did not only appear at night but in the middle of the day as well. It wandered about the town, visiting houses when it pleased. Those who were sleeping were tormented by terrible dreams in which the figure of the shoemaker was featured prominently and those who were waking did so to find what seemed to be a heavy weight upon them, which was taken to be the shoemaker, albeit in an invisible state. There were perpetual complaints resonating all through the town. Of course, these appearances and experiences highlighted the memory of the shoemaker and raised further questions about his death, which his widow, family, and friends sought to suppress. So great did the horror become that the town officials considered digging up the shoemaker's corpse in order to inspect it. Terrified that it would now be disclosed as to how he met his end, his widow and sons begged the Council not to proceed, adding that they intended to apply to the Emperor's court for a ruling on the matter. However, the apparition became bolder—appearing by people's bedsides as soon as they lay down, or else lying down beside them and seeking to suffocate them with its attentions. It also struck them and pinched at their skin, drawing blood on some occasions. In the morning, the bruises and cuts and sometimes the marks of fingers about their throats were plain to see. The authorities could no longer ignore this situation and the Magistrate gave instructions that the body should be exhumed.

By this time, he had been in the ground for about eight months—from 22nd September 1591 to 18th April 1592. Yet when he was exhumed, his body was found to be "uncorrupted and not at all putrid" even though his burial clothes had already rotted. Not only this, but his hair, fingernails, and toenails had continued to grow whilst in the grave. Examining the body, a local Magistrate found what appeared to be a magical mark on the big toe of his right foot in the shape of a rose. The wound on his throat still gaped but had not become infected and his limbs and joints were as supple as the day he was buried.

His body was not reburied but was kept lying in the open from the 18th to the 24th of April and was inspected daily by the townspeople. His nightly wanderings did not cease, however, and many were still troubled by his nightly visitations. Nor did the corpse appear to decay in any way. In consternation, the people of the town buried him once more, this time under the local gallows in the hope that this would in some way restrain him, but it didn't. Neighbours were even more disturbed by the visitations of the Spectrum, which pinched them and tried to crush them, leaving them with blue and black marks all over their bodies. In the end, the shoemaker's wife went to a local magistrate and told him to do whatever was necessary to lay her husband's unquiet spirit to rest. The body was once again dug up from beneath the gallows and its head and legs were struck off with the blade of a spade (it was noted that it had grown even fleshier and seemed to have put on a little weight), its back was ripped open, and its heart was pulled out. To the horror of those around, the heart seemed very fresh and full of blood and appeared to pulse slightly, similar to the heart of a living man. All this, together with the rest of the body was placed on a pile of wood and was burned to ashes, which were then placed in a sack and dumped in a nearby river. This, the local people hoped, would be the end of the matter. But there were still more horrors to come.

A girl from the same town had died shortly after the shoemaker, after allegedly being visited by the Spectrum. Eight days afterward, she appeared to a fellow servant as she lay in bed and lay across her in an attempt to crush her. She then attacked an infant lying in its cot, and would have made off with it had a nurse not arrived at an opportune moment and saved it by calling out in the Name of Jesus, whereupon the spectre vanished. However, she continued to appear in various guises, including that of a hen. When one of the other maids decided to follow her back to the grave and see if it was indeed their former colleague, the hen grew to a monstrous size and grabbed her by the throat. The dead girl continued to terrorize the town for a whole month in various shapes: a dog, a goat, a cat, and an old woman. It was assumed by the local magistrates that the scourge of the Undead had been passed on from her encounter with the shoemaker's Spectrum. Her body was also dug up and burned and the spectral occurrences ceased.

The shoemaker of Silesia was only one of the alleged vampiric cases that began to manifest themselves into the culture of Central and Eastern Europe.

As the 17th century wore on, there were a number of further instances scattered across the towns and villages of Hungary and what is now the Czech Republic. Wandering ghosts, sometimes in the shapes of animals, and those who had died without the Sacraments, or who had died having committed some sin, roamed abroad, tormenting their neighbours and attacking their livestock. And in the dawn of the Enlightened 18th century, men of learning began to turn their attention in the direction of vampires, considering whether or not they in fact existed, just as they did with the notion of witches.

Magia Posthuma

One of the first considered reports on these apparitions was the treatise Magia posthuma, written in 1706 by Charles Ferdinand de Shertz. It was published in the town of Olmutz in Moravia and was dedicated to Prince Charles Joseph of Lorraine, Bishop of Olmutz and Osnabruk. Shertz, who was an eminent lawyer of his day, argued his case from a legalistic point of view. Concentrating on a number of cases, he came to the conclusion that so many trustworthy people had suffered from vampiric attentions that it was reasonable to assume that such creatures actually existed. In one of these cases—that of a herdsman—he noted that the ghost of the dead herder seemed able to exhaust his neighbours simply by loudly calling their name, suggesting that even the voice of the vampire had energy-sapping qualities. He also considered whether the body should be burned, and how the injuries which they inflicted upon the living should be dealt with.

Dissertatio de Uamparis Seruiensibus

Perhaps in response to Shertz's book (which was widely circulated), the number of instances of vampirism seemed to increase in Hungary and in surrounding districts. Indeed, during the early to mid-1700s, there was almost an epidemic, reminiscent of the days of Wenceslaus III. Such an epidemic appeared to reach its height in both Greater Serbia and in Hungary during the 1730s, prompting the thinker John Heinrich Zopfius to publish a further work on vampirism. The was in the form of a dissertation—Dissertatio de Uamparis Seruiensibus (published in 1733)—in which he painted lurid pictures of the dead rising from their graves to attack the living. Zopfus's work was only one of a plethora of such works issued from Germany, Italy, and England, as men of education turned their thoughts to a supposed vampire menace in Central and Eastern Europe. Such learned works included John Christian Stock's Dissetatio de cadaueribus sanguisgus (1732); Philip Rohr's De masticatione mortuorum (published in Leipzig in 1679) and John Christian Harenberg's Von Vampyren (1739). There were also many more. This corpus of vampire literature further included Cardinal Guieseppe Davenzatti, the Archbishop of Trani, whose work Dissertazione sopra I vampiri (1744) is regarded as the first major work by a churchman on the subject. The affairs and occurrences in Hungary and Moravia were now drawing the attention of the Vatican authorities, particularly that of Pope Benedict XIV. In 1746, the pontiff commissioned an enquiry into what was going on in Eastern Europe. The man he chose to conduct this investigation was a Frenchman by the name of Benedictine Dom Antoine Augustin Calmet (1672-1757). Calmet had a reputation both as a theologian and as a writer and his exegetical works had earned him a reputation far beyond the confines of the Catholic Church, although they have subsequently failed to stand the test of time. At the time of his appointment, he was a lecturer in theology at the abbey of Moyen-Moutier.

Calmet's brief was to investigate a number of occurrences in Hungary, Serbia, Bohemia, and Moravia; test their validity; and write a report, which would be forwarded to the Vatican. This report, presented in the form a treatise—Dissertation sur les Apparitions, anges des demons et les Espirits, et sur les revenants et Vampires de Hungarie, de Boheme, de Moravia et de Silese was received and subsequently printed in 1746.

Arnold Paole

There were a number of cases for Calmet to consider—particularly two rather famous stories that had been widely circulated. The first was the affair of one Arnold Paole, an ex-soldier from the district of Medvegia, in Serbia which was at that time part of the Austrian Empire. Paole had been a likeable, good-natured character who had gone off to serve in the Emperor's army in Turkish Serbia, returning home in 1727. He settled down as a farmer and became engaged to a local girl. However, his neighbours noticed that, since his return from the Army, his character had subtly changed. Although still extremely pleasant, he had become almost brooding and fearful, ready to jump at any shadow. He privately told his fiancée a strange story as an explanation. When stationed in Turkish Serbia, his regiment had been subject to the nightly attentions of a vampire. A group of men including Paole himself had been sent out to find the creature and destroy it. It was Paole who had located the creature's grave and who had dug it up, killing it after a brief struggle. However, in its death throes, the thing covered the young soldier in blood and grave earth. He had washed it away but ever after he still felt contaminated. He felt as though some unclean shadow was hanging over him and that something was watching him as he went about his work. His fiancée told him not to be foolish, but Paole's gloomy attitude continued. A week after the confession, he was killed in a fall from a cart and was quickly buried in the local cemetery.

Three weeks later, a number of people complained of seeing Arnold Paole about the town and several said that he had come into their bedrooms at night for some unspecified purpose. Shortly after, four of these complainants died from an unknown disease. The ghost of Arnold Paole was blamed for these deaths and the word "vampire" began to circulate in the district—people now heard of the curious story that he had told his fiancée. Even so, nothing was done immediately. Arnold Paole's grave was opened forty days after his death. To the alarm of everyone present, his body was found to be undecayed—and it got worse. Fresh blood had oozed from his eyes, nose, and ears and the front of his shirt, all across his chest, was found to be soaked in it. His fingernails had fallen off but had been replaced by new growths and his hair appeared to have grown considerably. For the locals, this was a sure sign that Arnold Paole had become a vampire, so a wooden whitethorn stake was driven into the corpse's heart in accordance with local custom. In response, the dead man gave a loud groan, which was heard by everyone present. The body was left in the open and surgeons were brought from Belgrade in order to examine it. They announced that Paole had been a vampire, and the four people who had died after reputedly seeing his ghost, were also exhumed and staked. However, the danger had not passed.

Four years afterwards, in 1731, seventeen people reputedly died, due to some sort of vampiric activity, evoking memories of Arnold Paole. A twenty year-old woman by the name of Stana had suddenly and inexplicably died after an illness which had lasted three days and which came directly after her confinement. On her deathbed, she confessed that she had secretly anointed herself with the blood of an alleged vampire in order to protect herself from its attentions whilst pregnant. (This, apparently, was a common belief in that part of Serbia.) Nevertheless, both she and her baby died. Both were rather carelessly buried and the body of the infant was subsequently dug up and devoured by a wolf pack. The body of the woman, however, was left untouched by the wolves and seemed to be in an undecayed state. When her grave was opened, it was found that her chest cavity was full of fresh blood and that she looked as fresh as when she had been alive. Both her finger and toenails were loose and came away when touched, revealing new ones growing underneath. The body was adjudged to be in "the vampire condition" and was burned. Another body, that of a sixteen year-old boy that had been buried for ninety days, was also exhumed and found to be as perfectly fresh as it had been when he was alive. The body of his companion was also unearthed and found to be in a similar condition. Another young girl was dug up some time after being interred, and her body was also found to be fresh and supple and when a stake was thrust into her, she disgorged a large amount of blood. These, and a number of others, provoked yet another vampire scare. Soon the name of Arnold Paole was circulating far and wide, adding to the debate on vampires.

Peter Plogojowitz

Another case that had excited some interest in the local area was that of a farmer from the village of Kisilova in the Rhum Province of Serbia named Peter Plogojowitz. The case had been investigated by an Army enquiry sitting at Belgrade. There was nothing unusual about Plogojowitz, he was a simple, sixty-two year old farmer who owned some land around Kisilova. He seemed extremely hale and hearty. Despite his apparent good health, Peter Plogojowitz suddenly sickened and died. Three nights after his interment, there were sounds from the kitchen of his house, and upon entering, his son, found the likeness of Plogojowitz standing there. The apparition asked him for food. When a meal was set down before him, he ate it, then rose and left the room, presumably going back to the grave. The next day, the son (who was very alarmed at his experience), told neighbours what had happened. He waited up the following night but the apparition of his father didn't appear. Yet the next night, he was back and asking for more food. This time, the son refused and Plogojowitz gave him a malevolent and threatening look before leaving. The next day Plogojowitz's son suddenly died. His death was only the first of six in the village, all of whom seemed to die within hours of each other. The cause of their deaths seemed to be due to exhaustion and excessive blood loss. Before dying, each of them had complained that they had seen the shape of Peter Plogojowitz either in their bedrooms or in a dream. In these dreams, he seemed to glide toward them and catch them by the throat, then lowered his head to bite and draw their blood from the wound. He was believed to have killed nine persons in this way within the space of a week. Despite the best efforts of the local apothecary, all those who had seen or dreamed of Plogojowitz died extremely quickly.

The local magistrates were determined to put an end to what was happening before a full-scale vampire hysteria broke out. They contacted a local Army commander who happened to be staying nearby, asking him to investigate. The commander arrived in Kislova, bringing with him two other officers, and proceeded to order the immediate exhumation of the body of Peter Plogojowitz. They actually opened all the graves of those who had died subsequent to the farmer's death, but paid close attention to the corpse that had been Plogojowitz. They found it almost undecayed and lying as if in a trance. In fact, it even appeared to be breathing almost imperceptibly. To the absolute terror of the examiners, the eyes were wide open, and several of those who observed them swore that they moved a little, following the movements of those around the body. His hair and nails had grown, a number of old wounds were now encased in freshly grown skin, and the joints remained supple and moved easily. The farmer's mouth was smeared with fresh blood, and his complexion was extremely florid, as though gorged with the substance. The commander and his assistants concluded that this was indeed the vampire who had been terrorizing the district and they should put an end to it. In accordance with local custom, a sharp wooden stake was driven into the cadaver's heart, resulting in great quantities of fresh blood pouring forth from every part of the body. Wood was subsequently gathered and formed into a pyre upon which the corpse was then burned. No evidence of vampirism was found upon any of the other bodies that were exhumed along with Plogojowitz. Their copses were replaced in caskets and reburied. After this the dreams and apparitions ceased, as did the deaths in the village.

Returning to Belgrade, the commander and his officers formally convened again and made a report, concluding that Peter Plogojowitz had indeed been a vampire. Because of the military involvement, this was one of the best attested cases of its time, and placed Central and Eastern Europe firmly at the centre of vampire lore.

Grando

Whilst the cases of Arnold Paole and Peter Plogojowitz were undoubtedly extremely famous and widely discussed, there were nevertheless other reasonably famous vampire cases as well. Erasmus Franciscus in his commentary on the Baron Valvasor's work Die Ehre des Herzogthums Krain (1698), mentions an interesting and famous instance from the district of Kranj in Carniola in Slovenia. A relatively wealthy landowner named Grando had always been a hard worker and was well-liked around the various villages and in the neighbouring city. However, around his 60th year, he was suddenly taken with a strange disease and subsequently died. About two weeks or so after his death, people were wakened from a sound sleep by a heavy weight landing on their chest and by pricking and pinching pains around their throats. There was no doubt in their minds that these had been caused by Grando, as several of them had dreamed about the landowner at the same time. The ecclesiastical authorities were approached and decreed that his grave should be opened, even though he'd been buried for several months. When this was done, it was found that the body was extremely fresh and flaccid and with a ruddy complexion. In fact, he looked as though he was simply sleeping. And as they gazed at the body, it appeared that the dead man's lips quivered and he smiled or bared his teeth.

He even parted his lips as if to breathe. And to add to their horror, the eyes of the corpse suddenly opened, whereupon all those present fell to their knees and began to recite sacred litanies against evil. A priest then raised a crucifix above his face and intoned "Raise thine eyes and look upon Jesus Christ who hath redeemed us from the pains of hell by His most Holy Passion and His precious Death upon the Rood." At first, the dead man looked confused, then an expression of intense sadness crossed his face and tears began to flow down his cheeks. After a solemn commendation of his soul and at a sign from the priest, the head of the vampire was struck from the body with a spade. The headless body jerked and convulsed as if it had been alive. After that, his former neighbours were no longer troubled in their sleep.

The Bad Lord Soulis and Robin Redcap

Although the majority of recorded cases which excited the scholarly minds of the 16th and 17th centuries occured in Central and Eastern Europe, other countries seemed to have certain instances of vampirism as well. Along the Scottish Borders, Hermitage Castle in Roxboroughshire enjoys a particularly sinister reputation as the home of an evil man who was believed to exhibit vampiric tendencies. This was "the bad Lord Soulis," a member of the de Soulis family who occupied the land from the mid-13th to the mid-14th century. Which Lord Soulis is being referred to is unclear, but it is certain that he was a tyrant and that he trafficked with dark powers. Together with a blood-drinking familiar or imp, whom he called "Robin Redcap," the Lord Souls kidnapped many people, including children who were tortured and murdered in lonely Hermitage Castle. Tradition also states that both he and the imp used their blood in diabolical rites and may have drunk it as well. Realizing what was happening, local people stormed the castle and overpowered the Lord, boiling him in lead—in some versions they wrapped the body in a sheet of lead to prevent his master, the Devil, from getting him, and to stop the corpse from rising and terrorizing the countryside once more.

Alexander Stewart, the Wolf of Badenoch

In the Scottish Highlands, the infamous Alexander Stewart, the 14th century Wolf of Badenoch, brother to King Robert III of Scotland, was supposed to drink blood amongst his Highland ceterans (outlaw soldiers) in his fortress at Lochindorb above Kingussie in the Spey Valley. Alexander was supposed to have sold his soul to the devil and to have a copy in his possession of the notorious Book of Black Earth, a terrible volume of reputedly prehistoric magic that he had partly copied down from the lips of Highland chailleachs (witches). This would form the basis of the equally infamous Red Book of Appin (called the Wicked Bible by the Covenanters), which was supposedly used by Stewart sorcerers right up until 1745 when it disappeared. Some of the spells contained therein were said to involve the shedding and drinking of human blood. The Wolf, of course, held his court in a massive stone circle (now gone) near present-day Kingussie, so that he could commune with evil spirits. In this stone circle and under the influence of Druidic forces, he was said to drink the blood of stillborn babies in the midst of unholy rituals. Of course, many of these tales (especially those about drinking the blood of infants) may well have been put about by his implacable enemy, Alexander Burr, Bishop of Moray, but they served to create the impression of a vampiric Highland warlord which still lingers to this day.

Tadhg O'Carroll

In Ireland, members of the ruling clans were sometimes portrayed as having a lust for blood. In the bloody years of unrest around the mid-16th and early 17th centuries, a number of tales circulated throughout the country concerning the vampiric tendencies of certain ferocious and cruel warlords. Many of these may well have been put about by their enemies, but they left an indelible impression on the general mind, that echoed down across the centuries. Tadhg (or Teige) O'Carroll, for example, one of the so-called "Dark Princes of Ely" was credited with drinking the blood of his prisoners. The ancient kingdom of Ely lay in the Irish Midlands and comprised most of Counties Offaly and North Tipperary. It served as a "buffer zone" between two great power blocs in the area—one headed by the Fitzgeralds, (the Earls of Desmond and Kildare), the other headed by the Butlers (the Dukes of Ormond and North Tipperary). The O'Carrolls were a particularly fierce and war-like clan who had probably been driven south from North Monaghan by an expansion of the more powerful O'Neills in neighbouring Tyrone. Politically skillful and devious, they were able to play the main regional power blocs off against each other whilst ruling their own lands with an iron fist. The most bloodthirsty of them all, however, was Tadhg Caoch (One-eyed Tadhg) who came to prominence in between 1540s and early 1550s. His stronghold of Leap Castle (between Birr and Kinnity in Offaly) had an extremely sinister reputation that it enjoys even today (it is believed to be the most haunted castle in Western Europe). An old legend says the mortar used to build the fortress had been mixed with the blood of the defeated O'Bannions, from whom the O'Carrolls had seized the land, leading to the ancient curse that is said to still hang over the place—"Raised in blood; blood be its portion." Tadhg encouraged this reputation and added to his own notoriety by cutting the throat of his elder brother Thaddeus, who was a priest, whilst he was at prayer in the chapel at Leap. This was an act of blasphemy, which condemned the chieftain to remain as a vampiric ghost within the gloomy corridors of Leap. Tadhg was killed by his own kinsmen during internecine disputes in 1553, but not before he had killed large numbers of the neighbouring O'Mahons and allegedly drank their blood, and before he had bricked up many prisoners in the extensive rock-hewn dungeons that extend for miles beneath the castle. Many of these remain sealed to this day, concealing the atrocities of Tadhg and many of the other O'Carroll chieftains. In 1617, following the chaos of the Rebellion of Hugh O'Neill and the Plantation of Ulster, the era of the O'Carroll chieftains eventually came to an end as Sir Charles O'Carroll accepted lands in the New World and his descendants went on to found the state of Maryland. One of them was a signatory to the Declaration of Independence. The sinister fortress of Leap Castle however, still stands, guarding a trail that runs through the Slieve Bloom Mountains, between the plain of Leix and the coast. It is said to be haunted by Tadhg's vampiric spirit and at midnight, an eerie light has been seen shining across the valley in which it is situated, from the window of the chapel where the evil warlord slew his brother. Few locals will venture there after dark.

Cormac Tadhg McCarthy

Another vampire warlord was reputedly Cormac Tadhg McCarthy of Carrickphouka Castle, west of Macroom in County Cork. In 1601, he was made High Sheriff of Cork by the English with the instructions to hunt down all Irish rebels. In this he was diligent, anxious to please his English masters. His main opponent was the chieftain James Fitzgerald, who was regarded as a traitor by the authorities in Dublin, and in order to capture him, Cormac invited him to a feast in Carrickphouka on the pretence of making peace. During the course of the banquet, he had Fitzgerald killed, but in order to assure the English of his loyalty and to impress them, he went slightly further. It is said that he lapped up the spilled blood and ate the raw flesh of the fallen chieftain, much to the horror and disgust of the English who were present. In defence of these horrific actions, the McCarthy clan claimed that Cormac had in fact been possessed by a spirit that had risen out of the rock upon which his castle was built. (Carrickphouka means "the rock of the phouka"—phouka or pooka being a malevolent and dark spirit or demon). Even so, this was not enough to prevent Cormac from going down in history as a "vampire Sheriff." Even today, tales still exist of alleged sightings of him in and around the castle, long after his death. Today Carrickphouka Castle is simply a ruin—it was destroyed during the Williamite Wars of 1690-91, but local people still stay away from it after dark and elderly people will cross the road when passing by it and will genuflect in protection, even in broad daylight.

Relish Cakes and Blood Pudding

The horrors of the Great Famine (1845–52) added another element to the vampire legends of Ireland. As the Irish potato crop, upon which much of the populace depended, began to fail, hunger and destitution began to set in all across the country. In desperation, people turned to other means of sustenance, one of which was blood. One of the most famous alternative dishes of the Famine period was "relish cakes" that in many ways resembled the English black pudding. These were made from dried blood, (usually that of pigs or cows), mixed with whatever greens were available—cabbage tops and so on—and heated in the fires of the cottages. In other localities, cattle were driven to certain areas, where a small incision was made in their necks and a small amount of blood drawn off. This was then used to make the relish cakes or, more than likely, drunk raw, similar to milk. Blood was believed to be a good source of iron and nutrients and was supposed to guard against the fevers and sicknesses that followed the Famine.

Epidemics of various diseases swept through a number of Irish counties independent of the Famine. Several years before the Great Hunger took hold there were outbreaks of typhoid and tuberculosis in places such as Counties Sligo and Clare. People began to sicken and waste away, coughing up flecks of blood that remained about their mouths. They sensed a weight on their chests and their skin became pallid to the point of looking similar to marble. These were all the classic symptoms of a vampire attack. It is interesting to note that Bram Stoker's mother came from County Sligo and that she had lived through a particularly vicious epidemic of tuberculosis there in the early 1800s.

England 18th Century

Although England did not suffer from such horrors, there were tales of vampiric corpses rising from the dead in English folklore as well. Instances of catalepsy and trances seem to have been common around the 1700s and into the early 1800s. Medicine as we understand it was, of course, simply finding its feet, and some of those who were pronounced dead were in fact not dead at all. Some of the horror that these unfortunates must have experienced is reflected in Edgar Allen Poe's macabre masterpiece The Premature Burial. Such burials were in all probability, much more common than might be imagined. There are tales from England, Wales, and Ireland of corpses suddenly "coming to" just as they were about to be coffined, or of corpses opening their eyes and sitting up when they were already in an open coffin.

Constance Whitney

In the chancel of the London church of St. Giles, Cripplegate, there is still a monument to the memory of Constance Whitney who died in the early 1800s. Her tomb is marked by a marble scroll, with a carving on it that depicts the lady rising from her coffin. Behind this representation is a rather frightening legend.

The unfortunate lady was buried whilst in a cataleptic trance and was only returned to consciousness when a greedy sexton opened her coffin with the intention of stealing a valuable ring from her finger. The lady rose up, putting the robber to flight, and lived for a number of years after her terrifying ordeal.

Ernest Wicks

In September 1895, a boy named Ernest Wicks was found lying on the grass in Regent's Park, London, seemingly quite dead. The body was removed to and laid out in Marylebone mortuary where it was examined by the mortuary keeper, Mr. Ellis, prior to the arrival of a doctor. During the course of this examination, Mr. Ellis noted that the chest was slightly rising and falling and he assumed that the subject might well be alive. He rubbed the boy's arms in an attempt to restore the circulation and it seems to have worked—the child sluggishly sat up as if he had been no more than sleeping. He then slumped back but continued to breathe regularly. When the doctor arrived, the child was taken to the Middlesex Hospital where the surgeon pronounced him to be "recovering from a fit." At an inquiry in 1902, it was revealed that the boy had "died" no less than four times and that his mother had obtained three certificates of death, all signed by reputable doctors. And Ernest Wicks was not the only person to be so afflicted.

Alice Holden

In 1905, a Mrs. Alice Holden, living near Accrington, suddenly "died," despite being only twenty-eight and in full health. Even though the circumstances looked more than a little suspicious, the doctor did not hesitate to issue a certificate of death and arrangements for her funeral were made. Luckily, an undertaker's assistant saw a flutter of her eyelids as he prepared to put the body in the coffin, and eventually the woman was revived and continued to live perfectly well for many years afterwards. Though this occurred at the beginning of the 20th century, a similar event took place in England in the 1990s. Here, once again, a woman was pronounced dead and, if not for an embalmer's eagle-eyed observation, she would have been buried. She is still living today, fit and well.

Resurrection Men

The horror of premature burial was coupled in the popular imagination with yet another terror—that of the Resurrection Men. As medical science made its faltering steps forward during the 18th century, a growing number of anatomists and surgeons began to look around for dead human bodies upon which they could experiment and with which they could teach their pupils. Initially executed felons provided a ready source for these—the English king, Henry VIII granted the Worshipful Company of Barber-Surgeons four cadavers each year to practice upon—but soon the demand was so great that the gallows struggled to keep up. In order to meet this demand, a new breed of criminal came to the fore—the Resurrectionist or "Sack-em-Ups." These were, in effect, bodysnatchers—those who would dig up freshly interred corpses and sell them on to the surgeons. It was a ghoulish practice and totally illegal. And indeed, some of the Resurrectionists augmented their supplies of cadavers with those whom they had themselves murdered. In many cases, those purchasing the corpses did not query the method of death too much. Gentlemen such as Dr. Robert Knox in Edinburgh (now notorious for his connection with the infamous bodysnatchers Burke and Hare) and Dr. Samuel Clossey in Dublin, were willing to "turn a blind eye" to irregularities that they found on the bodies, which today would suggest foul play. As early as the 1760s, the Edinburgh female Resurrectionists, Helen Torrence and Jean Waldie were dealing with dug-up bodies alongside a "Dr. Russell" and his associates who ran an "apothecary shop" in the old part of the city. In London, competing gangs led by Ben Crouch and Israel Chapman dealt with the United Borough Hospital and St. Bartholomew's between 1809 and 1813. Even as late as 1830, the Bethnal Green gang, led by John Bishop, was selling freshly dug-up bodies to St. Bartholomew's for eight guineas.

The idea of the body being buried before its time, and that of the cadaver raised from the grave by the attentions of the Resurrectionists, made an indelible impression on the popular mind. This fused with tales coming from Central and Eastern Europe to form the basis of the English vampire belief. It was but a small step from the "resurrected" corpse to the notion of the threatening vampire rising from its tomb to menace those around it.

An example of the English vampire theme is to be found in Augustus Hare's Story of My Life (1896) in which he recounted a tale told to him by a certain Captain Fisher whose family had lived at Coglin Grange in a remote area of Cumberland in the north of the country.

Coglin Grange

The Grange at Coglin was a long, low house, no more than one-story high. It was very old, and according to Fisher, the land sloped away at one side towards an equally ancient church, in a hollow below. Coglin Grange had been a home to the Fisher family for a number of years, but after a time, they began to find it too small and cramped, and they moved south to Thorncombe near Guildford. They rented out Coglin Grange and were extremely fortunate in their tenants—two brothers and a sister.

The new tenants of the Grange settled in extremely well and were well-liked by their neighbours. And because there was only three of them, Coglin suited their needs admirably. Their winter was spent settling in and establishing themselves, meeting new friends, and making themselves popular in the district. Spring changed to an extremely hot summer when the nights seemed long and clammy and it was difficult to get any sleep.

One evening during the hot spell, the family at Coglin dined on the veranda of the old house before separating for the night to their bedrooms, which were all on the ground floor. However, shortly after she got into bed, the sister found that she could not sleep and propped herself up on her pillows. Although she'd fastened the window of her room, she had not closed the shutters and so she was able to look out across the countryside, bathed in the silver light of what seemed to be an abnormally large moon. Her room looked out in the direction of the old church and a particularly thick and dark stand of trees. As she watched, she suddenly became aware of two lights, flickering along the edge of the tree line, along the edge of the churchyard. As she watched, she suddenly became aware of a shape that seemed to have coalesced out of the shadows and was drawing slowly nearer to the Grange. For a moment, she wasn't sure because the large, pale moon was scattering shadows everywhere across the intervening ground and from time to time, it seemed lost amongst these.

But as it drew closer, the woman felt an unimaginable terror rise in the back of her throat. Suddenly and without warning, the coalescing figure changed direction and seemed to be going around the house, moving towards a corner to her left. She leapt from her bed and ran to her door, ready to unlock it and see who this peculiar visitor to her home might be. As she did so, she heard a scratching sound at the window behind her and, turning, she saw a hideous brown face, the colour of withered leaves, looking in at her. The eyes of the Thing glowed like living coals with a terrible malevolence that scared her even more. She stood there, transfixed, but safe in the knowledge that the window was securely fastened. The face drew back and there was silence for a moment. Then she heard a sound from the window similar to a bird pecking and, to her horror, she realized that the creature outside was trying to unpick the lead around the window-frame. Unable to move through sheer terror, she stood where she was and at last one of the panes of glass fell into the room. The long, bony hand of the creature came through the aperture and seized the handle of the window opening it to admit the rest of its body. In an instant, it was across the room and had seized the terrified woman by the hair. Dragging her forward it bit her sharply on the neck. The bite seemed to free her voice and she screamed loudly, bringing her brothers running from their own bedrooms to find her door locked from the inside. A poker brought from the fireplace in the living room, soon smashed the lock. At their approach, the Thing had dropped its victim and darted back towards the window. When the brothers broke in, they found their sister kneeling by the side of her bed bleeding from a wound in her throat. One brother pursued the creature out into the night and over the ground towards the church, which the Thing covered in impossibly huge strides. On reaching the churchyard wall, it seemed to disappear into a group of shadows and did not reappear, so the pursuer returned to join his brother and sister in the bedroom at Coglin Grange. The girl was dreadfully hurt, but she was of a strong disposition and was not all that given to superstition. The three of them assumed that a lunatic had escaped from custody and had made his way to Coglin and attacked her. And that was the way it was left. The wound healed but the actual shock of her attack had unsettled the girl and had left her very shaken. Her brothers decided to take her to Switzerland in order to fully recover from her ordeal.

After some time travelling through the Alps, they returned to Coglin Grange at the girl's insistence. She was anxious to get back and resume their old way of life as quickly as possible. When they returned home, they began to secure the old place, barring all the doors and closing all the shutters at night, although one little place was left uncovered (as was the fashion in many old houses) in order to let some light in. The brothers themselves kept a brace of pistols in each of their rooms and close to their beds in case they should have any further unwelcome night visitors.

The winter passed peacefully and quietly. The following spring was warm and, although it was not quite summer, some of the nights were particularly muggy. One night, the sister was woken up by a sound that she remembered only too well—the scratching sound of long claws upon the windowpane. Looking up at the uncovered topmost pane, she saw the same horrid brown face staring down at her, the eyes burning red with a hellish fire. This time, her voice didn't desert her and she screamed as loudly as she could, bringing her brothers into the room. Grabbing their pistols, they rushed outside to confront the Thing but, by this time, it was already rushing down the slope across the open ground towards the church, darting in and out of the shadows as it went. One of the brothers got a shot off and seemingly hit it in the leg, but it kept on running, taking extremely large strides. Reaching the churchyard wall, it scrambled over and disappeared among the tombstones and into the vault of a long-extinct family.

The next day, the brothers summoned some of their neighbours from around Coglin Grange and in their presence, the vault was opened. It was full of coffins, many of which had been broken open with their contents scattered upon the ground. Only one coffin was intact and its lid was loose. Upon opening it, the searchers found themselves looking at the same hideous, withered face that had been peering through the window of the Grange. Trembling, they managed to cursorily examine the body and found the traces of a pistol shot in one of the legs. It was generally concluded that the creature in the coffin was a vampire, and the body was taken out into the daylight and burnt. From then on, there was no more trouble at Coglin Grange. Subsequent commentators on the above story have pointed out that there is no such place as Coglin Grange, but have identified the house concerned as Coglin Low Hall in Cumbria. The vault, in which the vampire was found, also seems to have disappeared—there is nothing in Coglin Churchyard that might correspond to it, and no record of the family to whom it may have belonged to.

Whether strictly accurate or not, Hare's story was widely circulated and it fit in with the Gothic mood that had developed in England during the 19th century. The first vampire story is usually attributed to Dr. John Polidori who was born in London in 1795 as the son of an Italian émigré. In 1815, he completed his studies in medicine and entered the service of Lord Byron as the latter's personal physician, accompanying his master on a journey through Europe. Also accompanying them were the poet Percy Shelley and his wife Mary. On a stormy night in 1816, in the Villa Diodati above Lake Geneva in Switzerland, the group read through a Gothic ghost story book entitled Tales of the Dead and decided to write their own ghost or horror story. The most famous work to come out of that experiment was Mary Shelley's classic novel Frankenstein, but Polidori also penned a minor classic—The Vampyre. This moved away from the brutal lowborn vampiric creature of Slavic folklore and created Lord Ruthven, an aristocratic vampire who may well have been the template for Dracula himself. The novella was published in April 1819 in the New Monthly Magazine but was embarrassingly credited as a new piece by Lord Byron. Despite attempts to correct this mistake, it remained as Byron's work for many years afterward. Polodori died in 1821 under mysterious circumstances. He had been suffering from depression for some time and was thought to have committed suicide by drinking poison. Regardless, he had left behind the model for the vampire that we all recognize today.

Polodori's work was only one of a number of Gothic tales that began to appear during the early-to-mid 19th century. Many of these bore titles that suggested ancient and terrifying mysteries and the returning dead—The Black Monk or The Secret of the Grey Turret; The Blighted Heart or The Old Priory Ruins; Blanche or The Mystery of the Doomed House; The Skeleton Clutch or The Goblet of Gore. There were also other popular novels in circulation that had overtones of cannibalism and mass murder that had their roots in actual historical occurrences—works such as Sawney Bean, the Man-Eater of Midlothian and Sweeney Todd, the Demon Barber of Fleet Street, all of which raised a horror of, and a fascination with, the darker side of 19th century life. Every one of these ghastly titles probably sprang from the pen of one man who was making a veritable fortune in the genre. Foremost amongst these terrors was Varney the Vampire or The Feast of Blood.

Varney the Vampyre

The events as detailed in the story were alleged to have been based on fact and were supposed to have taken place in England, during the reign of Queen Anne (1702–1714), although no such record can be traced. These events may relate to some of the reports that were emerging from Central and Eastern Europe. Varney appeared as a lengthy volume in 1847 and is credited as being one of the early works of the writer Thomas Preskett Prest, the fabled author of Gothic stories that appeared in lurid horror magazines known as "dreadfuls." The volume boasted two hundred and twenty chapters, making it one of the longest books ever written in the genre. It was such a success, however, that it was reprinted in a number of serialized chapters by Messrs. E. Lloyd, who had printing premises in London's Salisbury Square and were purveyors of "shockers" and "dreadfuls" of the most gruesome kind, and with whom Prest had a close association. Varney, like all of Prest's stories, followed a formula, were filled with heaving bosoms, lustful roues, and gore.

Prest's work spawned a score of imitators, most of which are best forgotten but through their pages they built up a corpus of vampire lore that began to establish the vampire as one of the principal terrors of Victorian England. However, it was not only Britain that was falling under the thrall of the Undead. Across the ocean in America, a similar body of lore and tradition was beginning to establish itself.

The American Colonies

There had been whispers of vampiric activity in the New World since the early days of the European Colonists. As early as 1692, the Reverend Deodat Lawson, minister at Salem Village, Massachusetts, (scene of the infamous Salem Witch Trials), complained of being attacked in the darkness on the doorstep of one of the afflicted girls, by an unseen creature who had attempted to bite him. This might be put down to something of the hysteria of the time, but for the Puritan colonists, America must have been a frightening and supernatural place. It was covered in deep and gloomy forests and the trackless bogs in which a man might be lost. And out in this wilderness were Native Americans who, as far as the colonists were concerned, practiced diabolical rites and might well be agents of the Devil himself. The forests and swamps were the homes of ungodly creatures.

Disease was also rampant in this new land. Following the War of Independence in 1775, epidemics of tuberculosis, cholera, and typhoid swept through the fledgling settlements scattered across the developing areas of early America. For many, the sicknesses were the work of Satan who was lurking in the wilderness. Normally healthy individuals suddenly began to inexplicably waste away, and eventually die. There was no warning—they simply turned pale and feeble, withering away before their demise. It could only be the result of some form of supernatural evil. Both English and German immigrants brought with them tales of ancient terrors from their own homelands and gradually these melded into the folklore of the New World. One element in this folklore was that of the vampire that had been brought to America mainly by immigrants from Central Europe. Even in an increasingly enlightened age, an explanation for such diseases was not sought in the fly-ridden bogs or in the scummy wells, which might have lain near to the early settlements; rather communities looked towards something uncanny which hovered around, just out of sight. The very primordialness of the landscape itself suggested that such things were possible. In such a place, the idea of the vampire that many Europeans had carried with them to America seemed all too real.

The vampire capital of the New World was not, as might be supposed, New York (Niew Amsterdam under the Dutch) or San Francisco (as it often appears in the movies). Instead it was the small state of Rhode Island. Amongst the isolated farms and communities, old ways lingered on and old tales were often repeated along the lanes that wound their ways amongst the apple orchards of the state. Rhode Island had experienced heavy fighting during the War of Independence and remote, often overgrown cemeteries were filled with corpses from that time. There were also stories that some corpses lay unburied, hidden away in the woods where wounded British, German, and American soldiers had crawled away to die. There were legends of ghosts haunting lonely gravesites and of ancient beings from the time before the settlers that still dwelt in the deep woodlands. Memories of ancestral European terrors added a fresh edge to these fears and whispers.

Disease swept through Rhode Island towards the end of the 18th century. The arrival of tuberculosis was coupled with a fear that the British might try to reinvade the Colonies (this happened in 1812) and illness struck sporadically in communities that teetered on the edge of public panic and hysteria. The tiny state was to produce a tradition that was to become known throughout America (and further afield) as "the vampire ladies."

Sarah Tillinghast

The horror began in 1796 with Sarah Tillinghast, daughter of Stukely Tillinghast, an apple farmer from the South County area of the state. Nineteen-year-old Sarah was a quiet and demure girl, but exceptionally dreamy and given to wandering in old cemeteries where the buried Revolutionary War casualties lay. In the autumn of 1796, she suddenly fell ill, with what the local doctor diagnosed as consumption (tuberculosis) and died. Shortly afterward, other members of the Tillinghast family also became ill and died, wasting away in an inexplicable manner. Oddly enough, they had dreamed of Sarah a number of nights before their actual death. Fear spread through the community—not of tubercular contagion—but of vampire activity. Old stories were stirred up again and many became convinced that Sarah and some of her siblings had become vampiric creatures. These stories were perhaps fanned by the local minister, Benjamin Northup, who saw the Devil's hand in the deaths. As the hysteria mounted, Stukely Tillinghast became more and more unsure of what to do. He was losing members of his family on a regular basis to an unknown but relentless evil against which he and the church seemed powerless. In desperation, he travelled out to the lonely churchyard where his daughter lay and together with one of his farmhands unearthed her coffin. Opening it, he found

Sarah lying, just as fresh and beautiful as when she had been interred. Taking a large hunting knife, he cut out her heart and set fire to it. He'd heard about an old legend that said it was the only way to destroy a vampire. After that, the deaths in the Tillinghast household stopped, as did the dreams, but Stukely had lost half of his large family.

Nancy Young

Things were quiet in Rhode Island until 1827 when the "vampire epidemic" surfaced again. This time it was near the small town of Foster and it afflicted the household of Captain Levi Young and his wife, both natives of Sterling, Connecticut who had bought land in the area. Levi Young had been a captain of militia but had settled down to become a farmer in the Foster area. He had done rather well and was reasonably prosperous. He and his wife Anna Perkins had eight children and the Foster farmhouse rang with the sound of a happy and contented family.

In the spring of 1827, things changed. Levi and Anna's eldest daughter Nancy, began to sicken with what seemed, at first, to be a passing cold. It grew steadily worse—Levi thought she had taken a severe influenza—and she took to her bed, eventually becoming completely bedridden. She died shortly after.

As with Sarah Tillinghast, a few months after Nancy Young's death, other members of her family also began to sicken. Some of them complained that they too had dreamed of Nancy visiting them at night and had experienced an extraordinary weight upon them as they lay in bed. Stories of Sarah Tillinghast began to resurface in Rhode Island society and the chilling word "vampire" was on many lips. Again hysteria was bubbling just beneath the surface of the Foster community. Something had to be done. An elderly Foster resident known locally as "Doc" Lennox suggested that Nancy's body should be exhumed and burned. This was done by Levi Young himself, on a chilly autumn morning in the town's new churchyard and in full view of his neighbours. Doc Lennox had suggested that other members of the Young family should stand in the smoke from the pyre in order to protect themselves from former vampiric attentions. After Nancy was burned, the deaths stopped. Things would remain quiet in Rhode Island for almost fifty years.

Juliet Rose

The next of Rhode Island's "vampire ladies" is generally taken to be Juliet Rose, the daughter of William G. Rose, a businessman and civic leader in South County. Her story follows the now-established pattern of both Nancy Young and Sarah Tillinghast. A lively youngster, and the child of William's first wife Mary Taylor (who had died some years before), Juliet suddenly and inexplicably succumbed to what was described as a "harsh fever" and died in the early autumn of 1874. Shortly after her death, William's other daughter, Mary Griswold, began to show signs of an illness, wasting away. Almost immediately old stories of the earlier vampire ladies rose to the forefront of William Rose's mind. He was convinced that the vampire scourge had returned. Armed with his suspicions, he confronted his local minister, the Reverend Amos Cabot, but was told that he was still grieving for Juliet and was imagining things. Still convinced of the awful plague, William Rose went to the family cemetery deep in the Rhode Island woods. There, according to his own testimony, he beheld the form of his daughter standing over what was her grave. Although it extended its arms to him, begging for his warmth, the apparition vanished before his whispered prayers and William Rose commenced to dig up Juliet's coffin. Pulling back the lid, he saw to his horror that the winding sheet, in which the body lay, was badly stained with fresh blood. With a cry of despair, he drew his hunting knife and plunged in into the cadaver's heart. A scream rang through the graveyard. When he returned home, he found his young daughter recovering slowly from whatever it was that ailed her. This was taken to be indisputable evidence of vampire activity that was now laid to rest.

Mercy Brown

The area stayed quiet until 1892, when the last and most famous of Rhode Island's vampires made her appearance. This was Mercy Brown, daughter of George Brown, who owned a small farm between the settlements of Exeter and Wickford in the south of the state. The story had started, however, much earlier, with the death of George's wife Mary in 1883. Shortly after her death, his daughter Mary Olive began to complain of strange and terrifying dreams and of a crushing weight on her chest. She began to exhibit some of the signs of the strange sickness that had taken away her mother until June 1884 when she succumbed to the same death. Things remained quiet for about five years until George's only son Edwin also began to display the same ghastly symptoms that had carried away his mother and sister. He too experienced terrible dreams of suffocation and crushing, turning from a hearty young man into a pale and shambling wreck. His doctor suggested that perhaps the airs of Colorado might be good for him and so Edwin travelled there to recover his failing health. His health returned almost immediately, and he decided to stay there for a while. Whilst he was there, however, he received word that his younger sister, Mercy Lena, had been seized with a similar disease and was sinking fast. Edwin rushed home but was too late—Mercy was already dead. Notions of the vampires began to re-emerge from the shadows and a number of local people complained of feeling weak, adding that they had also dreamed of Mercy Brown on a number of consecutive nights. The people feared another outbreak of the "vampire plague" and decided that something had to be done.

On the morning of 18th March 1892, a group of town elders, headed by the local doctor, Harold Metcalfe, made their way to the tiny cemetery where Mercy Brown had been taken to rest. Because she had died in the winter when the ground was still hard with frost, Mercy had not actually been buried, but lay in a squat stone crypt on the edge of the burying ground. The coffin that contained Mercy Brown's body lay just inside the door, balanced on a cart. With due solemnity, the men opened the casket and threw back the lid. Mercy lay inside just as fresh and pretty as she'd ever been, with no sign of decay upon her. There were also traces of fresh blood on the inside of the coffin. Stepping forward, the doctor made a small incision in the cadaver and removed her heart and liver. These were ritually burned and water and vinegar were poured into the cavity from which they'd been removed. The men then left the cemetery and returned to their homes, praying that the scourge of vampirism which had afflicted Rhode Island was at last over. And indeed it appeared to be.

Edwin Brown himself died shortly after these macabre events. However, one of the local newspapers, The Providence Journal, seized upon the incident and carried a rather lurid account of the gathering in the churchyard in its issue of 19th March 1892. It followed the story in its 21st March issue, claiming that vampires were not a native Rhode Island superstition but "settled here," brought in by immigrants to the state. The article was lifted by some of the New York papers who used it to poke fun at the "superstitious" Rhode Islanders and the story became widespread all across America. The Mercy Brown case may have been yet another influence on Bram Stoker as he wrote his vampire novel. He had been touring part of the United States as secretary to the actor Sir Henry Irving and, it is thought, could not have failed to come into contact with some account of the incident. Indeed, after his death, his wife found cuttings from some of the American newspapers relating to the case amongst his possessions.

Nelly Vaughn

Mercy Brown more or less marked the end of the "vampire ladies," although there is one more that has not been mentioned. In a secluded graveyard, near Coventry, Rhode Island, stood a funeral marker bearing a curious inscription. The grave was that of Nelly Vaughn, who died in 1889, aged nineteen years and the inscription reads: "I am waiting and watching for you." The message may have been quite innocent—to a loving family or a secret lover but in the remote Rhode Island cemetery and with the alleged history of vampirism in the state, they took on a rather chilling aspect. In 1967, a teacher at Coventry High School informed his class that there was a vampire buried somewhere in the locality. After a degree of research, interest fastened on Nelly Vaughn's tombstone with its peculiar message. There was a myth in the area that no vegetation would grow on Nelly's grave though this may arguably have had more to do with the number of visitors at the site than with any supernatural agency. Besides the peculiar inscription, little is known about Nelly Vaughn's brief life and virtually nothing is known about how she died. However, the gravesite generated a massive amount of interest in vampires and ghosts in that remote corner of Rhode Island. In the 1980s, Yankee magazine ran an article entitled The Words on Nelly's Tombstone, which generated a fresh and more widespread interest in Rhode Island vampires. There were more visitors and Nelly's funeral marker became so desecrated and broken that it had to be removed in 1990. Perhaps poor Nelly can finally rest in peace.

Horace Ray

Rhode Island was not, of course, the only American state to experience an alleged vampire phenomenon. In neighbouring Connecticut, there were also suggested instances involving the Undead. In Jowett City, between the years 1847 and 1852, it was suspected that some sort of vampiric agency was at work in the locality. The vampire was supposed to be the unquiet revenant of Horace (sometimes given as Henry) Ray who had died early in 1847 and who was said to be preying on two of his sons who had survived him. When they too died, a number of people around the Jowett City area dreamed of them and awoke, experiencing exhaustion. Certain religious factions believed that vampires were at work and the bodies of Horace Ray and his sons were exhumed and burnt, whereupon the dreams and exhaustion stopped.

In the town of Griswold, historians investigated a local building site after some children had found a human skull there. The place was found to be a very old burying ground that included a stone vault. Here, the historians found a coffin containing some human remains that had obviously been treated for vampirism—dismembered in a very deliberate fashion. The skull had been placed amongst the bones of the chest and both arms and legs had been systematically broken. A closer examination of these bones revealed a tubercular-like condition. The coffin was marked "JB 55"—the "JB" being taken to refer to the occupant of the coffin and the "55" to his or her age. The skeleton was placed back in its coffin and no further examination was carried out, although anthropologists have suggested that this method of burial was not native to Connecticut but rather was common in Eastern Europe.

The Corwin Brothers

In Woodstock, Vermont, two brothers named Corwin were struck by an inexplicable illness towards the end of 1834. Before the year was ended, the eldest of the brothers had died and the other was starting to sicken. Stories concerning vampires who had been living in the forests which cloaked the Vermont mountains were suddenly remembered, and it was considered that the elder Corwen might be the victim of one of these, and that he had even become a vampire himself. His body was subsequently dug up and burned, the ashes placed in an iron pot and buried directly beneath the town square. A later account tells of how some youths attempted to dig them up late at night but were assailed by unearthly cries and screams, so they abandoned the idea.

Rachel Burton

An earlier and even more curious tale comes from Manchester, Vermont, concerning jealously and vengeance that reached out from beyond the grave. In the late 18th century, Isaac Burton, a naval officer, watched his young wife Rachel slip away with the ravages of a strange disease that resembled consumption. Distraught by her illness, he vowed that she was the love of his life and that if she died, he would never marry again. He laid her to rest in the Manchester cemetery. For a while, he mourned her loss, but then became attracted to pretty Hulda Powell who lived in the town. Soon the pair of them were married. Hulda made Isaac a good wife. A year or so after the wedding however, Hulda began to sicken with the same illness that had carried off Rachel. Significantly, she claimed to have dreamt of Isaac's first wife and a meeting of the town fathers including the local clergyman concluded that Rachel Burton was somehow drawing off Hulda's strength from the other side of the grave. Her body was exhumed and though she had been dead for over a year, her body was found to be remarkably fresh. The cadaver was ritually burned, but in 1793, Hulda Burton died, seemingly a victim of Isaac's former wife. The tale only added to the building corpus of Undead lore. Down through the years, the shadow of the vampire lingered on both sides of the Atlantic and all across Europe.

Dracula and other Vampire Fiction

In 1897, the Irish writer Bram Stoker published what was to become one of the seminal books of vampire fiction—the novel Dracula. Although he would produce other works, none would catch the public imagination as much as his tale of the vampire count, drawing as it did upon a number of social issues but also on a corpus of folklore. Indeed, the novel has supposedly never been out of print since the day that it was first published. Allegedly, the only book that can rival that record is the Bible. It established the idea of the Undead firmly in Eastern Europe, a part of the world to which Stoker had never been (although it's possible that he may have been aware of Dom Calmet's work in that region) and inextricably linked the vampire motif with a medieval Wallachian warlord. It also created the image of the Undead as the cloak-swathed aristocrat with which we are all familiar today.

The book and the ideas that it produced were so successful that it inevitably spawned a number of imitations, not least of all in the developing cinematic industry of the early 20th century.

Nosferatu

The most famous of all the early vampire films was produced by a small German film company, Prana Film. This had been set up around the end of 1919 to produce and promote films (then silent, black and white films) that had a supernatural theme. In the end, the studio produced only one film, but it was destined to become a classic. This was F.W. Marnau's Nosfertu, ein symphonie des gruens (a symphony of horror). Although the title was "nosferatu" (a German word for vampire) the action of the film was set in the Carpathian Mountains of Eastern Europe. Marnau used a largely German cast, including the Berlin-born actor Maximillian Schreck, who had initially made his name on the German stage but was now increasingly seen in films. Schreck's own name is interesting—it is the German word for "terror" or "fight" and it led to the legend that it was not his name at all. In fact, he was at one time said to be an English actor named Alfred Abel, but this rumour was put to rest when the two men appeared together. Because he was a rather private man and not a great deal was known about his background, weird and unsubstantiated tales grew around him.

Schreck's portrayal of the vampire perhaps owed more to the tale of Coglin Grange than it did to the sleek and stately aristocrat of Stoker's novel. Count Graf Orlock is an emaciated and withered figure, slightly stooped and bald and with protruding fangs and long, claw-like fingernails. Even so, the film borrowed liberally from the Dracula novel and therein lay its downfall. The producers and writer (generally credited as Albin Grau) had not obtained the permission of the Stoker estate, and Florence Stoker, (Bram Stoker's widow), immediately instigated legal proceedings. A case of copyright infringement was found against Prana Film and Florence was awarded substantial damages. After making one film, the studio declared itself bankrupt. However, it had left behind what many consider to be an early masterpiece of cinematic horror.

Dracula: The Films

Universal

Universal Pictures in America was more circumspect when it released its own version of Dracula in 1931. Director Todd Browning had obtained all necessary permissions and had gone out of his way to choose an actor that he considered perfect for the job. That actor was Bela Lugosi. Lugosi had been born in Lugos, a town in Austria-Hungary (now Lugoj in Romania) and had a thick Hungarian accent, which Browning deemed ideal for the vampire count. During the 1930s, Lugosi became the quintessential vampire, full of East European menace and aristocratic evil. His version of the Count was probably closer to Stoker's ideal that Schreck's had been. He was less emaciated and more human, but there was still a sinister chill around his portrayal of Dracula. As Browning had imagined, his thick accent gave an air of eerie authenticity to the character. Who can forget his utterance as he listened to the howling of wolves outside his castle "The children of the night—what music they make!" or "I never drink—wine." Despite all the authenticity of imagery, Browning took massive liberties with the script to suit American audiences. For example, it is Renfield, not Jonathan Harker, who visits Dracula in his castle. Whereas in the book, it is the other way around. However, largely due to the brooding presence of Lugosi, the film was an outstanding success. In fact, it spawned a string of what were called "Monster Movies" and Lugosi found himself heading a stable of other famous monster actors such as Boris Karloff (Frankenstein and The Mummy) and Lon Chaney Jr. (The Wolfman) who dominated much of the 1930s and early 1940s with their creepy films.

Hammer Films

Another actor, the London-born Christopher Lee, would also be forever associated with the vampire Count. By the late 1950s/early 1960s, Lugosi's leering elegance was starting to appear slightly jaded. A new and dynamic post-War era needed a more credible challenge. Christopher Lee, who was to firmly establish the ideal of the modern vampire, emerged out of a new English-based studio. Exclusive Films had been formed in London in 1935 by a Spaniard named Enrique Carreras and a former actor William Hinds (stage name William Hammer). In the late 1950s, they also formed a subsidiary with Hinds as Chairman, that was named Hammer Films. The new company was to distribute horror and supernaturally based films, mainly for the British market, but for wider distribution as well. Lee, who is a direct descendant of the Emperor Charlemagne on his mother's side, had already appeared in a number of horror movies and had worked for Hammer playing another demonic figure—the oriental fiend Dr. Fu Manchu in 1965. In 1966, he appeared in the film Dracula, Prince of Darkness, playing the vampire Count. His austere, aristocratic version was a triumph and set the tone for all subsequent films—many of which starred Lee himself as Count Dracula. A powerful and commanding presence on screen, Lee was perfect as the demonic nobleman and brought a sinister air of sophisticated menace to the role. In most films, just as in Stoker's novel, the Count faced Professor Abraham Van Helsing, played by another Englishman—Surrey-born Peter Cushing. Throughout the 1960s and early 1970s, the two of them pitted wits against each other in a series of films, becoming almost icons of good and evil in the public mind. Both continued, long after Hammer and its subsidiary Tyburn (named after a place of public execution in London) had folded. Cushing appeared as General Moff Tarkin in the Star Wars series (in which Lee also appeared) and Lee most recently as the wizard Saruman the White in Lord of the Rings. Their cinematic legacy, however, has lived on in countless vampire movies.

Vampires have continued to exercise a hold on the human imagination. Apart from the films, countless books, magazines, and television programs on the subject have been produced through the years, right up until the present day. In fact, one of the most popular television series of recent times has been Buffy, the Vampire Slayer that was based on a film. It portrayed the vampire myth in a teenage soap opera-style and was extremely popular with many young people. Things have moved a long way since Dom Augustine Calmet!

Two figures have dominated the vampire myth and in their own ways have shaped our perspective of it—Dracula and the Countess Elizabeth Bathory. It is interesting to look at both of these and to see how the legend of the vampire has grown up around them

Vlad Tepes: Dracula the Legend

In the 15th century, Eastern Europe was in turmoil. Christianity found itself under threat from a rapidly expanding sphere of influence controlled by the Muslim Ottoman Turks. Indeed, after the fall of Constantinople in 1453, Christendom found itself under almost constant threat from the forces of Mohammed the Conqueror, who sought to extend the Muslim faith throughout all of Eastern Europe. Desperately, Christianity sought some form of response to the steadily growing Ottoman expansion.

The Holy Roman Emperor Sigismund (elected in 1410) created a semi-secret organization known as the Order of the Dragon to defend the eastern lands from the advancing Turkish threat. Its emblem was a dragon, clinging to a cross, its wings outstretched. From around 1431, a certain warlord or Voivode (local ruler), Vlad II of Wallachia, was brought into the Order and had the dragon emblazoned on his coinage. The Wallachian name for dragon was "Drac" and he became known locally as Vlad Dracul. Interestingly enough, the word "drac" can also mean "devil" or "evil spirit."

Wallachia was a tiny territory, but it was important. It had been founded in 1292 by Radu Negru (Radu the Black) but for many years it was dominated by Hungary who laid claim to part of neighbouring Transylvania and Moldavia. It broke free of Hungarian influence in 1330, becoming virtually an independent kingdom. It still, however, maintained strong links with Transylvania, and in fact Vlad II's wife was a Transylvanian noblewoman. In fact, Sigismund was to make Vlad II military governor of Transylvania in 1431. Wallachia was also strategically important, forming a kind of "buffer" between the Christian states and the expanding Muslim powers. This was why Christendom considered Vlad II's support so important.

Vlad II, however, was a skilled politician and sought a kind of "middle way" between the two factions. He was in a dangerous position and had no wish to see his country either invaded by the Turks or used as a frontier for a Christian battleground. From time to time, he struck up alliances with both, however as Turkish influence increased, he began to side with them. When the Turks invaded Transylvania in 1442, he remained neutral, greatly angering the Hungarians under their leader John Hunyadi, the White Knight of Hungary. Hunyadi attacked the Turks and drove them out of Transylvania before turning his attention on Vlad II and forcing him to flee his throne. However, Vlad regained it in 1443 with Turkish support, but was forced to hand over two of his sons—Vlad and Radu—as hostages to the Turkish administration. An uneasy peace existed between Wallachia and Hungary with Hunyadi demanding that Vlad II fulfill his obligations as a member of the Order of the Dragon, but Vlad II resisting for fear of inflaming the Turks.

Eventually, Vlad II died in 1448. On hearing of his death, the Turks immediately released his second son Vlad and supported him as Voivode of Wallachia. Hunyadi, fearing Turkish domination of the region immediately placed his own candidate Vladislav II or Vladislav Dan, backed by the Hungarian Army, on the Wallachian throne. However, he angered his Hungarian overlords by adopting slightly pro-Turkish policies and the situation became even more tense.

In 1456, the Hungarians invaded Turkish Serbia. It was a disastrous campaign during which Hunyadi was killed and, in the resulting political confusion, Vlad was prompted to make his bid for the Wallachian monarchy. He ousted Vladislav and had him murdered before taking the throne as Vlad III or Vlad Dracula(Drac-ula—son of the dragon). His reign was a despotic one, during the course of which he stood up to the Turks and systematically began to destroy the old local landowner system that had existed in Wallachia. This may have been because the Hungarian-backed land owners of Tirgoviste had burned his elder brother Mircea to death—Vlad III was to exact a terrible revenge upon them, arresting, torturing, and eventually executing them. His cruelty became legendary.

In 1462, the Turks forced Vlad III to flee the throne by aiding a popular uprising against him, placing his younger brother Radu the Handsome (who had remained in Turkish custody after Vlad had been released) on the Wallachian throne. It is said that Vlad's wife leapt to her death into a foaming river near his castle at Arges to avoid being captured by Turkish soldiers. Vlad himself managed to escape and fled to the Hungarian court for safety. Here the Hungarian king, Matthias Corvenus (John Hundyadi's son), had him imprisoned as a traitor. It is not known how long he was held, but he was released perhaps around 1474 by marrying into one of the Hungarian noble families. He then formed an alliance with Count Stephen Barthory to reinvade Wallachia and get his throne back, which their combined forces did in 1476. By this time, Radu was dead and had been replaced by another Turkish puppet, Basarab the Old. Basarab's forces were easily defeated and Vlad took the throne once more. However, several months later, Count Bathory's armies departed for Transylvania leaving Vlad in a rather weak position. Taking advantage of this, a massive Turkish army entered the country and Vlad was forced to take up arms to defend his country with only a skeleton army. He was killed in battle near present-day Bucharest. His decapitated body was recovered from the Turks and was taken inland to be buried at the monastery at Snagov.

There is little doubt that Vlad III was a cruel man, but he may have been not so different from many other rulers around him. Some of his methods of torture and execution may seem extremely barbaric to us today, but we must remember that Vlad was forced to maintain a strict and authoritarian rule to protect his country from the forces that surged around it—namely Hungarian and Turk. Nevertheless, some of his methods appear to be quite unique as well as being incredibly draconian and brutal. For example, one of his favourite methods of torture and death was to place Turkish prisoners on the top of high stakes and let the forces of gravity pull them down as the point of the stake disembowelled them. This earned him the nickname "Vlad Tepes" (pronounced Tep-esh) or "Vlad the Impaler." A number of grizzly anecdotes are told about him as well. The most common tale is how he received three Turkish ambassadors at his court, each one of them wearing a fez. In accordance with their own custom, they did not remove their headgear when they entered his presence. Vlad took this as a sign of disrespect and instructed that the fezs be nailed to their foreheads. In a similar anecdote, a Saxon merchant was caught either cheating or stealing from a poor man. Vlad had him placed against a wooden door and had a bag of gold nailed to his hand. The merchant's eyes were then gauged out so that he could not see his wealth.

Aware of the vast armies of beggars and diseased persons that traversed his territory demanding alms, Vlad devised a novel way of alleviating the problem. He invited many of the beggars and invalids to a great banquet held in a barn and when they were inside, he had all the doors locked and the building set alight, burning those inside to death. In this way he solved the country's destitute problem "at a stroke." However, it should be noted that although he appears as an often cruel and barbaric man, there is no record of Vlad III actually drinking human blood. Nevertheless, from our own 21st century point of view, he seems to have been a horrific despot.

Vlad Tepes is celebrated and remembered in his native Wallachia as a good prince, a defender of his country (now part of Romania) against foreign invaders—the Turks and the Saxons. He is fondly remembered as a friend of the poor and a champion of the common man—a ruler who protected his subjects, (through the laws that he enacted), from scheming foreign merchants and vicious Turkish interlopers. In this respect, he is regarded as a national hero.

The legends surrounding this admittedly bloodthirsty Wallachian warlord must have attracted Bram Stoker when he came to write his novel. Although not familiar with the area itself, he had heard some of its legends through friends who had connections with that part of the world. In 19th century England, Romania was a remote and exotic land—perhaps something like Tibet appeared during the 1950s and 1960s. Transylvania—the land beyond the forest—had a mysterious ring to it, and where better to set a story of horror and mystery than in the mist-shrouded forests that swathed the lower slopes of the Carpathian Mountains? Stoker may also have been aware of the tales and legends concerning vampires that had emerged from Hungary during the 1700s and this may have influenced his decision to set his novel—its content perhaps influenced by Irish and American elements—in the Transylvania/Moldavia areas. And although we have no evidence that he knew anything about her, another person from the same region may have coloured his perspective. This was the nightmarish Countess Elizabeth Bathory.

Countess Elizabeth Bathory

Elizabeth (Erzsebet) Bathory has often been described as "Countess Dracula." The Bathory family was an old and illustrious one—one of the oldest in Transylvania in fact. The family traced its descendency from Vid Bathory, a legendary and mighty warrior who had allegedly slain a dragon with a mace in what is now eastern Romania. This may have created the motif for the Romanian Christian knight Iorgi—also said to have killed a dragon—who later became St. George, patron saint of England. They were also related by what looks to have been incestuous marriages amongst various other members of similar clans. Her mother, Anna Bathory, was the sister of King Stephen of Poland, and her father Iorgi (George—her mother's third husband) was the ruler of several countries. However, instances of inbreeding had led to rumours of madness and monstrous births in former years.

Elizabeth Bathory was born into this troubled lineage in 1560. Her mother was a devout Calvinist and an exceptionally strong character, and her father, George, was a hard-working man who had held several administrative posts under the Hapsburgs. She had at least one elder brother, one of the many Stephens (a popular name among the male Bathorys) and two younger sisters, Klara and Sofia, who disappeared from history without trace.

In 1571 at age 11, Elizabeth was promised in marriage to the fifteen year-old Count Ferenc (Francis) Nadasdy, fabulously wealthy and reckoned to be one of the most eligible bachelors in Hungary at that time. Such young betrothals were not uncommon and were usually for political reasons rather than any sort of romantic notions. In order to acquire the notable family name, Francis changed his own to that of Bathory, giving him the tradition of that family, as well as its notoriety.

Francis and Elizabeth waited four years to marry, finally doing so on 8th May 1575. Elizabeth was sent from the Bathory castle and into the care of her mother-in-law, the formidable Lady Ursula Kasnizsai. Whilst she was at the court of Lady Nadasdy, plagues and epidemics raged through Eastern Europe, carrying away the poor and wretched in the villages of Hungary. The tides of illnesses and disease, however, simply lapped around the walls of the castle at Savarin, keeping everyone there confined. Elizabeth found herself increasingly under the control of her severe and dominant mother-in-law. It was around this time that she was, according to legend, visited by a "black stranger," perhaps a forest demon to whom she is said to have given herself. What actually might have transpired is that she had an affair with one (or more) of the servants, leading to the supposition that she may very well have been sexually promiscuous.

When her mother-in-law died, Elizabeth joined her husband at the remote Csejthe Castle. By this time, the Muslim Turks were making advances and (as they had done in Vlad III's time) the Christian forces were trying to limit their expansion. Count Francis was now a solider in the Hungarian army and had distinguished himself in battle becoming known as "The Black Hero of Hungary." He was consequently away fighting against Turkish incursions for much of his time, leaving his wife alone in the gloomy fortress.

It was now that Elizabeth fell under various influences. The servants at Csejthe, for the most part, were local people, steeped in local lore and legend. The area seemed to have been superstitious and filled with old tales and practices, many of which stretched back across the centuries. Certain servants appear to have initiated Elizabeth into rather unsavoury practices. Elizabeth may well have been attracted to lesbianism (she had an aunt who was renowned throughout Hungary in this respect) and this may have played a prominent role in some of the occurrences at Csejthe. An old servant woman named Darvula—locally regarded as a witch—together with a maid named Dorottya Szentes, seem to have played a major part in the terrible acts that were to make Elizabeth Bathory's name a by-word for evil and depravation. To these may be added the name Janos (or Johannes) Ujvary, who is described as Elizabeth's majordomo. There seems little doubt that many of these "practices," whilst reeking of dark witchcraft, also contained sexual elements.

In 1600, Count Francis was killed in battle against the Turks and it was now that the real period of Elizabeth's atrocities began. She was now mistress of Csejthe and a formidable power in the locality. Since the death of her husband, she was also under the protection of her kinsman, King Matthias of Hungary, which gave her added status. However, the depravity of her life was beginning to tell on her physically—she appeared to be growing old and haggard much more swiftly than she would have liked. It is here that legend takes over.

According to one popular tale, a young maidservant was brushing the Countess's hair when she accidentally pulled it. Angered, Elizabeth struck her across the face, so sharply that she drew blood. Later, looking at the area on which the girl's blood had fallen, the Countess imagined that the skin seemed younger and fresher than the skin around it. She consulted with the witch Darvula and learned that it was imagined in the countryside that the blood of a virgin, accompanied by certain abominable rites, had youth-giving properties. This set Elizabeth off on a bloody and murderous trail. Together with her accomplices, she began to recruit young local girls from the villages round about, ostensibly to work as servants at Csethje, but in reality to be murdered within the castle walls. Each day, the Countess would bathe in their blood in the belief that it returned at least some of her youthful looks. There were accounts of her actually drinking the blood as a restorative medicine.

Most of the girls whom Elizabeth and her cohorts murdered came from the Slovak population of Hungary—girls who were often considered of the "lower order" in society. For a while, the authorities did not overly worry about the disappearance of the girls. The official story was that they had contracted illness and died. For a number of years—roughly between 1601 and 1611—the Countess murdered innumerable servant girls with impunity and without any official enquiry. Many people, particularly in the locality, either knew or suspected what was going on within the castle but none dared voice it. Once a Lutheran pastor spoke out against her, claiming that there was a great and horrific evil going on in Csethje, including cannibal feasts and blood-drinking orgies, and although initially his words fell on largely deaf ears, some people started to pay attention. A legend says that one of the girls who the Countess was about to kill managed to escape and raised the alarm in the surrounding countryside, although this is not extremely likely. What is more likely is that the rumours surrounding the Countess continued to grow until they reached the ears of the Hungarian king, Matthias Corvenus, who had no other option but to investigate. Together with the provincial governor, Count Gryorgi Thurzo, the King invaded Csejthe early in 1611, and within the walls the two men discovered evidence of horrors almost beyond imagining.

In 1611, a series of trials conducted by the King himself were set up and the servants, Darvula and Dorottya Szentes, along with Janos Ujvary, were all found guilty of witchcraft and murder, and were executed. Elizabeth herself was not found guilty of any crime—indeed her noble rank saved her from criminal proceedings—but she was commanded to remain in Csejthe at the pleasure of the Hungarian king. To this end, stonemasons were brought in and Elizabeth was walled up in the apartments where she had committed the majority of her atrocities. Only a small aperture was left through which food could be passed into her. All the windows of that section of the castle were also bricked up, leaving her alone in the darkness. There she was to remain until she died.

On 31st July 1614, Elizabeth (then reputedly age fifty-four) dictated her last will and testament to two priests from the Estergom bishopric. What remained of her family holdings were to be divided between her children, with her son Paul and his descendants receiving the main portion. Shortly afterwards, two of her guards decided that they would try to look at her through the aperture through which she was fed—she was supposedly still the most beautiful woman in all of Hungary. When they looked through, however, they saw only the body of the Countess, lying face down on the floor. The bloody Countess was dead in her lonely, lightless world.

The records concerning Elizabeth Bathory were sealed for one hundred years and her name was forbidden to be mentioned throughout Hungary. The name "Csejthe" became a swear word in the Hungarian tongue and the Slovaks within the borders of the country referred to the Countess obliquely as "the Hungarian whore." The shadow of Elizabeth Bathory fell darkly across her lands for many centuries after her death.

Although there is no real evidence that Bram Stoker used the idea of the "Countess Dracula" in his vampire novel, there is no reason why he should not have known about her. In fact, she may well have served as the template for another Irish writer's vampiric tale. This was Carmilla written by Joseph Sheridan Le Fanu, originally published in 1871 in the magazine The Dark Blue. In this tale, a vampiric older girl subtly and evilly influences the impressionable mind of her younger companion. There are, of course, undertones of lesbianism and bloodlust in the story that provide a tangible link with the "Blood Countess." In her own way, Elizabeth Bathory was as influential to the vampire myth as Vlad Tepes.

The dark and sinister figure of the vampire has proved to be one of the most enduring motifs of horror across the centuries. And this most enduring of monsters looks set to continue its haunting of the minds of men and women for many years to come. Look out into the dark! Is there a shape, shrouded in a black cloak lurking there? The vampire might be closer than you think!

Werewolves

'Tis like the howling of Irish wolves against the moon.

—William Shakespeare,
As You Like It

The wolf is perhaps Man's oldest enemy, with a history that goes back into the dim and distant past. Our earliest ancestors both feared and admired the creature with which they often competed for food. Man feared the wolf's ferocity but admired its cunning; they feared its predatory instinct but admired its stealth and swiftness; they feared its strength and tirelessness but admired its hunting prowess. In many respects, the wolf was the ultimate enemy they wished they could emulate. It is hardly surprising that perhaps some of these early hunters wished that they could take on some of its characteristics in order to aid them in their own hunting or to defend themselves from other predators. Almost as an extension of this wish, man and animal began to merge in the early mind as part of an overall longing to be similar to the creatures that so successfully shared their environment. But how could these desired characteristics be acquired? The answer seemed to be by supernatural means.

Ancient Stories of Transformation

Animus

By using powers from another world, humans could perhaps induce in themselves the strength, cunning, and aggressiveness that they themselves seemed to lack, but that creatures (such as the wolf) had in abundance. This type of transformation—from a squeamish human into a predatory animal—may well have been the preserve of Shamanism and ritual amongst our prehistoric ancestors. Perhaps the Shaman, in the course of such a ritual, may have adopted the animus of a wild animal, may have worn its skin, and may even have appeared animal-like.

Sorcerer of Trois Freres

These Shamanistic traits seem to be illustrated in the famous figure known as the "Sorcerer of Trois Freres," a cave drawing from the Palaeolithic period, discovered in a deep cave system beneath the Pyrenees. The wall painting depicts the "Sorcerer" as a curious creature—a hybrid of both human and animal. He appears to be in some sort of dancing posture, moving sideways and upright on human feet but slouched forward as if ready to drop into a four-legged stance, balancing himself on bear-like forepaws. Large antlers adorn his head, above a bearded, human-like face from which intelligent eyes stare owlishly out. But at his hindquarters, a bushy wolf's tail is clearly visible, swinging back to reveal a lion-like phallus. The cavern in which this peculiar painting has been created can only be approached by crawling almost horizontally through a connecting tunnel of about thirty or forty yards. Cultural historians such as Joseph Campbell have suggested that this awkward positioning of the painting is suggestive of a mystical and religious aspect. It is also suggestive of Palaeolithic suppositions of humans taking on the attributes of either animal hunters or of quarry. It is not hard to imagine the Shaman, pelted in animal skins, dancing in some remote cavern in order to call down the animalistic spirits that would ensure good hunting and plentiful communal larders.

Romulus and Remus

Arguably, it was the wolf that attracted much of early man's attention. Like humans, wolves were communal animals—they lived and hunted in packs, they obeyed strict laws of leadership, and they cared for their young. It was not surprising that, as societies developed, some ancient legends concentrated on linkages between men and wolves rather than on their aggression and adversity. Therefore, stories of children being raised by kindly wolves—children such as Romulus and Remus, the founding fathers of Rome—also became widespread in the ancient world. There seems little doubt that there were occurrences of children being raised by female wolves—who are, in many respects, maternal creatures—and indeed similar instances continue in remote parts of the world today. Tales of feral children, raised by wolves, living in the wild and exhibiting wolf-like behaviour must have strengthened the links between men and wolves, deep in the human mind.

Gilgamesh

So the wolf became both a predator and companion within Mankind's psyche. Elements of this confusion underpins old mythological tales emerging from the early civilizations. Interestingly, all of them involve men turning into (or being turned into) animals. From Greek legend comes the story of Actaeon, the youth who secretly glimpsed the huntress-god Artemis when she was bathing. In anger, she changed him into a stag and he was immediately torn to pieces by his own hounds. Perhaps even older is the Akkadian legend taken from the Epic of Gilgamesh, dated around the second millennium B.C., of a young shepherd who makes continual sacrifices to the goddess Ishtar. Even so, the capricious goddess transforms him into a wolf, and similar to Actaeon, he his torn to shreds by his own dogs. This tale is probably the oldest known tale of such a transformation, from man to wolf.

Artemis

The Greek goddess, Artemis, is also an interesting figure. To both the Greeks and the Romans (to whom she was known as Diana), she is a predatory hunting goddess, sometimes described as a "mistress of the animals."

But she also had another personification—that was as Phoebe or Selene (Luna in Latin), the goddess of the moon. She was considered to be a secretive and vicious entity, ruling the earth during the day and the sky at night. This creates a link between the predatory hunters (many of whom were nocturnal) and the moon, which provided them with light. Another of Artemis's incarnations was as the goddess Hecate, Mistress of the Underworld, and in this incarnation she is sometimes presented with three feral heads—usually those of wolves. This may have given rise to the legend of Cerebus, the monstrous triple-headed dog (or wolf) that guarded the Gates of Hell. This motif, however, gave the goddess sovereignty over the three main elements of the physical world—the air, the earth, and the Underworld. It is possible that in her original incarnation, Artemis may have been either a bear-goddess or a wolf-goddess, giving her a connection to the Palaeolithic period and the skin-swathed Shamans and animalistic rituals of that time.

Laignech Falead

As the civilizations of the world began to grow and develop, so their legends grew and developed with them—particularly the legend of the werewolf. Many of these legends, however, sought to connect with the warrior/hunter past. For example, there was a persistent belief in Ireland almost up until the 14th century that a tribe of wolf-men known as the Laignech Faelad dwelt somewhere in County Tipperary. Details of them appear in a very ancient manuscript, the Coir Animann, but are sceptically dismissed by the English historian William Camden in the 16th century. They were reputedly employed as mercenaries by the Celtic kings of Ireland when they made war on each other, and their ferocity and guile was seemingly unsurpassed. They were said to demand payment for their services in the form of flesh from young infants, which they divided and devoured amongst themselves.

Berserkers

The Vikings, too, had tales of Berserkers, ferocious warriors who devoured the flesh of their slain victims and smeared themselves in the blood of the slain. It is from these people that the word "berserk," meaning "uncontrollable," originates.

Certain of these berserkers wore animal skins, to add to their ferocious appearance and to terrify their enemies. An early description of these warriors comes from the Icelandic historian and mythologist Snorri Sturluson (1170–1241). In his Ynglinga Saga—a history of Sweden from extremely early time—she described the followers of the god Odin as those "who went without their mail coats and were mad as hounds or wolves, bit their shields, and were as strong as bears or bulls. They slew men but neither fire nor iron had effect upon them. This is called berserkganger (going berserk)." The word berserk itself comes from two root sources. The first part "ber" from the animal itself—the bear—and serker—shirt—implying that these men probably wore bearskin shirts to imbue themselves with frenzy. Similar groupings of warriors are to be found in Germanic traditions as well, where they were considered to be extremely fearless and vicious in battle. The idea of fierce warrior cults draped in bear or wolf skins probably strengthened the links between man and beast and added considerably to the idea that a man might transform himself into an animal.

Lykaon

One other aspect of ancient lore needs to be mentioned—the mysterious ritual on the top of Mount Lykaon, a remote spot in the highlands of Acadia in the Peloponnesus peninsula in ancient Greece. Mention of this place and the clandestine rituals that were held there comes from the Greek writer Pausanius. At the time of his writing, the lower slopes of this high country were enclosed by thick forests that were the natural abode of predatory wolves. The mountains, however, were bare and rocky and it was here that sacrifices were made to the sky god—the Lykaian Zeus. Pausanius refuses to divulge the ritual surrounding the sacrifice, but there is a suggestion that it may well have been human. In fact, the "Lykaian Zeus" may very possibly have been a much older, more feral god than the familiar deities of Classical Greece. Furthermore, it was believed that one of the participants in the ritual would be turned into a wolf for a specified period of nine years, provided he or she avoided eating human flesh during that period. If not, the unfortunate would remain in the wolf shape forever. This transformation was associated with a myth that a legendary king of Arcadia, King Lykaon, had sacrificed a baby to Zeus and was turned into the shape of a wolf for this crime. Another connected story tells of an Arcadian boxer named Damarchus who was a champion of the Olympic Games around 400 B.C., after having been changed into a wolf and then back to human form nine years later. Whilst not doubting Lykaon's original vile sacrifice, Pausanius doubts the notion of animal transformation. Whilst the Arcadian Olympic team may have had an unnaturally hirsute boxer in its ranks, the writer does not truly believe that he was once a wolf. However, many other Greeks were not so sceptical—Arcadia was an enclosed and mysterious world. The mountains that surrounded it had protected it from battles. Arcadia had retained its own dialect and superstitions—its inhabitants were believed to have a long pedigree and were immersed, or so the surrounding Greeks thought, in primal magic and witchcraft. To such people, the idea of a man becoming a wolf would not have seemed an impossibility.

Lunatics

As we have seen, from early times there has been a link between such transformations—particularly those into wolves—with the moon. The goddess Artemis, as the "Mistress of Animals" and sometimes portrayed as having a wolf's head, was also the goddess of the moon. In a sense, such a connection is understandable. Most of the more vicious predators were nocturnal, hunting by moonlight. Furthermore, animals such as wolves seemed particularly drawn to the moon, frequently howling at it in chorus. And even as late as the early 19th century, the forces of the moon were often associated with frenzied or irrational behaviour in humans. In fact, the description "lunatic" comes from the French lune, meaning the moon. Moonlight, it was held, had a certain influence on the human mind, robbing it of reason and allowing primordial passions and rages to come to the surface. What better connection, then, to ferocious behaviour than a full moon that could transform a seemingly cultured man into a ravening beast? The myth of the beast-man, influenced by the moon, was beginning to take shape.

Christianity and Lycanthropy

Christianity added a further complication. Important to this faith was the consumption of blood and flesh through the Mystery of the Sacrament. The Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation, which was widely accepted by the Church around the ninth century and fully adopted by the Council of Lateran in 1215, spelled out at length that the bread and wine consumed at the Mass actually became the literal blood and body of Christ at the moment of ingestion by the communicant. To emphasise this point, the priest muttered "hoc est Corpus Christi" as he placed the Holy Wafer on the tongue of those crouched by the altar rail. The idea of eating flesh and drinking blood was therefore not incompatible with strict church doctrine. What was incompatible was the thought of men supernaturally turning into the beasts of the field.

The Church's response to many of the old Pagan beliefs was rather piecemeal. To the dismay of many religious leaders, a number of major Pagan festivals and processions continued long into the Christian period.

Fertility Rituals

Writing in the 6th century, Cesarius of Arles noted with alarm, the fertility processions during the January calends (celebrating the beginning of the year—from which we get the word calendar), in which some of the participants dressed in the skins of stags, sheep, goats, and sometimes hounds and wolves. The purpose of these disguises was to ensure prosperity and plenty throughout the coming year, but Cesarius was appalled and disgusted at the apparent loss of humanity amongst the participants in Arles. Their behaviour was similar to the beasts that they represented; they howled, they roared, and they copulated in the open in a state of euphoria that approached ecstasy. The churchman lost no time criticizing them and urging them to turn to the more spiritual and serene ways. Even so, the sight of normally cultured people indulging in animalistic behaviour must have shaken both him and others.

The Wild Hunt

In some parts of Europe, the Church contended with other animalistic traditions—this was the notion of the Wild Hunt. Reference to this occurs in accounts from all over Europe—France, England, Spain, Germany and Scandinavia.

The Hunt was a nightly cavalcade—sometimes of the dead, sometimes of supernatural creatures—led by some mysterious and mythological figure. In some areas that figure was Odin, in others Berthold, Herne, or Frau Perchta. Female entities that led the Hunt evoked memories of Artemis or Diana and provided a distinct connection between Greek myth and the legends of the Celts and Germanic peoples. These nightly chases were usually carried out when the moon was full and were usually confined either to the deep forests or remote mountains, reinforcing Man's fear of the dark and the deep woods. Such traditions stretched back into the mists of antiquity and there was little that the church could do against them, except to condemn them as the works of the Devil. Those who were swept up in their passing became the property of the Enemy of All Mankind. They lost all vestiges of their holy humanity—Man had been created in the image of God—and became as animals, feral and ferocious.

The Black Death

Such diabolism was expanding with the spread of the forest. In the late 1340s and early 1350s, a terrible disease took the countries of Western Europe in its fetid grasp. This was the Black Death—a deadly mixture of bubonic, pneumonic, and septicaemic plagues—and it is estimated that it killed somewhere between 25 and 45 percent of Europe's population. Whole villages were decimated at a single stroke; towns became tombs for the victims of the disease. Many of the 25 million who died were of the labouring poor and those who worked on the land, so as a result, one of the Death's first victims was the rural economy. Crops rotted in the fields, livestock died for want of care and, more importantly, the forests that had been cut back, began to expand again. And with the growth of cover, the wolf population began to increase. As they competed for food, wolf packs became more and more aggressive, particularly during the cold winter months when game was scarce. From time to time, starving wolf packs would attack human settlements, adding to the general notion that they were vicious killers with a taste for human flesh. In some cases, the Church taught that such attacks were a direct chastisement from God on a sinful world. If men behaved like animals, then they would be judged like animals.

British/Celtic Wolflore

Wehrwulf/Wodfreca

The first usage of the word "werewolf" occurs in English and in a Biblical context. It is referenced in the Ecclesiastical Ordinances of Cnut, a Danish king who ruled a great part of England between 1017 and 1035. The term "wehrwulf" is used in a passage that has little connection with a human transforming into a wolf. The text involved is Matthew 7:15. "Beware of false prophets, which come to you in sheep's clothing, but inwardly they are ravening wolves." The author of the Ordnance—intriguingly named Wulfstan—urges both priests and bishops to be vigilant in protecting their flocks (congregation) "in order that the ravening werewolf should not too widely devastate their spiritual flocks. In his exposition, the holy man uses the rare Saxon term "wodfreca" (wod meaning "bold" and freca meaning "grasping" or "greedy" alongside the term "wehrwulf." This has been translated by some scholars as the Saxon equivalent of berserker—a wild, vicious man who lived in the woods. By using the adjective wodfreca, Wulfstan drew a clear connection between the unchristian person and the wild ravening animal. Later in Saxon England, the term was used to describe any form of outlaw or outcast. These people were associated with viciousness and bloody slaughter; a butcher who gave no mercy. The notion of the wild, wolfish man was becoming deeply entrenched in Christian as well as Pagan mythology.

Irish Wolfhounds

It was in Ireland that a written werewolf legend made its appearance. With its deep woodlands and open boggy stretches, Ireland was especially plagued by wolves. So bad was the problem that in 1652, Oliver Cromwell issued an edict at Kilkenny forbidding the export of Irish Wolfhounds, that had been specially bred to deal with the predator. Wolf hunts were common throughout the country—an old ballad "MacDermott" described one of them in Munster. This may have been a reference to the "Black and Tan" hunt that rode through Ireland in medieval times, killing wolves as it met them. Around the 1650s, there were stories of travellers around Lough Neagh in the North being attacked by packs of wild wolves as they walked towards Belfast. An old travel book entitled, The Travels of Cosmo written in 1669, describes Ireland as Wolfland because of the number of the animals that were to be found there. It is not surprising that early tales of werewolves come from Ireland.

Giraldus de Barri

The writer of the story is Giraldus de Barri (called Giraldus Cambrenisis or Gerald of Wales), a churchman and a member of the ruling Norman aristocracy in England. His book, A History and Topography of Ireland (sometimes referred to as Irish Wonders and Miracles), was written around 1187. For many 12th century Englishmen, travelling to Ireland was similar to travelling to another planet—it was a mysterious and apparently hostile place. Yet Giraldus had journeyed there in the retinue of Prince John (then Lord of Ireland and to whom he acted as Confessor) and during the course of his stay he visited his distant relatives, the Fitzgeralds of Wicklow.

If Giraldus had a failing it was that he was far too credulous and believed everything that he was told. For instance, he believed that washing one's hair in a certain well in Meath would restore greying hair to its natural colour; or that somewhere in the country was a lake in which the fish had teeth of gold. Two other tales, however, interested him greatly—one concerning a man-ox that had been brought to his relative's castle and the other an old werewolf tale that was widely told. The incident, he specifically asserts, occurred three years before Prince John's expedition to Ireland, around 1182 or 1183.

Clan Altan

A certain priest, travelling from Ulster to Meath on church business, had set up camp for the night in a forest on the borders of Meath. He and his only companion, a small boy, were resting beside the fire when they were greatly shocked and alarmed at the appearance of a large wolf in the forest. More shockingly, the animal spoke to them, telling them that they really should have no fear of it. Despite this reassurance, the priest still had a fear of the creature. However, he questioned the animal and heard a strange tale.

The wolf was in fact a man. He and his wife were members of Clan Altan, a group of people who inhabited a village in the Diocese of Ossory and who had run from a certain irascible saint—the Abbot Natalis who had cursed them all. The terms of the curse were this: every seven years two of the Clan (a man and a woman) were exiled from their community and forced to take the shape of wolves for seven years. They might be hunted down or attacked by other wolves, but if they survived that period, they would be allowed to return to their village and resume their human form. Two others, however, would then take their place.

The wolf told the priest that his companion was ill and likely to die and the creature wished the holy man to come and minister to her in her final hours. Although still terrified, the priest followed the werewolf to a hollow tree deep in the forest, where his mate lay. She too behaved in an almost human way although the cleric was still wary. Was he correct in administering the Offices of the Church to such an inhuman creature? He completed most of the Rites of the Church without offering the final communion. Then, using the male werewolf's paw like a hand, he cut through the skin, peeling it back and revealing the face of an elderly woman underneath. The cleric, now convinced of the creatures' humanity, offered her the Blessed Sacrament, which she received with due penance and devotion. The werewolf then escorted him back to his camp and after uttering several prophesies concerning the English who were living in Ireland, disappeared back into the forest promising to meet the priest upon his return from Meath. The holy man, however, was delayed, and never saw him again.

Although Giraldus insisted that the story was uniquely Irish, there are several familiar elements from other cultures. For example, the period of the seven years of Natalis's curse reflects the nine years of werewolfery in the Lykaian myth from ancient Greece. Two similar stories turn up in other sources—one from an Irish/ Scandinavian tradition where the 13th century Kongs Skuggsjo (Speculum Regale) states that St. Patrick turned members of a certain Clan who opposed his teachings, into wolves, their condition lasting for seven years. The second is a fragmentary tale from the Harz Mountain region in present-day Germany, in which a number of "Godless people" are turned into wolves for seven years by an irate St. Willibrod because they worshipped Pagan deities in the form of standing stones.

One current theme runs through Giraldus's account and the other stories as well as the Lykaian legend—that the transformation of a person into a wolf is the result of a curse, placed upon the unfortunates either by primal gods or by Christian holy men. It is doubtful that many early clerics used the notion of the "beast lurking within" to symbolize the more ferocious aspects of human nature as opposed to Christian charity and culture.

Marie de France

Another contemporary besides Giraldus was Marie de France, a Norman writer who produced a series of lais (epic poems) concerning various aspects of early medieval French life. Much of her work contains a stern moral theme and, although little is known about her, it is quite possible that Marie herself may have been a nun who mixed with the troubadours at the Gascon court.

The Lai of Bisclavret

One of these poems, The Lai of Bisclavret, is centred around a garwaf, that Marie describes as a werewolf-like creature known to the Normans. The name "Bisclaveret" itself is something of a linguistic puzzle. Marie insists that it is Breton and indeed it seems to derive from two Breton words bisc meaning "short" and laveret "wearing breeches." This may refer to other stories of fierce little men, dwelling in the woods, who wore breeches of animal skins and attacked travellers as they passed through the French forests. Such a motif is an adaptation of the Wild Men of the Woods that appears in the myths of many lands, including England. Other linguists have intriguingly linked the name to the ancient Breton bleiz lavaret (speaking wolf) or bleiz laveret (thinking wolf).

Garwaf

The protagonist of The Lai of Bisclavret is a Breton knight, considered to be extremely brave, and also married to a beautiful lady. He is, however, surrounded by a mystery. For three whole days each week, he disappears without explanation from his castle, apparently departing into the deep woodlands. These continued disappearances both alarmed and upset his wife who begged him to tell her where he went. Seeing her obvious distress, he finally relented and explained to her that he was a garwaf and must go into the forest for three days each week in order to take the shape of a wolf. As soon as he laid aside his clothes, the transformation occurred. His disclosure only further alarmed his wife who was determined to be rid of him. In order to do this, she planned to steal his clothes (without which he could not return to human form but must remain a wolf forever) and got the nobleman to divulge where he left them—in a hollow stone, concealed by a bush near an ancient chapel deep in the forest. The lady then contacted a former paramour who became her lover and persuaded him to steal the clothes, thus condemning the knight to the permanent wolf-form.

A year passed and Bisclavret had not returned from the forest. The woodlands were searched but nothing was found. It was assumed that he was dead. His former wife married her lover and gradually his name began to fade from memory. The king, however, was hunting through the forest when his huntsmen found a wolf and his hounds seized upon it. The king, however, showed mercy and spareed the creature, taking it back to the palace as a pet. There it became a favourite of the court, earning many friends by its good nature and gentleness. One day, the monarch gave a great feast, and amongst those invited was the new husband of Bisclavret's former wife. As soon as it saw the nobleman, the wolf's mood suddenly changed. Far from being kind and gentle, it turned ferociously on the visitor, leaping upon him and sinking its fangs into him to the astonishment of everyone present. The king himself managed to drive the animal back with a stick, allowing the treacherous knight to escape further injury. Because the creature was so amiable and the attack so unexpected, many began to suspect that there was more to the matter and the king decreed that the incident was to be fully investigated.

First, however, there was to be a hunt, and once more they passed through the woods near Bisclavret's former castle. As they camped there, many of the local nobility came to pay their respects to the monarch, including Bisclavret's former wife. As she entered the king's presence, the placid wolf at his side changed once more and sprang forward to attack her, biting off her nose in its ferocity (a common torture in the medieval world). The courtiers managed to beat the creature off. Then one of the king's counsellors, noted for his wisdom, pointed out that the wolf had never attacked anyone save that woman, and her second husband. He also reminded the monarch that this was the wife of a brave knight who had disappeared in mysterious circumstances. The king enforced his decree and investigated further.

Under torture, the hapless pair revealed what happened. The lady admitted that she had been responsible for the theft of her first husband's clothes from the hollow stone near the abandoned abbey. The king ordered the return of the garments and when they were brought, he placed them in front of the wolf, which at first shied away from them. The wise counsellor told the king that, because it was a shameful thing, the transformation from wolf back to man must be done in secret with no-one watching. So the king took the wolf back to the royal bedroom and left it alone with the clothes. Shortly afterwards the brave and handsome knight emerged from the room and the king rushed forward and celebrated his return to humanity with great joy. Bisclavert was confirmed in his lands and his treacherous former wife and her husband were banished from the kingdom. They went to live in a distant land where they raised many noseless children.

Although Marie de France treated Bisclavret sympathetically, she was at pains to point out that the garwaf was a terrifying creature. She described it as a "beste salvage." Bisclavret revealed that he hunted in the woods by night, similar to a beast of prey, killing and devouring, doing great harm, and that he had a desire to attack and kill humans. She also told of the king's terror when, during the hunt that captured Bisclavret, he was confronted by the cornered wolf. She described the ferocity of the creature as it attacked its former wife, ripping away her nose.

Gorlagon

This lai dates from the 12th century, but it is probably based on an older Breton folktale. Indeed, several ancient Celtic stories contain roughly the same themes concerning the werewolf, one of which is the Welsh Arthurian legend of Gorlagon. This story has many variations, but in a generally-accepted Latin version, Arthus is challenged by his queen to discover the ways of womankind.

In order to do this, he sets out for the castle of neighbouring King Gargol. Although this king cannot help him, he directs him to the fortress of another local monarch, King Torleil. This king cannot help him any more than the first but directs him even further, to the castle of King Gorlagon. This king agrees to tell him a story that will aid him in his quest, although he will only be slightly wiser at the end of it.

His tale concerns a king with a garden or courtyard in which grew a magic sapling. If this sapling were to be cut and the person who cut it tapped himself upon the head with it whilst reciting a certain spell, he would be transformed into the shape of a wolf. His treacherous wife, who had availed herself of a handsome young lover, managed to discover the secret of this sapling, had it cut, and used it to transform her husband. The werewolf-king fled into the forest where he met with a she-wolf and raised a family of wolf cubs whilst his wife married her paramour. When his cubs were almost fully grown, the werewolf-king entered the town and attacked two princes who were the sons of his former wife and her lover. However, the creatures were pursued back into the forest by the lady's cousins, and the cubs were killed, although the werewolf-king himself escaped.

Maddened by the slaughter of his offspring, the werewolf-king began to attack the settlements of local shepherds, decimating their flocks. He was hunted and chased out to another land where he was no more welcome. Travelling to a third country, he found a refuge for himself in a deep wood where he thought he might be safe. However, one night he overheard two locals saying that the king was coming that way to hunt the werewolf-king. It is here that the legend begins to closely follow the tale of Bisclavret, in that the wolf managed to stop the king en route to the hunt and convince the monarch not to kill him. He further persuaded the king and his retinue that he was a friendly wolf, and he became much loved by them—almost a pet. Nevertheless, the king's wife does not approve of the animal, and whilst her husband was away, she mistreated it. At the same time, she was conducting an affair with one of the servants, thus cuckolding the king himself. One night whilst they were engaged in their lovemaking, the wolf attacked them, inflicting deep wounds upon the servant. In order to retaliate, the queen locked her own son in the deepest dungeon and swore that the wolf had eaten him and had even attacked the servant who had tried to defend him. The wolf, however, managed to get the king to follow him to the deep dungeon where the prince was discovered unharmed and the queen's treachery was exposed. When the boy revealed what had happened, the servant, who was also involved in the plot, was hanged whilst the queen was pulled apart after being tied between wild horses, and her remains burnt.

It was now becoming apparent that the wolf was more than simply a dumb animal, and that it possessed an almost human intelligence. The king came to the conclusion that it might be a man in a bewitched state and he asked the creature to lead him to its own country. The wolf led him to his native land where it was discovered that the evil queen and her new husband had become fearful despots. The king invaded with a mighty army and forced the queen and her husband to surrender. Threatened with torture, the queen confessed what she had done to her former husband and was made to fetch the magic sapling and turn the wolf back into her husband.

Impressed by the tale, Arthur was determined to know if it was true. "Who is the mad-looking woman who sits opposite you?" he asked Garlagon, "Who weeps over a bloody head set on a platter before her and which she kisses whenever you kiss your wife?" "That," explained the king, "is the treacherous queen. For I was the werewolf in the tale that I've just recounted. The two foreign countries in the story are those ruled over by my two brothers Gargol and Torleil. My former wife was not killed but is condemned to carry the severed head of the lover with whom she betrayed me everywhere she goes. I remarried and decreed that every time I kissed my new wife, she should kiss the dead lips of the man who seized my throne. In this way, the country would be reminded both of her great wickedness and of my absolute rule."

This tale contains a number of interesting elements. The names of the three kings are significant. Each one of them is a name for a werewolf. Gorlagon is a variant of the Old Welsh word Garlion, signifying a creature that is half man, half wolf, similar to the Norman garwaf. It is probable that in the original tale (for the story is much older than the Arthurian legend) the three kings were one man. And the original tale, some scholars have suggested, may be the one (or a similar one) to that which Marie de France used for her Bisclavret lai.

Eastern Creatures

During the medieval period, travel to places on the very edge of, or beyond Europe, began to increase with those who brought back fantastic tales of places and creatures that they had found. They also encountered Crusaders, returning from what is today the Middle East, and recounted stories of fabulous and exotic realms inhabited by strange breeds of people who often defied conventional physiology. Those who journeyed further East returned with descriptions of races that almost defied imagination. There were tales of giants and pygmies; of Troglodytes—squat little men who dwelt in caverns far beneath the deserts of Ethiopia; of the Anthropophagi and Laestrygonians—wild and ferocious men who dwelt on remote islands in the Aegean and who ate human flesh (descriptions of these had existed since Greek times); of Amazons—a fierce tribe of women who lived around the headwaters of a mighty river away to the West; of Sciopods—one-legged creatures who lay around protecting themselves from the sun's rays by shading their bodies with a gigantic single foot; of the Astomi, who did not eat as they had no mouths, but lived on the smell of rotting apples; of the Cylcops—one eyed giants who killed and devoured all those who came near; and of the Panotii, men with exceptionally long ears in which they could wrap themselves as they slept. The whole bizarre panoply sounded similar to science fiction. Amongst these monstrous races, perhaps the best known, were the Cynocephali—the Dog Heads—creatures with the bodies of men but with the heads of dogs. Accounts of them had existed since the days of the writer Pliny, who located them somewhere in India. They had no understandable speech but barked like hounds in order to communicate with each other. They were extremely primitive, little more than prehistoric hunters, dressed in animal skins and dwelling in caves. Their crude weapons consisted of bows, spears, and javelins, but they were regarded as ferocious fighters. Many legends of their viciousness had been circulating for a long time, probably since the days of Alexander the Great and certainly well before the Middle Ages. As time went on, however, many of their attributes became exaggerated—their feral nature, their guile and cunning, their enormous and rending teeth. Their cries, echoing through the mountains and canyons where they lived may have sounded similar to "bar-bar," and this may have been one of the sources from which the Greeks devised the word "barbarian" describing what they considered to be the uncouth and uncultured peoples whom they encountered. The notion of a Dog-Headed race of men may have evolved from baboons with their hairy bodies and long dog-like muzzles, glimpsed by those travelling East—creatures that displayed at least some characteristics but also showed immense ferocity. The idea of bestial races or of men somehow transforming themselves into wild animals—particularly the wolf—was drawing more closely together.

The Church's Position on Evil

How did the church react to such alleged discoveries? It has often been said that if life were to be found on other planets, then the modern church would have to re-evaluate its perspectives, and so it was with its medieval counterpart. The Dog-Heads in particular (a widespread and popular tale), caused ancient clerics some concern. Although the 11th century "Theodore" Psalter (now held in the British Library) contains an illustration of Christ preaching to a group of dog-headed figures, this was uncommon in the medieval world.

Dogs

For Christian thinkers, the dog or wolf represented the feral, uncontrollable element in Man as opposed to the cultured, compassionate Christian that their teachings sought to encourage. Of special significance to them was a verse of Scripture, taken from the Psalms and said to depict the Passion of Christ. Psalm 22 v. 16 states, "For dogs have encompassed me; the assembly of the wicked have enclosed me." Now this passage lends itself to a number of interpretations, but for some of the early Fathers, these words were to be taken literally, and as an oblique reference to the Dog-Heads of foreign shores. They were evil and were opposed to God and his servants, almost beyond the Word of God. Even though there were suggestions that some of the Dog-Heads might have been Christianised through the interventions of the Apostles (there was even a suggestion that St. Christopher had originally been a Pagan Dog-Head named Reprobus before becoming converted), this was not generally accepted. The Dog-Heads were too far off base to understand the sacred precepts of the Christian message. But although they were considered to be well "beyond the Pale" of the Christianised world, the popularity of the Dog-Head legends showed no signs of diminishing. Indeed, in 1430, a map of the world was drawn up by medieval cartographers that showed a people known as the Beni Chelib, living in Ethiopia under a Saracen king called Ebinichebel, all of whom were dog-headed. This seems to be a deliberate attempt to equate the vicious and war-like Dog-Heads with the developing religion of Islam, considered to be Christianity's main competitor in the Eastern lands. The notion of the sinful, hostile werewolf, associated with dark, foreign, customs and practices was now gaining ground.

At the end of the 15th century, Europe stumbled uncertainly towards the first glimmerings of the Enlightenment. In such a period, the Church tried desperately to exercise its former power over the hearts and minds of its people whilst they in turn and, in the face of mounting social change, tried to cling to the certainties that had sustained them through the last thousand years. This was the period of the great European witch hunts, as old superstitions made one final assault on the popular mind. It was believed that the end of the world was approaching and the Devil was loose, working through his agents to ensure the downfall of the Godly. The first stirrings of Protestantism vied with Catholicism for the hearts and minds of men and women before it fractured and splintered into various sects, only adding to the spiritual confusion of the time. In an attempt to promote Catholic unity, the Church turned on the enemy in its midst—witches and evil-workers. Pope Innocent VIII (1484–1492), seeking to divert attention from the apathy and worldliness of the Papacy, turned his attention to the Mainz and Treves regions of Germany where ancient practices were still said to flourish. It was Pope Innocent who commissioned the churchmen Heinrich Kramer and Jacobus Sprenger to draw up what was to become the infamous witchcraft manual of the Holy Inquisition—the Malleus Maleificarum (the Hammer of the Witch). Kramer, who had been Chief Inquisitor in the Tyrol, was well versed in ideas about witchcraft and used them to embellish the sinister volume. The book was used as a means of detecting, judging and despatching witches and was widely used by witch-finders everywhere. Even today, long after the witch persecutions have ceased, it is still a best-seller. In conjunction with Malleus, Innocent issued a Papal Bull against witchcraft and in doing so started a hysteria which would rumble on for almost two hundred years.

Witches/Shapeshifters

Throughout the latter half of the 16th century and most of the 17th, witches were everywhere. They had magical powers—one of which was to transform themselves into other forms, usually those of animals. Back in the 12th century, Giraldus deBarri had confidently asserted that it was within the power of all Irish woman to change themselves into hares and stoats in order to drink milk from the udders of cows (a belief that was still held in many Irish rural areas at the beginning of the 20th century), and soon animal transformations had become part and parcel of the witch belief. Witches, it was widely believed, went about the countryside in animal disguises, seeking to do harm against their neighbours. Potions and unguents were used in order to transform them into the guise of stoats, weasels, cats, ravens, and other creatures. Witches galloped around the countryside in the guise of horses, trampling crops and breaking down fences or gnawing through grain sacks in the guise of mice. The forms that they could take were endless, and it was not very long before the wolf was added to this list.

Peter Stubb

Perhaps one of the most celebrated werewolf cases of the late 16th century was that of Peter Stubb (alternately spelt Stubbe, Stumpf, or Stube), the werewolf of Cologne, Germany, whose trial took place in 1589. The widespread knowledge of the case can be attributed to the pamphlets, detailing many of his horrendous crimes, that circulated throughout Europe, and were translated into a number of languages. A number of learned writers of the time, such as Martin Del Rio, subsequently made comments on the case, adding to its notoriety.

Witchcraft was involved in the transformation—the dark powers centering around a magic belt with which, by buckling it around his waist, Stubb could transform himself into a ravening wolf. He was described in A True Discourse Declaring the Damnable Life and Death of One Stubbe Peter," an anonymous pamphlet published in 1590, as "strong and mighty, with eyes great and large, that in the night sparkled like brands of fire; a mouth great and wide, with the most sharp and cruel teeth; a huge body and mighty paws. And no sooner would he put off the same girdle, but presently he should appear in his former shape, according to the proportion of a man as if he had never been changed." Whilst in his wolf shape, Stubb was incredibly ferocious, viciously attacking a number of people who crossed his path and then escaping into the surrounding countryside, easily outdistancing the hounds that were sent after him. It was alleged that his first choice of prey, whilst in the wolf shape, was human but if he could not find any, he would attack the sheep and cattle of his neighbours. He had, it was stated, murdered no less than thirteen young children and savaged at least two pregnant women, ripping the unborn babies from their wombs in order to devour them. The horror of his attacks could not be overemphasized. In addition to these bestial crimes, he was accused of incest with both his sister and daughter, and of actually murdering his own son whilst in human form and of eating the boy's brains in order to staunch "his greedy appetite."

Whilst in his wolf-form, Stubb was cornered in some fields near the town of Bedbur by a pack of hounds that had been sent against him. In order to elude them, he removed the magic belt and appeared simply as an ordinary traveller, walking towards the town and leaning on his staff. But those who were following the hounds claimed that they had never taken their eyes from the wolf and had seen the miraculous transformation. Stubb was arrested and, under strict torture, gave a full account of his abominable life. The magic belt, however, was not found and (under torture) Stubb admitted to having abandoned it "in a certain valley," just before he had been captured. The valley was searched but nothing was discovered and it was assumed that the Devil (whose servant Stubb was supposed to be) had reclaimed it.

Stubb's case had now become so celebrated that he could not escape the full rigor of the law. Every horrid detail of the affair had shocked the populace of Germany and beyond. He was sentenced to be strapped to a wheel and large sections of his flesh were ripped from the bone using red-hot pliers. His arms and legs were then smashed with a wooden axe, after which he was finally decapitated and his corpse was burnt on the same pyre as those of his daughter and mistress, who had also been executed for their crimes. After the execution, a memorial was set up in Bedbur consisting of a long pole pushed through the broken execution wheel and with the likeness of a wolf, framed in wood near its summit. On the very top, however, Stubb's head was impaled as a warning to all who might be tempted to follow him and take on the guise of a wolf. Around this grisly reminder were hung sixteen pieces of wood, representing the sixteen victims whom Stubb was alleged to have murdered as a werewolf.

Although this German werewolf was perhaps the best known, it was in France that many of the trials for lycanthropy occurred. Indeed, contemporary with and even before Stubb was brought to trial in Bedbur, there were several notable French trials, including that of the famous Gilles Garnier.

Gilles Garner

Gilles Garnier, the "hermit of St. Bonnot," ranks as one of the earliest and most famous French werewolves. During the early 1570s, he was dwelling in great poverty, along with his wife in the rough and wooded countryside of Armanges, near the town of Dole. He was not a native of the area, having initially come from Lyon, and he was considered odd and rather belligerent in his ways. About the time he came to live at Armanges, a large wolf began to prey on the flocks of local shepherds, spreading fear and alarm. Additionally, several children were carried off to be devoured in the forest—witnesses claimed that a werewolf was responsible. As time passed, such attacks became more and more frequent, to the alarm of many of the parents in the area. Naturally, suspicion fell upon the surly anti-social hermit dwelling in the woods, but there was not enough concrete evidence to confront him. However, the local parlement (governing body) did take some action. It issued a proclamation that the populace should assemble with pikes, arquebuses, sticks, and halberds to hunt, seize, and kill the werewolf. The vigilante assembly soon hunted down its prey in November 1573. It was reported that a little girl was rescued from the jaws of a wolf in La Poupee meadow, between Authune and Chastenoy. She had been badly mauled by the creature and her shocked rescuers thought that they recognized human features on the wolf as they drove it off. For many, the animal bore an uncanny resemblance to the misanthropic hermit of St. Bonnot. The parlement at Dole ordered that he be arrested and questioned. Garnier's confession (perhaps elicited under torture) gave a graphic and horrifying account of his activities as a werewolf. Much of the gruesome details concerned the murder and devouring of two children in particular—two boys, ages ten and twelve years of age, one of whom he had killed in the locality of Dole and the other (in August 1570) in a pear-orchard near the village of Perrouze. In this latter case, he had been driven off (still in his wolf form) by the approach of some labourers. In that same October, he had also killed a ten-year-old girl in a wood known as La Serre about a mile or so from Dole. He claimed that he found her flesh "especially sweet" and took some of it home for his wife to eat.

Unlike Stubb, however, Garnier was slightly vague about how he actually transformed himself into an animal. There was no magic belt given to him by the Devil. Rather he seems to have become a wolf through "sorcery" and in most of his evidence, he speaks of "strangling" his victims whilst in his werewolf-guise. Could it be possible that the weak-minded and confused Garnier simply imagined that he became a wolf in order to commit several murders? It is also possible that cannibalism may have been common in some of the more remote parts of Europe than is perhaps commonly supposed, and that the wretched Garnier and his wife might have given in to such abnormal urges in order to survive. Such mental niceties, however, were not taken into account by the officials in Dole, who eventually found the hermit guilty of the most ghastly of werewolf crimes. Ironically, he was not offered the mercy of strangulation before his body was completely burned—an unusually harsh punishment that was said to reflect the awfulness of his offences. It probably also reflected a wide-spread fear of a beast lurking within the midst of a civilized community.

Michael Verdung

Gilles Garnier was not the first werewolf to terrify the French people. Around 1520, three of the creatures had been discovered in the village of

Poligny in the Jura region close to the Swiss Alps. This was a remote and mountainous area and well-suited to tales of the loup-garou, a wolf-like creature that was, in actuality, an evil spirit going about in the form of a massive hound. The first of these wolf-men to be discovered was Michel Verdung (also known as Michael Udon) who had allegedly been wounded whilst in his wolf form by a traveller whom he had attacked. Following the trail of blood, some local men found their way to Verdung's hut, where they found a woman with whom he lived, bathing his fresh wounds. The matter was put in front of the Inquisitor-General at Besancon who commenced a rigorous investigation. Under torture, Verdung implicated another man whom he knew—one Pierre Bourgot, known locally as Big Peter. This man was known for his surly attitude, irascible temper, and strange ways, and it came as no surprise that he should be involved in something so dark and sinister as werewolfery. Under torture himself, Peter confessed to how he had first become a werewolf. Whilst hunting for some sheep that had been scattered by a storm, he was approached by three dark horsemen to whom he told his troubles. One of them promised Bourgot help and contentment if he would agree to serve these three masters and do whatever they asked. Bourgot promptly accepted and found his lost sheep soon afterward. A few days later, the three horsemen arrived at his house to seal the bargain they had made and the one who had spoken revealed himself to be an instrument of the Devil. He made Big Peter deny his Christian birthright and to take an oath to serve Satan by kissing his left hand. Later, Bourgot began to doubt the wisdom of his agreement and as he was considering going to the priest to confess what he had done, Michel Verdung appeared at his door. Verdung informed him that he had been sent by the Devil and promised him gold and great wealth if he would renew his oath of allegiance to the Evil One. He then made Peter disrobe and applied an ointment to him that changed him into the form of a wolf. In this guise, Verdung told him, he could attend the Devil's Sabbat. Verdung was able to restore him to human form by means of another ointment that he (Verdung) kept. When in the wolf form, Peter experienced awful lusts and desires, including the desire to eat human flesh. He had, for example, eaten the flesh of a four-year-old child and had found it sweet and delicious. He had also broken the neck of a nine-year-old girl and had devoured her as well. Not only this, but Verdung had assumed a wolf-shape as well. Not only had he assisted him in his foul crimes, but together they had also copulated with wild female wolves. Faced with such a catalogue of horrors, there could be no other option save execution and burning. The imprint of the werewolf had, however, been set in the popular mind.

Jacques Roulet

Stories of Gilles Garnier and the lycanthropes of Poligny began to circulate around Europe, adding fuel to the fire of the werewolf panic. However, he was not the only French werewolf to arouse both fear and hatred. In the summer of 1598, a soldier walking through the fields near Angers, in the French northwest, together with some local peasants, came across a wild beggar, cowering half-naked in the bushes. Upon pulling him out, they found blood smeared across his hands and face, and pieces of what looked similar to human flesh embedded under his long and filthy finger nails. On searching further, they also found, the body of a murdered fifteen-year-old boy.

The beggar's name was Jacques Roulet and he was both mentally retarded and an epileptic. This did not prevent him from being taken back to Angers to be interrogated. Although there is no record as to whether the interrogation was actually carried out, it probably involved torture and resulted in a full confession of werewolfery to the court of Judge Pierre Herault. Roulet admitted that he had a magic ointment that, when rubbed into his skin, changed him into the form of a wolf. The judge asked him if that meant he was dressed as a wolf, but Roulet denied this. He said that he was an actual animal and that his hands had become rending paws. He could not, however describe his head but thought that whilst his body was that of a wolf, his head remained human. He also confessed to have taken part in the Devil's Sabbat at which others of his kind had participated.

There is no real record of what actually befell Jacques Roulet, following his confession, but it is likely that he was burned—not as a werewolf—but as a witch and a heretic. The court records, containing the details of his abominable crimes, were ordered to be burnt and so only fragments of them survive.

However, the year 1598 seems to have been a particularly troublesome year in France with regard to werewolves, for the weak-minded, flesh-eating beggar was not the only such case in the country. Indeed, this year was to produce a veritable epidemic of werewolf accusations. One of the most notable occurred in Chalons, where a tailor, living within the town boundary, was found to have committed a number of cannibalistic crimes. He attacked children who ventured into or near his place of work. In nearby woods and fields just outside the town, he ate their flesh, which he found particularly succulent. He stored their bones among some chests and barrels at the back of his shop. When these were accidentally discovered, the tailor's game was up. Like Jacques Roulet, the lycanthrope tailor of Chalons was probably sentenced to death and once more the directives of the court were destroyed.

Devil's Sabbat

The notion of the Sabbat tied werewolfery inextricably to witchcraft and to the enemies of the Church. Sabbats were believed to be great gatherings, attended by the vilest of witches and presided over by the Devil himself. Their primary purpose was to do evil, but there was also an element of revelry to them in which the participants often adopted the characteristics of animals—baying, howling, and copulating at random. The whole idea of such gatherings was to strip away all that was good and ordered by God, and to give in to one's primal desires in order to affect great harm on Christian communities. The ravening beast was now seen as an agent of the Evil One and an enemy of all Mankind, to be hunted down and destroyed.

Pierre Gandillion

In the area of Franche-Comte, near the Swiss Alps, not far from Poligny where Michel Verdung and his companion had terrified the populace, a whole family of werewolves had been discovered as well. The region was very remote and was thickly forested with the mountains rising majestically behind it. Two children were picking fruit near the village of St. Claude in Burgundy in the spring of 1598 when one of them, sixteen-year-old Benoit Bidel, momentarily left his younger sister at the foot of a great tree whilst he climbed into its branches. Whilst he was still climbing disaster struck. A "tailless wolf" suddenly sprang from the surrounding forest and attacked the defenseless girl. Benoit, who was armed with a knife that he'd been using for cutting down fruit, jumped to the ground and prepared to defend his sister. The wolf, however, which seemed to have a human face and fur-covered hands, struck the knife away and delivered the boy a fatal blow on the neck. The girl screamed and her cries alerted some peasants who were working in the fields nearby. They found Benoit close to death, but he was able to pass on crucial information concerning the "wolf" before he did so. The workmen now began to search the area and in some woodlands close by, they found a girl, Perrenette Gandillion, wandering among the trees. There were traces of blood on her dress and, both outraged and frightened, the mob tore her to pieces.

The Gandillions lived close by, and now the people of St. Claude turned their attentions upon the family. They had been under suspicion for some time as being witches and Devil-worshipers, and this incident gave the local authorities the excuse they needed to investigate further. Other members were now arrested and brought to trial. Perrenette's sister, Antoinette, was accused of being a werewolf and of being able to create hailstorms that had flattened the crops of her neighbours. She was also accused of having attended a witch's Sabbat where she copulated with the Devil, who had come to her in the guise of a goat. Her brother, Pierre Gandillion, was similarly accused. Subject to swoons and epilepsy, he was said to lie at home in a cataleptic state whilst his spirit roamed through the woods in the guise of a werewolf, doing harm. He was also accused of attending a Sabbat, convened by the Devil and comprised entirely of werewolves. Under torture, he revealed how Satan had given both him and others clothes of wolf's skin that covered their human shape, and had made them run throughout the country on all fours, attacking both humans and animals to satisfy their unholy lusts. Pierre's son, Georges, also confessed to having a salve or ointment that could turn him into a wolf and, together with Perrenette and Antoinette, killing two goats belonging to a neighbour.

Henri Boguet

In the St. Claude cases, a new and slightly sinister figure emerged—Henri Boguet. A Grand Justice for the Franche-Comte region, Boguet was a University-educated lawyer who had made a special study of witchcraft cases. His book Discours des sorciers was an exhaustive (if biased) work that would become the staple text for French witch hunters and magistrates for years after his death in 1619. His record of finding witches in the Franche-Comte and Jura Mountain regions was exemplary. At one stage he boasted that he was responsible for over 600 executions for witchcraft between the years 1598 and 1616. He was especially adept at fining instances of witchcraft amongst the Jews of his area. At the time of the St. Claude cases, his witchcraft book was already in print, and he was widely regarded as France's leading demonologist, but as he investigated the evidence, Boguet decided to release a second edition of the work that would include a lengthy chapter on lycanthropy. He used the Gandillion family as an example of how the Devil could corrupt God's people and turn them into beasts. He said that he had observed members of the family walking on all fours around their cells, just as they had done in the fields, and he observed that Pierre Gandillion was so disfigured that he actually resembled a beast. All of them had shown an appetite for human flesh.

Sawney Bean

Although it is questionable as to whether the Gandillions were indeed werewolves, it may be possible that they were actually cannibals. Indeed, some scholars have argued parallels between those who have been convicted of werewolfery and cases such as that of Sawney Bean and his family in 14th century Scotland. During the reign of the Scottish king James I (1406–1437), Alexander Bean (also known as Sandy or Sawney Bean), a surly and uneducated man, the son of a hedger and ditcher, absconded from his East Lothian home with a woman as brutish and unlettered as himself. Bean is described as insolent and overbearing, and his new partner displayed similar characteristics. They went to live in a deep cave at Bennane Head near Ballintrae, which was then part of Galloway (today it is part of Ayrshire). They would live there for more than 25 years, making little contact with the local villages, so that few knew of their existence. During that time, they sustained themselves and their family by capturing and killing travellers on a nearby moor, taking their bodies back to the cave, and cooking and eating them. It is said that when discovered, the cave resembled "a butcher's kitchen." Sawney and his partner raised a brood of children around them—some of whom were very badly deformed—all of whom had a taste for human flesh. As travellers in the area began to disappear with increasing frequency, the authorities in Ballantrae became alarmed. Word reached the ears of King James and he decided that the matter should be investigated. By now bits and pieces of human remains had washed up along the coast as the Bean's discarded some of their food. To the horror of some of those who found them, they appeared to have been gnawed by human teeth. The King himself now took personal charge of the investigation and ordered a hunt with hounds all along the coastline near Ballintrae. He had heard vague stories of a hermit and his wife who lived somewhere around the area. The hounds and men soon found the concealed entrance to Sawney Bean's cave and recoiled from the horrors that it held. It is said that the King himself was violently sick at the stores of human remains, some of them half-eaten, that were laid out deep in the cavern. Here, too, were piles of clothes, wallets, money, and valuables that the cannibals had stored away without actually realizing the value of what they held. Bean and his family were so used to their cannibalistic lifestyle that they could not understand that they had committed any crime. But in the eyes of the law, they had committed the most abominable of crimes and they were all arrested and taken back to the Tollbooth in Edinburgh. From there, they were taken to Leith where they were formally tried and sentenced to death. So gruesome was the effect of their crimes on the Scottish people that the method of their execution in many ways reflected the horror of their lives. The men were sentenced to have all their limbs amputated and to be allowed to bleed to death whilst the women were to be killed as slowly as possible. Some of Sawney Bean's children died wondering what they had done wrong. The name of Sawney Bean, however, passed into folklore as "the Maneater of Midlothian" and actually spawned a number of stories and plays as well as a Shockfest underground film in the style of "Cannibal Holocaust."

Although he was not classed as a werewolf—rather as a cannibal and a mass murderer—Sawney Bean's case may reflect some of the aspects of the French lycanthropy trials. Lonely men and women such as Gilles Garnier, Sawney Bean, and the Gandillion family, dwelling in the utmost poverty in remote rural areas, may have preyed upon their vulnerable neighbours in order to sustain themselves without having to work. They may have looked on those around them as a ready source of food during desperate times, and therefore cannibalism may well have been much more widespread than we commonly suppose. However, it was men like Henri Boguet who made the connections between the rapacious beast and the agents of evil, and it was they who stoked up the notion of werewolves.

Nicholas Remy

Having burnt the Gandillions, Boguet turned his attention to seeking out other werewolves in the Jura region. It is unclear whether he found any, but his efforts against witches seems to have increased. Numbers of those people brought before the courts for practicing witchcraft grew dramatically. However, although Boguet insisted that werewolves were lurking everywhere in society (he continually cited the instances of Poligny and of the tailor of Chalons), the number of actual citations of werewolfery are extremely scant. Indeed, although instances of witchcraft trials went up, their total number was remarkably less than the likes of Boguet were to later claim. Boguet's counterpart in Lorraine, the judge Nicholas Remy, himself a writer of a major book on witchcraft entitled Demonoltary, was to grandly claim that he had tried and executed no less than 900 persons for sorcery, including werewolfery. The actual records however, suggest that the number was far, far lower. And yet, the notion of witches and werewolves were potent figures that lurked deep in the French mind. The werewolf was still seen as the agent of the Devil.

France, Religion, and Terror

Part of the reason for much of the terror during early times may lie in the changing of the times that plagued France throughout the mid-to-late 16th century. The difficulties, (social, religious, and economic), were, of course, reflected all over Europe. But in France they seemed to take on a special resonance. The nub of these problems seemed to be the steady emergence of a Protestant tradition, that promised freedom and independence from a perceived Catholic tyranny. This was not only a purely doctrinal standpoint but, as with most religious teachings, it had political ramifications.

Huguenots

The austere Protestant Huguenots looked upon the French monarchy with something akin to disdain and sought to administer their own affairs in a "Godly way"—that is, separate from the laws laid down by the king. Many of the Huguenot towns operated almost as independent republics, and Huguenot leaders and ministers encouraged the nonpayment of ecclesiastical tithes—usually 10 percent of overall income—to the Church authorities. In doing so, they placed themselves on a collision course with the state. Violent protests against tithes flared in areas such as Languedoc and Aquitaine, placing strains on the levying of secular taxation and disturbing the government immensely. Such a situation could not be allowed to continue. As the civil disobedience and riots continued all through the 1560s, the authorities realized they had to take action.

St. Bartholomew's Day Massacre

On 24th August 1572, large numbers of French Protestants streamed into Paris to witness the marriage of Henry of Navarre to Margaret of Valois. The occasion, St. Bartholomew's Day, was supposed to be a holy and joyous one. It was also the day that the Catholic machinery of state chose to act. The army was unleashed and hundreds of Huguenots were massacred, souring the air between Catholics and Protestants for years to come. The event ushered in a period known as the Wars of Religion, a series of civil wars in which Protestants and Catholics vied for control of their respective regions. In 1598, the formerly Protestant French king, Henry IV, tried to ameliorate the situation by enacting the Edict of Nantes that promised religious tolerance to all French citizens. Less than a hundred years later in 1685, however, Henry's grandson, Louis XIV, revoked this Edict, outlawing Protestantism, making France a Catholic country, and expelling the Huguenots. Mixed in amongst this religious and civil unrest were other factors such as plague and personal and economic hardship that often touched daily lives. Religious hatred, disease, poverty, and civil war all had a corrosive effect on the social structure, particularly in relatively isolated areas. In times of uncertainty and pestilence, people looked around for scapegoats, and communally religious certainties sought to reassert themselves. God was in His Heaven but the Devil was in the world, and he was determined to attack and destroy the righteous. Nor could the populace look to the central authorities for any sort of stability, because they too were in a dangerous state of flux. The uniformity of state that had characterized the reign of Henry II now gave way to a period of vacillating and weak administration under those of his sons. Francis II had ruled for little more than a year, guided as the Scottish Protestant Reformer John Knox (Francis was married to the young Mary, Queen of Scots), by "the vile whispers of Popish priests." He was only fifteen when he ascended the throne in 1559 and realizing that the new monarch was young and impressionable, the various great French houses—such as the formidable Catholic house of Guise—strove to advance their own fortunes. By 1560, after a year of ineffectual and indifferent rule, however, Francis was dead from a cancer of the ear (vindication, said Knox, that the whisperings of the Catholics were poisonous) and was succeeded by his younger brother Charles IX. Charles was only a weak-minded child and so the country was in effect ruled by his powerful mother, Catherine de Medici. A skilled politician, Catherine was able to play off one side against the other, but was set on France remaining a Catholic nation. All the same, she did not want a powerful Catholic family such as the Guises to have involvement in affairs of state and take powers from her easily influenced son, and she even courted some of the leading Protestants to counterbalance their influence. She was also acutely aware of the rise of the powerful Huguenot factions within the country and it was she who authorized the St. Bartholomew's Day Massacre, although her weak-willed son, the king, ordered it.

The massacre proved to be a turning point for the country, deepening divisions and turning French Protestants firmly against the monarchy. The years that followed were troubled with the Catholic Church trying to gain a hold on the minds of the people and the Protestants striving just as hard towards the same goal. In such a heated atmosphere, it is not surprising that demonologies began to emerge, gripping the public imagination, even at village level.

By the time Charles IX died in 1574, his reign had divided France as never before and his younger brother Henry III inherited a poisonous mess. The Guises had formed the violent Catholic League that was being aided by the great Catholic king, Philip II of Spain, whilst the Huguenots were already arming themselves for conflict. In a desperate bid to prevent a full-scale civil war (there had been many minor clashes and local "wars" between the two factions), Henry proposed a middle way that seemed to be acceptable to the politiques (moderates on both sides). He also struck up an alliance with his cousin, the Huguenot Henry of Navarre, in order to attack the Catholic stronghold of Paris, where the Guises had been stirring trouble. Before such an invasion could take place, however, Henry III was assassinated by a Dominican friar and, as he had no children, he was succeeded by his cousin from Navarre who became Henry IV, the first of the Bourbon kings. Having to retake large areas of his kingdom by force from the grip of the Catholic League, and in order to placate the Parisian mob and many of the important Catholic nobles, Henry changed his religion from Protestantism to Catholicism, declaring that "Paris was well worth a Mass." This helped him, as a tolerant Catholic king, to enact the Edict of Nantes that went some of the way to resolve the yawning differences between the religions. The Huguenots continued to remain a problem from the monarchy for almost a century to come. Henry himself would be assassinated in 1610, leaving the throne of France to a nine-year-old boy—his son Louis XIII.

The instability of the monarchy, the turbulence of the times, and the uncertainty of human life stalked the country as local wars raged. They all contributed to an overall feeling of doom. For many, the end of the world must surely be at hand and the forces of evil were abroad. Furthermore, localized fighting and wide-spread plague had left many bodies unburied, especially in the countryside attracting wolves from the surrounding woodlands in search of easy prey. Stories of wolf attacks may have become mixed with local stories of demonic forces, as exemplified in the writings of Henri Boguet and Nicholas Remy, stirring up popular fears and causing terrors to be seen everywhere.

Inarticulate and bizarre-looking strangers such as Jacques Roulet or sullen hermits such as Gilles Garnier were the reasons for the general social unease of the time. The wolf attacks were often linked in the common consciousness with demons lurking in the woodlands, and the evils that beset a local community might be exorcised by executing them. And of course, the shadow of the wolf, watching from the woodland tree line was enough to frighten everyone. The idea of the diabolic man-wolf, the enemy of Mankind, was inching ever closer.

Jean Grenier

This case, which is generally perceived to be the end of the 16th century werewolf terror in France, occurred in 1603. This ended in the trial of Jean Grenier, known as the last French loup-garou. Most of what we know about the case comes from the account of a French witch hunter named Pierre de Lancre. De Lancre was a famous magistrate who sought out and tried witches not only within French territory, but also those who had crossed the border into Spain and, similar to Burguot, was considered something of an authority on the diabolical arts. The Grenier case had come to his attention when he was acting as a lawyer for the parlement in Bordeaux and had been referred from a lower court at St. Sever.

Jean Grenier was a strange, fourteen-year-old boy, possibly suffering from mental abnormalities, who liked to frighten small children and young girls with the claim that he was a werewolf. As time went on, his assertions grew wilder and wilder. He had been approached by a mysterious stranger (possibly the Devil or one of his agents) who had given him a wolfskin cape that, together with a magic salve, could transform him into a wolf for the space of one hour on certain nights of the week. He also claimed to be the illegitimate son of a priest—his accepted father was not his real father—and, he claimed that the sons of priests grew up to become werewolves and serve the Devil. In his werewolf shape, he had attacked several dogs but had found their blood disgusting.

Far sweeter was the blood and flesh of young girls and small children. Whilst these were clearly the fantasies of a rather disturbed mind, they were taken extremely seriously by those in the surrounding neighbourhood. One girl to whom he had told these stories, a thirteen-year-old named Marguerite Porier, with whom he'd been attending some sheep, accused him of attacking her whilst in his werewolf guise. Whilst Jean had gone off somewhere, she was approached by some kind of wolf-like animal. She managed to beat it off with her staff, but it had only retreated a little way, and then slumped back on its haunches to glower at her savagely, upon which she had turned and fled. The beast, she said, was much smaller than an actual forest wolf and its tail was a mere stump. It was, she thought, some way between a wolf and a human. It could only, she averred, be Jean Grenier.

Given the severity of the accusation, the boy might have been expected to deny it. But surprisingly, he seemed eager to admit it and indeed confessed to a number of other similar crimes. Over the past months, a number of children had gone missing, and this added an immediate importance to his somewhat rambling confession. Indeed, the courts took a great deal of time in checking some of the detail, but found nothing of consequence. In the meantime, Jean's stories grew wilder and wilder, symptomatic of a disordered mind. He now implicated others whom he said had hunted with him. One of these was his father and a neighbour, both of whom were arrested and imprisoned. There were more searches of the Grenier house, particularly to find the magic salve of which Jean had spoken, but nothing was discovered. Jean's father was ordered to be tortured and he confessed that he had indeed been a werewolf and had sought out little girls but he had not eaten them, just "played with them". It might be inferred that the older man was a pedophile who interfered with small children and that his son shared some of his predatory sexual abnormalities. However, this was well beyond the 17th century French court. Emboldened by the ongoing trial, several young children who had seen their friends carried off by wolves now came forward and added to the accusations against the Greniers. Under further torture, Jean's father laid the blame squarely on his son and recanted of his own actions. He was spared for the time being. Based on the admittedly circumstantial evidence and on his own crazed confession, Jean Grenier was brought before the judge at Coutras in June of 1603 and the court swiftly convicted him. He was sentenced to be hanged and burnt. However, the courts were not yet finished with him.

Le Maitre de la Foret

Jean Grenier's case was reviewed by the parlement of Bordeaux in September of that year. Again, he told his story of becoming a wolf, adding embellishments as he did so, seeking to implicate others whom he felt had turned against him. He told the court that, at the age of eleven or twelve, he had been taken deep into the woods by his neighbour to meet with a "black man" whom he called Le Maitre de la Foret (the Master of the Forest). This man, assumed to be the Devil, had scratched him with his nail, leaving a mark, and had given him the magic salve and wolf-pelt cloak that he needed in order to change shape. He also confessed that whilst in a wolf shape, he had entered an empty house in a village whose name he could not remember and had dragged a baby from its cradle and had eaten it. When he encountered a true wolf, he gave him what was left of the child. Later, in the parish of St. Antoinne-de-Pizon, he had attacked a small girl in a black dress who was looking after some sheep. He had partially devoured her as well. In fact, St. Antoinee-de-Pizon had become a favourite hunting ground of his, and two months earlier he had attacked and eaten a small boy playing in a yard, whilst six weeks before that he had devoured another child walking on a stone bridge. He had also fought with several dogs, killing most of them except one in Eparon, where the owner had appeared and had driven him off with a rapier. Once again, he repeated the allegation that his father was not his true parent and that he was in fact, the illegitimate son of a priest. He claimed that this fact gave him "special powers." This was found to be a fabrication—the fantasy of a confused mind—and that his father was indeed the labourer who had been arrested and tortured. There was some animosity between father and son—Jean's mother had died and his father had remarried. Jean and his stepmother didn't get along well—she found him strange in his ways—and so his father had put him out of the house, reduced him to beggary, and forced him to wander the countryside seeking food. He did try to get work but was notoriously unreliable. He was reduced to terrorizing small girls with tales of werewolfery and Devil-worship.

Relations had soured between Jean and his father and it was no surprise that he tried to implicate him in both his real or imagined crimes. When he had to face his father in court, however, his testimony began to fail; he crossed himself in his evidence and withdrew some of the allegations. He told the court that his stepmother had thrown him out because she had seen him behaving like a dog and further had witnessed him vomit up the fingers of a small child. He had made her afraid and she had driven him from the house. The father was dismissed without charge.

Despite all his crazy allegations, Jean Grenier was taken seriously by the courts. And yet, the sentence that was passed down to him shows the changing attitude of the time. He should have been burnt, indeed he was already sentenced to be so. However, the court took a more lenient view than the lower judiciary. It took into account the boy's "stupidity," the fact that he was a beggar and was malnourished, that he was bereft of a real mother and had been raised by a cruel stepmother, and that he'd been left to fend for himself without anyone to take an interest in him. Such a miserable specimen, in the court's view, was easy prey for the Devil and his agents but he was not beyond salvation. So, instead of condemning him to death, the court sentenced Grenier to live out his days as a prisoner in a Christian monastery. Here, it was hoped, he would renounce his formerly evil ways and turn to the path of Christ.

Bete de Gevaudan

It is generally accepted that Jean Grenier was the last instance of werewolfery in France and, with his trial, the whole French episode drew to a close. However, the beast, lurking at the back of the French mind, refused to go away. It resurfaced in 1764 with the infamous Bete de Gevaudan high in the Massif Central region. In the village of Langogne, in the Gevaudan, a ferocious wolf-like beast began killing people who strayed too near the edge of the forest. The death toll rose rapidly to eleven, including two labouring men. Although the deaths were probably the work of packs of wolves rather than any single animal, it did not take long for the ancient lycanthropic fears of earlier centuries to resurface. Although the probability of attacks by genuine wolf packs was acknowledged, folklore and folk-wisdom also hinted at the possibility of a werewolf. Old folktales and rumours began to circulate, accompanied by a wealth of broadsheets and printed material. Many of these included diabolical-looking woodcuts, showing monstrous and threatening figures, half-man, half-wolf. There were accounts, too, fuelled by the ongoing hysteria, of strange partially-human creatures seen slinking through the woods at Mazel-de-Grezes. (One account even said that although one of these figures was in the shape of a wolf, it wore brass buttons on its front as if the wolfskin were on an overcoat which some human had put on.) A women going to Mass had been accompanied for part of the way, by an especially hairy man who had vanished as soon as she had screamed the name of Christ. This was a sure sign that her companion had been a werewolf and in the service of the Devil. The Bete was never caught and soon the killings stopped. The terror, however, lingered on.

Many of the alleged sightings of the beast were no more than rural folktales and imaginings, but they serve to illustrate that, although there was a formal acknowledgement that, werewolves did not exist, there was still an element of uncertainty about this, particularly in the rural mind. Folktales concerning people who could transform themselves into animals or of wolves who could speak with a human voice (in order to tempt God's people) still circulated widely, especially in France.

Le Grande Mal Garou

The French collector of such supernatural tales or contes, Charles Perrault, recognized the importance of such stories. In 1697 he published a collection of folktales that contained one werewolf-themed story in particular—the notion of a speaking wolf that would create mayhem. It dealt with a petite fille, a pretty child, who has to journey through a dark wood in order to take some groceries to her grandmother who is ill. She is dressed in her favourite cape, made from a red material. On her way through the wood, she meets with a wolf, who engages her in conversation. The animal questions her and obtains the exact directions to her grandmother's house, also learning that the old lady is both ill and housebound. It does not attack her, however, due to the presence of some woodcutters nearby. The wolf then expresses concern about the old woman and says that it will visit her as well, but suggests that they take different paths to see who will get to the grandmother's hut first. The girl takes the longer path, but is distracted on her way by picking wild flowers and chasing butterflies. The wolf, meanwhile, has already reached the door of the hut and, by mimicking the little girl's voice, encourages the grandmother to allow it in, whereupon it leaps on the old woman in the bed and devours her. It then puts on the corpse's nightgown and climbs into the bed to wait for the little girl to arrive. This she does and the wolf pretends to be the bedridden old lady. There is some conversation between the two concerning the largeness of eyes, mouth, and teeth. At the very end, the wolf reveals itself, pounces upon the little girl and eats her. There is no happy ending to this tale. The story is, of course, the original narrative of the well-known children's fable Little Red Riding Hood; the version which Perrault collected at the end of the 17th century seems to have its source in the stories of Gilles Garnier and of Jean Grenier and of the Werewolves of Poligny, over a century earlier. Here, the wolves attacked feeble and defenceless victims—small children such as Red Riding Hood and the bedridden grandmother—harking back to some of the allegations during the French werewolf trials. Indeed, it is perfectly possible that Little Red Riding Hood started out as a gruesome werewolf tale. It is strange that Perrault's heroine is not afraid of speaking to a wolf or that she does not sense that something is wrong when the creature speaks to her. It has been suggested that initially, Little Red Riding Hood meets the werewolf in its human guise (Perrault is careful to display the werewolf as a wolf and not as a hybrid half-human creature), which doesn't frighten her, but later encounters it in its animal shape when it eats her.

The original French tale ends with the death of Red Riding Hood in the jaws of the wolf, but a German variant collected by the Brothers Jacob and Wilhelm Grimm, has a much happier and satisfactory ending. This story was published in 1812 in their famous Kinder-und Hausmarchen tales. This German story is known as Rotkappchen or Red Cap, which gives us the familiar title Red Riding Hood. In this version, which to a point closely parallels Perrault's narrative, the little girl's cries draw the attention of a passing huntsman. Suspecting what has happened, he attacks the wolf, slicing its belly open with his hunting knife, allowing Red Cap and her grandmother to escape. Throughout this entire procedure, the wolf appears to be asleep, gorged after its meal, and so Red Cap fetches a large stone that they sew into the creature's belly. The wolf wakes up and tries to run off but the weight of the stones weight it down and it dies.

The story of Red Riding Hood undoubtedly reflected a number of ancient legends and tales, stretching back long before Perrault. The colour of the heroine's hood or cap is the colour of blood; the girl is either extremely naïve or else deliberately misled by talking to the wolf (thus putting the creature in the role of Tempter); the notion that a demonic force (the wolf) masquerades as a human: all have traditions that stretch back almost as far as prehistoric times. And there are all sorts of political connotations—it has been suggested that the original Red Riding Hood legend is an old Huguenot tale. Allegedly it was circulated following the St. Bartholomew's Day Massacre, designed to symbolize the savagery of the French Monarchy—red being the colour of freedom (red caps were sometimes worn by the Huguenots as a symbol of their independence). Whatever the tradition, there is little doubt that the legend of Red Riding Hood and other tales like it kept the figures of the wolf and of the werewolf at the forefront of the popular rural mind.

This is not to say, however, that such beliefs—the notion of men and women who could transform into animals and who were guided by demons—were completely and uncritically accepted. Even from the mid-16th century, when witch and werewolf trials were getting underway, some voices questioned the entire underlying principle of such notions. One of these early sceptics was a German physician. Doctor Johann Weyer (or Wier, 1515–1588) sought some sort of medical explanation to the eerie and supernatural powers to which some of these unfortunates confessed. In fact, Weyer is thought to have been the first man to use the term "mentally ill" to describe the conditions that some of these people had claimed for themselves. A logical and humane man, he argued that some of the unfortunates had deluded themselves into thinking that they had consorted with devils, had become animals, or had supernatural powers and that, rather than condemning them, the authorities should treat them with compassion In his book De praestigiis daemonum (The Illusion of Demons), first published in 1563, Weyer attacked the Malleus Malificarum, the witch hunter's guide-book, together with the Church's persecution of confused and mentally vulnerable people. Weyer was a follower of the Cologne sage. Heinrich Cornelius Agrippa von Nettesheim (1486–1535), who acknowledging the dark arts, had also argued that everything, including occultism, philosophy, and medicine, formed part of a cohesive whole. Weyer's work is counted as one of the earliest books displaying a much more enlightened view of the alleged imminence of the supernatural and indeed extends many of the underlying facets of modern psychiatry towards the whole credulous theory of witchcraft and shapeshifting.

Amongst the manifestations of alleged witchcraft that he considered, Weyer made specific references to werewolves. Those who had been accused of such crimes, he argued, had been suffering from a "disorder of their melancholic humour." He detailed a list of medical symptoms that might encourage them to rise from their beds at night to prowl the country thinking that they were wolves or other beasts. And, he argued, they might be "cured" by a number of means: by the letting of blood to restore the balance of the humours, or by eating juicy fruits and a strict variation in diet. (Weyer was first and foremost a physician, after all.) He further considered the case of the Werewolves of Poligny, who had confessed to eating small children and attending the diabolic Sabbat. His conclusion was that these men were not mentally ill, but were simply deluded. Acknowledging that they might well have met with the Devil or his agent (although what "the Devil" might be taken to be in his terminology is open to question), Weyer continues that the Master of Lies had so muddled their minds that they believed many things about themselves that were not true. According to Weyer, this may have been compounded by the salves and unguents with which the men smeared themselves before the transformation—the elements of such ointments may have held hallucinogenic properties, which confused their minds even further. The explanation that Weyer gave was a logical and medical one combining many strands of early psychoanalysis and references to psychotropic drugs. In these inferences, the German doctor seems to have been far ahead of his time.

Reginald Scot

Weyer's work was soon followed by one or two other individuals who questioned the reliability of witchcraft (and by implication, werewolf) cases. One of these was an Englishman, the Kentish Squire Reginald Scot (1538–1599). Scot was a Justice of the Peace for Kent and, as such, had seen many confused individuals come before him, accused of fantastic crimes. It also has to be remembered that Scot was a Protestant and took every opportunity to criticize what he perceived as the superstition and credulity of the Catholic Church. His most famous work, Discoverie of Witchcraft, first published in 1584, (nineteen years after Weyer) mocked the gullibility of those who believed in the tenets of witchcraft and accused poor and often mentally deficient people of it. He quoted Weyer, and much of his work seemed to mirror the German physician's argument, suggesting mental problems in those who were accused.

Sigmund Freud

Despite the enlightened works of people such as Weyer and Scot, the hysteria concerning werewolves remained in the deepest recesses of the communal mind, resurfacing from time to time with passing hysterias. Indeed the word "hysteria" was to come to the fore in the work of a much later medical figure—the father of psychoanalysis, Sigmund Freud. In 1897, Freud developed the theory that a "hysteria" such as was now suggested in a number of werewolf cases might be a delayed emotional reaction to an earlier sexual abuse or to repressed infantile sexual fantasies. Certain aspects of this theory may agree with the Grenier case in 1603 and perhaps also in the earlier Gandillion trial. Freud may well have been influenced by some of Weyer's theories—there is no doubt that he had reader Weyer, in a French translation, as he cited the work as one of his ten most influential books during an interview in 1906. According to his own account in 1914, Freud found himself face to face with a patient who expressed a connection to the werewolf motif. In fact, Freud named him the Wolf Man both in his notes and in his account. The patient is described as a twenty-seven-year-old man from a rather well-to-do Russian family, who, during the course of his analysis, described a dream that he'd had in infancy concerning wolves. He dreamt that he'd been lying in bed in his own bedroom when suddenly the bedroom window had slowly opened and, looking out, he'd seen about six or seven white wolves sitting around the foot of a big walnut tree outside. They were all watching him intently. None of the wolves made a move or seemed threatening in any way—nevertheless, the boy screamed, woke himself up, and had to be comforted by his nurse. There is also a curious folk element to the case, of which Freud and the patient were both well aware. The patient's birthday was 25th December (in many legends anyone daring to be born on the birthday of Christ was destined to become a monster and an agent of the Devil) and also he'd been born with a caul (a translucent membrane across the face which usually comes off at birth) that was considered an ill omen in parts of Russia. Freud also records that the nurse who had attended him as a child was deeply religious and extremely superstitious and took the caul as the sign that her charge would grow up to be a werewolf. With this in mind, the dream of wolves took on an added significance. Freud completed analysis on the Wolf Man by revealing that the child was most probably a wish to return to the womb and completely dismissed the old folk-wisdom that the nurse had passed on concerning the caul. It is interesting to note, of course, that Freud himself was born with a caul.

Werewolves in Film

Although both psychiatry and science were seeking to find alternative explanations for the supposed lycanthrope condition of a man who could turn himself into a wolf, whether willingly or unwillingly, still held a dark fascination for many people. And, as an idea, it was ripe for commercial exploitation. By the early 1930s, the werewolf's counterpart, the vampire, was making big money at the cinema box office. Cinema was now a popular form of entertainment; popular films were big earners and horror was an up-and-coming genre. A film adaptation of Dracula starring the sinister Bela Lugosi, together with a similar offering of Frankenstein starring Englishman William Henry Pratt (who had changed his name to the more East European-sounding Boris Karloff) had proved great successes. The film industry searched around for a comparable horror to unleash on the cinema-going public. They found it in the werewolf.

Lon Chaney, Jr.

Throughout the 1930s and into the 1940s, Universal Studios was the leaders in the field of Gothic horror. It was Universal who had released both Dracula and Frankenstein to popular and critical acclaim in 1931, and the company was now looking for another box-office smash. In 1935, they had released the Werewolf of London to moderate success but, by 1941, they were determined to release what today might be described as a werewolf blockbuster. It was to be called Wolf Man and was to bring the werewolf motif into cinematic legend. The man whom they had chosen for the central role was not a huge and menacing figure—he had nowhere near the sinister screen presence of either Lugosi or Karloff—but he was an actor of moderate talent. His name was Creighton Chaney and he was the son of the legendary silent movie actor Lon Chaney. Although his father had advised him not to take up film work, Creighton was determined to make it in the movies and, never one to discard a family connection, took the name Lon Chaney Jr. after his father's death in 1931. His mixture of rather brutish looks and child-like innocence, however, made him an ideal candidate for the cursed man.

From the beginning the movie had a disadvantage. Universal's other two big money-makers—Dracula and Frankenstein—had been based on recognized works of literature by Bram Stoker and Mary Shelley. Cinema-goers would have been familiar with the story or could go home and read the book. There was no comparatively famous literary work associated with the werewolf, and so, the film had to stand on both the plot and on Chaney's performance.

The Wolf Man

As with the vampire and, to some extent, Frankenstein, Universal introduced some folklore-like elements of its own into the story. The screenplay, written by Curt Siodmak, passed off certain inventions of his own as gypsy tradition. For example, although many of the werewolf trails and panics occurred in France, the werewolf becomes a creature mainly confined to Germany and Eastern Europe. This was to fit in with Universal's other two major horror creations that had an Eastern European location. The protagonist did not use a magic salve or a wolf-skin cloak or a belt, but was actually transformed unwillingly into the beast by the rays of the moon. This led to the famous quatrain that was widely attributed to ancient Romany gypsies but in fact had been created specially for the film by Siodmak and his team of writers:

> "Even a man, who's pure in heart,
> And says his prayers at night,
> Can become a wolf when the wolfsbane blooms,
> And the autumn moon is bright."

Coupled with this was the notion that a man could become a werewolf if he was bitten by another such creature. The change would then occur at the first full moon after the bite. This again had no basis in myth and legend, but it added to the suspense and horror of the situation. As well as this, Siodmak introduced another invention—an apotropaic that could repel and destroy a werewolf. This was once more to blend the werewolf legend in with that of the vampire (that could be repelled and destroyed by the crucifix). This was the use of silver, which Siodmak was to claim was Romanian gypsy lore. It was nothing of the sort. Although the werewolf featured in gypsy tradition, it was not a significant terror. Indeed, the people of rural France were much more terrified of the creature than the gypsies. As well as this, Universal introduced the notion of a pentagram, an ancient Romany talisman for warding away werewolves. Once again, this has no basis in tradition, it simply brought it into line with a number of "devil films" that were starting to appear, mainly from Universal.

Most importantly, the film created the impression that the change from man to beast did not involve a man transforming himself into a real-looking wolf but into some form of hybrid figure—not wholly human, not wholly wolf. This, according to the film, was a man-like being with added feral traits. In fact, in some of the earlier films, the werewolf looked more similar to a shaggy ape than a member of the canine species.

Wolf Man was a reasonable commercial success for Universal—enough to ensure several follow-ups and a team-up with Frankenstein. It would serve to keep the figure of the werewolf in the popular mind through the succeeding years.

Although never as big or as menacing a creature as the vampire or even The Mummy (which again featured Boris Karloff) the werewolf exuded a certain primal horror.

Later filmmakers were to take a tongue-in-cheek approach to the werewolf theme with such movies as I Was A Teenage Werewolf (1957, starring Michael Landon, who would go on to make his name as Little Joe Cartwright in Bonanza) and the classic American Werewolf in London (1979). Some films such as the UK production Company of Wolves (1984, and based on a book by Angela Cartwright) and The Howling (1981) did try to add some depth to the figure, but they still contained the pseudo-folkloric additions of previous movies. For instance, it was now claimed (using an allegedly Romany tradition) that only a silver bullet could kill or injure a werewolf. No such tradition ever existed—the only means of disposing of the beast, said conventional wisdom, was to burn it, the same as with each of Satan's minions. The picture that was starting to emerge in the latter half of the 20th century was an extremely confused one. Nevertheless, interest in the werewolf never died.

And even in today's relatively sophisticated society, a fear of the beast still lingers. It is not a great distance in many instances, from the thronging streets of a busy city to the cool of the remote and shadowy forest. And who knows what lurks in the dappled shade under the low boughs—a crouching beast, waiting to strike and to tear us limb from limb. Werewolves may be far closer to us than we would prefer.

Voodoo and Zombies

Cockroach, he don't wear no crockin' shoes when he creep into the fowl house.

—Creole proverb

The image of the zombie—the walking dead of Afro-Caribbean lore—with its shambling gait, dead eyes, and slack jaw, is perhaps one of the most frightening in all of terror iconography. The idea of a corpse, raised from the dead and somehow animated by magic is enough to send shivers down the spine of even the hardiest of individuals. Maybe this is why the zombie has maintained a constant appearance in many horror films through the years. There are other elements that have been added to the basic motif—that the zombie has inhuman strength; that it has supernatural powers (for instance, it can enter a room through a keyhole in the form of smoke); that the zombie did not die naturally but was magically murdered and turned into the monster through hideous sorcery; and that zombies eat human flesh similar to cannibals. Through the years, the notion of the zombie has assumed a menace that cannot easily be rivalled by more "sophisticated" monsters.

Zombies are, of course, inextricably linked in the popular mind with Voodoo, a religion found in West Africa, the Caribbean, and some parts of America.

Therefore, no examination of zombies can be carried out without first examining the belief system. However, because of its complexity, Voodoo is incredibly difficult to study. In its purest state, the religion that we refer to as Voodoo is only one of a myriad of beliefs that reflect either the ideologies of their practitioners or the area from which they have come. Some are even fragments of what may have once been broader and more wide-ranging beliefs; others have been adapted to suit the area in which they flourished.

Thus, Santeria, Umbanda, Quimbanda, Mami Wata, Shango, Moyambe, and Candomble are all considered as variants and aspects of the Voodoo religion. Even the name creates problems because "Voodoo" is something of an Anglicised construction, and other variations are given as voudon, voodun, vudoun, and voodoux. An even further Anglicised word, Hoodoo, is also sometimes used. The original terminology comes from the language of the Ewe/Yaroba peoples of the Arada area of Dahomey (now Benin) in West Africa and literally means, "to draw water." Eventually, it became modified to mean "to draw down spirits." This was done by means of a weave or coloured pattern that was spread upon the ground.

Loa

Although they were extremely powerful, the forces and powers (loa) in which the various tribes believed were also very child-like—they were curious and easily offended, but they could also be easily placated. They sulked, threw tantrums, and misbehaved similar to human children. They were also attracted by many things—bright colours, unusual patterns, and loud noise. Any of these might be used to placate and control them. Any person who could both read and control their moods was, through them, assured of great powers. They were the witch doctors, sorceresses, and Shamans who were treated with awe and reverence by their fellow tribesmen and followers.

Houngans and Mambos

The mediation of the relations between humans and spirits became the centre of the voudon faith of the Yaroba people, and those who controlled or interposed in that relationship were known in Voodoo terms as houngans

(male) or mambo (female). The places to which the spirits were called—the Voodoo temple—was known as the hounfor, all of which gave Voodoo the recognizable trappings of a loosely organized faith.

It has been argued that Voodoo is a slave religion that adapted to the servile conditions amongst the peoples that were carried from the West Africa coast by European slavers. They brought indigenous religions, often centered on natural forces that became moulded into their servile situation in the plantations into which they were subsequently sold—estates in the Caribbean: the West Indies, South America, and parts of Northern America. Mixed in with the native faiths were some elements of Christianity. Dahomey had been largely colonized by the French, and French Franciscans had sought to establish their creed and culture there since the 1660s. Consequently, there was a certain "Frenchness" to the religions that the Africans practiced and this conveyed itself to the slavers to other parts of the world. This "Frenchness" often appeared in the language that was used; in some of the rituals and in the outlook of the slaves themselves. French Catholicism also influenced some of the belief systems that the slaves held—indeed some elements of Voodoo were simply a mixture of African Pagan observances and a form of Christian theology. Thus, ancient native gods became fused with Christian Saints; certain aspects of Christian ceremonies were moulded into the fabric of what was essentially "Pagan" belief, and Saint's days became the focus of Voodoo ritual and were celebrated as "special times."

Voodoo, and variants of it, flourished on the plantations, in the Caribbean, in South America, and on the North American continent. It also flourished around American slave ports, primarily in Louisiana (New Orleans) and in the realm of the Rice Kings in South Carolina (Charleston)—anywhere where slaves concentrated in large numbers. And the Voodoo sects spread quickly wherever they took root. As early as 1782, Governor Galvez of Louisiana specifically forbade the importation of slaves from Martinique, because he believed them to be "steeped in Voodoo" and that they would make the lives of the citizens of New Orleans and of the state in general "very unsafe." A decade later, several slaves from Santo Domingo were publicly burned in New Orleans for practicing "the heathen rites of the Voodoo."

Christian-seeming Worship

In the early 1700s, many Christian plantation owners forbade their slaves to practice Christian or "Christian-seeming" worship and many of the Voodoo rituals (which were loosely based on Christianity) slid away into the jungles, swamps, and forests, becoming secretive and mysterious. Legends grew up around it, as Christians speculated about what went on at these clandestine gatherings. Clearly there was some sort of spirit possession as the loa, drawn by the veve, took over the bodies of their followers in order to prophesy and heal, and this alarmed the Western Christian minds. Such a concept, for Western Christians, held echoes of medieval demon possession in Christian lands and they quickly equated possession by the loa with possession by the Devil himself. The copying of portions of Christian ritual was suggestive of the Black Mass, that was said to have been practiced by European witches and heretics. There were tales, too of cannibalism amongst the slaves.

Le Cochon Gris

In parts of the island of Martinique, where the Voodoo religion was supposed to be extremely widespread, certain cults were said to devour "le cochon gris" (the grey pig) which was a coded reference to human flesh. Whilst there may have been instances of the eating of human flesh, there is little evidence that it was in any way widespread. However, some of the white planters and settlers may have had good reason to be alarmed.

Bokor

Similar to many other religions, Voodoo had its darker side. If the loa were like children, then they could be unpredictable and capricious. They knew neither good nor evil, they could just as easily commit a sinister act as a righteous one. They could be duped into committing diabolical and anti-social acts by unscrupulous magicians known as "bokor." Once the bokor had the spirit under his or her control, it could be turned against humankind and had the potential to unleash great evil. As well as that, the bokor might summon up dark and vicious sprits that had no love for Mankind. Although in most cases, the spirits and forces were drawn down for benign reasons—to heal, to give aid for specific tasks, and to bring good luck. An alteration in the pattern of the veve could encourage less welcome forces, the substance of African nightmares.

Bori, Tikoloshi, and Dodo

These were beings similar to the Bori—a shapeshifting, often invisible, entity that engaged in acts of extreme violence. Then there was the Tikoloshi, a Xosha water demon that could either appear as a bird with an abnormal head, as a baboon, or the Dodo of Ghanian folklore, often assumed to be the blank-eyed ghost of a dead man who prowled the forests, ready to tear travellers asunder with claw-like hands.

Gegbo

Many of these terrors reflected the regions from which the slaves themselves came or from where their people had originated—mainly from West Africa or the Congo basin. The art of calling them down was known as gegbo, the evil side of Voodoo. Practitioners often chose to live well away from the main settlements or plantations and were often considered to be witches or sorcerers.

Gods of Voodoo

If the Voodoo religion was a complex affair, then so was its pantheon of gods and forces. Many of these reflected the native gods and powers, that characterized regional beliefs. But as Voodoo spread into other countries, there were some variations relating to the country in which the slaves found themselves.

Olorun and Obatala

In the Yoruba/Ewe pantheon, the supreme deity was Olorun, who was remote and unknowable. This did not, however, prevent him from interfering in the world, and he might have spoken to his followers through an intermediary or demi-god known as Obatala. Similar to children, the two deities often fought and were in conflict, which might be mediated for the benefit of Mankind, by an experienced houngan.

Minor Gods

Beneath these two entities was a pantheon of minor gods who in many ways resembled Catholic Saints. They might be approached in order to intercede with Olorun or they might have supernatural powers that they could use themselves. Amongst such entities were Ogou Balanaji, a god with healing powers, and Zaka, who presided over agriculture. There were, too, rather dangerous deities who had to be approached extremely carefully. Amongst these were Shango (or Shago) who controlled storms—especially lightning,—and maybe the most dangerous of all, Dambala-wedo, the great serpent. This pantheon was an ancient one which had arrived with the slaves from Arada in Dahomey and is refereed to as the Rada (or Arada) pantheon.

Le Danse de Don Pedro

However, just to confuse matters, a later Spanish variant of the original voudun threw up a wider pantheon that incorporated deities not found in the former. The story is that this strand of Voodoo belief started amongst slaves in the Spanish colonies in the Caribbean and the Americas and was much more flamboyant than the traditional African one. The traditional story concerning the origin of this particular form of the religion is that a Spanish-African slave named Don Pedro combined a mixture of rum and gunpowder and drank it. As he did so, he became inspired by a much more lively form of loa that made him behave in outlandish and bizarre ways. The central ritual of his followers was known as Le Danse de Don Pedro which gave rise to a form of Voodoo called Petro. In this form, the drumming was wilder than it had been before, the movements of the dancers were greatly exaggerated, and the colours used were more striking. Blood played an even greater part in the rituals than it had done in Rada. Animal sacrifice (usually a cockerel or a goat) had played a significant part in the ceremonies of both forms, but in the Petro ritual, the dancers, often inflamed with rum, smeared themselves with the animal's blood liberally as a symbol of devotion.

Papa Legba

Petros Voodoo also introduced an entirely new set of loa or minor deities to the pantheon, including Papa Legba, who acted as a kind of "gateway" between the spirit and human worlds. He was the first of the loa that the houngan called up in the ritual and through him, other spirits might be contacted and brought forth. Within this Voodoo form, the forces of the Otherworld took on some human semblance—Papa Legba, for instance, often appeared as an old man, leaning on a crutch, a wholly recognizable figure amongst the slave communities. His mistress or wife was Erzule Frieda, the deity that controlled both love and lust—a huge, grinning, buxom figure, sometimes carrying a fruit basket. Again this was a recognizable figure on many of the plantation and served to "humanize" the loa.

Baron Samadi

The most famous of all the Petro Voodoo pantheon was Baron Cemetiere (graveyard), also known as Baron Samadi (Saturday) or Baron La Croix (the Cross), the Lord of the Graveyard. Often depicted as a skeleton dressed in grand style (sometimes in a gentleman's tuxedo and top hat), he was the Master of the Unquiet Dead and certainly not to be trifled with. He was placated with both rum and tobacco and could take awful vengeance if these items were not regularly offered. The Baron was an entity of the slave plantations of the New World and had no African equivalent.

Ghede

There was another added element to the Petro version of Voodoo as well—that was the Ghede, or ancestral ghosts. Whilst ghosts and ancestral spirits had been acknowledged in Rada Voodoo, they had been slightly less important than the primeval deities and loa. Now, these spirits assumed a vengeful role, turning against humans and had to be supernaturally restrained. They were under the command of Baron Cemetiere who often used them against the living unless he was given gifts and offerings.

The Elements of Voodoo

Both Rada and Petro Voodoo often placed a reliance on either wambi or gris-gris (charms). These concentrated the forces of the loa through tangible elements—for example, rooster's feet, black crows, and other such items. Much has been made of the concept of "Voodoo dolls," tiny effigies of a living person in which pins and sharp objects were stuck in order to cause that person pain or death. In fact, although many of these are actually sold as Voodoo items, they have very little to do with the religion itself. Indeed, they are not specifically African in origin. In early English tales concerning witchcraft, mention is made of the mommet, a clay image into which sharp objects and pins were placed by English witches in order to cause injury or illness. The same was also true of alleged European witchcraft. Besides the gris-gris, Petro sorcery also placed great emphasis on poudre—herbal preparations and powders. Many of these were natural remedies used to cure illness and resist infections, but others were said to be used for more sinister purposes, such as poisons and hallucinogenics.

Haiti

Zombies played a role in many Voodoo-related ideas. For example, it was considered illegal under Haitian law to use zombies (men without wills rather than actual dead men) in the cane fields or to exploit them as cheap labour. Those who did might have found themselves liable for a fine under the employment legislation.

Papa Doc

Also in Haiti, there was an added political dimension. During the brutal regime of Francois "Papa Doc" Duvalier who came to power in 1957, Voodoo was used to keep the dictator in power. Born in Haiti in 1907, Duvalier had started out as a simple country doctor who had been involved in the treatment of yaws (a common bacterial skin infection that had crippled large parts of Haiti). His treatments of the disease were highly effective, leading him to make the claim that he was healing through the power of Voodoo.

Code Noir

The Voodoo cult had flourished in Haiti since roughly the mid-18th century, with whispers of the infamous "Code Noir"—a blasphemous tome written in French, that outlined a number of ghastly ceremonies for calling down loa. It is possible that Duvalier was a member of a local cult and that he used this suspicion to gain control over those around him. Gradually he began to rise in power and influence through the ranks of Haitian society, moving into the fluctuating power vacuum left after the withdrawal of American troops at the end of World War II. He began to model himself after Baron Cemetiere who was then a feared figure in Haitian folklore.

Ton Ton Macoute

In 1957, Duvalier seized power, emasculating the already weak Haitian army and appointing a number of thugs to protect him, led by his friend and ally, Clement Barbot. These were the Ton Ton Macoute, who took their name from a bogeyman in Haitian folktales. This vicious group acted as a form of secret police and were known to use Voodoo ceremonies to create fear and unease in the populace. In their stronghold at Fort Dimanche, they tortured Duvalier's unfortunate opponents and allegedly committed acts of cannibalism and sorcery. "Papa Doc" himself began to use the trappings of Voodoo to intimidate those who spoke out against him—placing skulls and dark candles on his official desk and claiming that he was a powerful bokor. He was rumoured to drink human blood and devour human flesh in the privacy of his own quarters—rumours that he personally encouraged to intimidate his enemies. It was widely reported that he could not be killed and he also spread the suggestion that he had a veritable army of zombies, ready to do his bidding. During his oppressive regime, Haiti became, in the public mind, the Voodoo capital of the world.

Baby Doc

Despite all his alleged Voodoo powers, Duvalier died in 1971 and was succeeded by his equally brutal but less politically adept son, Jean Claude, known as "Baby Doc." Unable to maintain his hold over the minds of the people, or to continue the "Voodoo mystique" in the way that his father had done, Jean Claude's grip on power failed, bringing an end to the Duvalier regime. Even so, it had proved a powerful political tool for almost twenty years and had turned Haiti into the "land of zombies." Since then, Haiti, its economy almost decimated by the reign of the Duvaliers, has traded on its sinister reputation in the hope of attracting tourists and the curious.

American Voodoo: New Orleans

Perhaps it is the practitioners—the houngans, mambo, and bokors—who have added to the Voodoo and zombie mythology, especially amongst the slaves of America. Two American slave ports with their surrounding areas are recognized as centres for the religion. These are Charleston, South Carolina, and New Orleans, Louisiana. The latter of these two seems especially soaked in Voodoo culture with its largely French ethos, shadowy alleyways, and its hinterland of dark and mysterious swamplands and bayous where runaway slaves tended to gather.

There were always whispers of blood sacrifice (usually animals or cockerels) in some areas of the city, and, there were sometimes tales of strange practices imported from ancient Africa. In October 1863, a riot threatened when a dismembered human torso was discovered in the home of a suspected Voodoo practitioner. There was talk of the "goat without horns" (human sacrifice) which made its way into the city newspapers.

Elizabeth Sunderland

New Orleans was already on edge. Tales of "darkie worship" had been circulating for some time. Over eight years previously in 1855, the home of a known Voodoo practitioner named Elizabeth Sutherland had been mobbed by her neighbours who believed that she'd put a spell on them. The police rescued her and held her in protective custody in the Third District Station. A crowd then gathered outside the station, demanding that the witch be released. Fearing widespread civil unrest and of being seen as accessories to Voodoo, the police allowed Elizabeth to escape out the back door of the station and then told the crowd that she'd turned herself into a black cat in order to elude them. In this guise, she had squeezed through the bars of her cell.

Bessie Tolendano

Voodoo queens who could allegedly command fantastic powers, such as controlling the walking dead, were now rife in New Orleans. One of these, Bessie (or Betsy) Tolendano, "a stout and intelligent free woman of colour" according to one newspaper report, was brought to trial on a variety of charges, including trying to raise a corpse and of kidnapping children for use in blasphemous Voodoo rituals. She expressed surprise at some of the allegations, but claimed her position as a Voodoo queen through rights of inheritance. She displayed some of her gris-gris to the court and boasted of her great powers. She seemed quite sincere and declared it her right to convene Voodoo gatherings in any part of the city that she chose. She was, she claimed, the descendant of ancient Congo Queens and for her, Voodoo was a religion.

Hoodoo Mag

Another of the great New Orleans Voodoo queens, Hoodoo Mag, was also brought to court following the death of a prostitute named Julia Henderson in which she was said to have been implicated. She was accused of murdering Henderson by supernatural means—probably involving zombies or some form of fatal gris-gris. Hoodoo Mag was not a free woman but a slave in the service, (according to the Daily Crescent), of one, Mr. Marpolis, a leading slave-holder in the city. The paper referred to her as "a black hellcat named Margaret…known throughout New Orleans as Hoodoo Mag." She was charged with stirring up the coloured people in the city against both their white and coloured masters. What became of her is unknown, but the trial left the municipal authorities extremely jittery.

Since 1817, a Municipal Ordinance in the city had forbidden slaves to gather in large numbers for any purpose, whether it be talking, drinking, or dancing. Fears of a slave uprising were everywhere and such gatherings were considered as the birthplaces of sedition and unrest. Nevertheless, by the mid-19th century, the enactment was largely ignored. Groups of slaves and "free people of colour" would often gather in the city's Congo Square, especially on St. John's Eve (23rd June—a sacred day in the Voodoo calendar) to drink and dance. Often, several Voodoo queens or mambos, and a number of hougans were also in attendance. What was beginning to worry the authorities was a number of curious white people who were also making their way to such gatherings and taking part in them.

Helen Thomas

Around 1853, a Voodoo queen named Helen Thomas conducted a massive gathering in the square where two white women were present and took part in the dancing and the rituals that went on. The Dictionnaire Universale du XIX Siecle described a raid by New Orleans police on a Voodoo gathering in which fifty nude women were found taking part—several of them white and prominent socialites. Inflamed with pambai (a form of rum punch) infused with a concoction which contained High John Conqueror Root (St. John's wort) the revellers danced all night in many parts of the city. However, many held that it wasn't the real thing—the real Voodoo dances were held in private, not in public.

Joe Goodness

It was not only the Voodoo queens who commanded such gatherings—many of the secret dances were conducted by male houngans or the babalawo (fathers of secrets).

One of the earliest "father of secrets" in the Algiers area of New Orleans was Joe Goodness, a houngan who had inherited powers and charms from his grandfather, also named Joe Goodness. This babalawo conducted a number of secretive rites throughout the city in the 1850s in which chickens were allegedly torn to pieces, dolls made from human skin and bone were reputedly studded with pins, and large amounts of liquor was consumed. There was even some talk that zombies were raised from the dead, but perhaps part of this is only legend. There are also stories of white people dancing and consuming gumbo in the city, which had been made there. An altar, decorated with goat's horns, was said to have been the centrepiece of the ritual.

Dr. John

One of the most important of all the early Voodoo practitioners in New Orleans was Dr. John; also known as Dr. John Croix, Voodoo John, and Bayou John, who dwelt in the city during the mid-to-late 1800s. A towering and imposing free man of colour and the owner of several slaves himself, Dr. John's ancestry was said to lie in Senegal. In fact, he was said to be a Senegalese prince. His face was covered in scars that he claimed were the ritual markings of his royal house and which gave him a particularly ferocious aspect. Captured by Spanish slavers, he had been sold to a gentleman of some rank who had been travelling to Cuba. In return for good service and for his excellent cooking, his master had eventually granted him freedom. He returned to Senegal to find that his father had died and that life there was not to his liking. He became a sailor, visiting many ports all over the world and finally quitting the sea when his ship reached New Orleans. There he took on work as a common miller in the docks area, working alongside other coloured employees over whom he seemed to exert a considerable power. Noticing that the other slaves seemed to fear him, his former master made John an overseer.

As his reputation increased, John began to realize that people were willing to pay for his services. Soon he had set himself up as a babalawo and zombie master and had increased both his notoriety and his wealth. He bought a plot of land out on Bayou Road and built a grand house there. Indeed, he began purchasing slaves himself, many of them female. Some of these he married, assembling a personal harem, and performing the marriage ceremonies in the Voodoo style. He would later boast of having fifteen wives and fifty children, all scattered across Louisiana. His wealth and influence increased throughout New Orleans and he soon travelled in an open carriage through the streets, dressed in the style of a refined gentleman.

Whilst he was a babalawo, Dr. John took little part in the dances and ceremonies of the Voodoo followers; these he left to the Voodoo queens and, if he did attend any, it was merely as an onlooker. He conducted most of his own business from a dark room in his house on Bayou Road. The place was full of animal and human skulls, the latter stolen from local graveyards, along with snakeskin, stuffed lizards, and embalmed scorpions. There were unmentionable poudres and potions in stoppered bottles and in bowls. From the middle of this supernatural clutter, Dr. John sold his charms, curses, and spells for a fee.

It is said that the last of his wives was white and that in his later years, she administered his affairs for him. Dr. John also conducted séances, issued prognostications, and prepared astrological charts, sometimes using pebbles to assist him "in the old African way." It is said that he also prepared gris-gris and love potions that were often bought by heavily veiled white ladies. He also sold protections to parents in order to keep their children safe. But there was a dark side to him, too. It was said that he commanded a legion of zombies (which he created through his magic) to do the work around his house and run nefarious errands for him (such as digging up corpses for parts) as soon as it was dark.

In spite of all his alleged supernatural powers, however, Dr. John was finally caught with a simple trick. Although he was a babalawo and a master of dark magic, the doctor could not read nor write and depended on some of his wives to manage his affairs for him. As he grew older, he desired to take his business into his own hands and decided to become educated. He hired a young black man to help him to read and write. The young man made him practice his signature on blank pieces of paper and therein lay the Doctor's undoing. Within several months, he had "signed away" most of his fortune and the house on Bayou Road. Within a year, he was practically a pauper.

He could never rightly understand what had happened to him and made several attempts to regain his lost fortune through the lottery, but his supernatural powers of prediction seemed to have deserted him. Once again, he tried to re-establish his position as foremost babalawo in New Orleans, but youngsters had taken over his clientele. Many of his wives deserted him and he was forced to take shelter with one of his children that his wife had borne him. It seemed that the great Doctor himself was the victim of a wambi or curse. Death came soon after.

The writer Lafcadio Hearn noted the passing of "John Montenant," also known as Dr. John, John Bayou, or Voodoo John. Hearn lavishly claimed that he was over one hundred years old (later accounts were to claim that he was almost two hundred). In reality, he was probably around eighty-two. Voodoo men were always fond of exaggerating their ages to give themselves supernatural credence. However, he had left a legacy behind him. Dr. John was one of the first houngans to mix Roman Catholicism with the snake worship of ancient Voodoo. On his desk in his darkened consulting room, amongst the fantastic and grotesque impedimenta of African witchcraft, stood a statue of the Virgin Mary. This he considered just as important for his powers as the dried toads and snakeskin that he often used. He was also the first of the houngans to devote much of his powers to foretelling the future and to healing, and he certainly was the first to establish his agencies throughout the city of New Orleans. He had truly established Voodoo as a reality all across the city. After his death, there was not another babalawo similar to him.

Even in death, Dr. John would not lie still. His restless loa was said to possess some of his devotees. It is thought that one of the most famous New Orleans R&B singers and piano players, Malcolm Rebennack, who played in the early 1970s with Professor Longhair and His Shuffling Hungarians, was possessed by his loa, causing him to adopt the name by which he is known today: Dr. John. This connection was established by the title of his first solo album, Gris-Gris.

Doctor Yah-Yah

Although Dr. John was one of the most important of the New Orleans Voodoo men, he was not the only one. Doctor Yah-Yah, a Voodoo practitioner and zombie-master, operated in the Lake Pontchartrain area around the same time as Dr. John. He broke all the traditions that claimed all babalawo were free men of colour. Doctor Yah-Yah was a slave whose real name was George Washington. He imitated Dr. John and seems to have practiced divination and astrology. However, he did not include healing in his supernatural repertoire. He was also known to issue gris-gris and curses for a price and, similar to Dr. John, was believed to have a number of zombies at his disposal. His career finally came to an end when he was arrested for selling poison to an Italian fruit-trader as a cure for rheumatism. Wary of the Voodoo man, the Italian wisely had the potion analysed and when it was found to contain poisonous substances, he lodged a formal complaint against Doctor Yah-Yah. The Doctor was briefly held by the authorities, but his master paid his fine and shipped him off to end his days as a field hand on a plantation, an undignified fate for a babalawo.

Doctor Beauregard

Another significant Voodoo man, Doctor Beauregard, flourished in New Orleans around 1870. He was one of the more exotic "foreign" practitioners, having come to the city from Kentucky. He was a man of awe-inspiring appearance, mainly due to the fact that he had never cut his hair and tied it up in a number of strange knots. In these, he carried some of his gris-gris in little packets and small bottles. He carried a monkey-skull rattle wherever he went, shaking it in order to let loose a wambi at an unfortunate enemy. Some of his techniques may have been later copied by the American R&B singer and songwriter, Screamin' Jay Hawkins, during the late 1950s and 60s. (Hawkins was one of the performers to explicitly use Voodoo imagery in his stage act. His most famous composition, I Put a Spell on You, recorded in 1956, hinted at the cult religion and was banned by several U.S. radio stations whilst his later Feast of the Mau-Mau was suggestive of cannibalistic ritual.) One of his most famous and financially successful "Voodoo recipes" was salted beef heart that was considered to ensure virility in men. From time to time, this fantastic figure would go around, brandishing a hoot-owl's head at his enemies and cursing them. Besides being a figure of curiosity, he was also a figure of fear and after badly scaring some ladies, he was arrested. He tried to terrify the police by throwing the hoot-owl's head at them and issuing curses, all of which proved ineffective. He was briefly held in custody and on his release, he apparently vanished and was assumed to have returned to Kentucky.

Don Pedro

The successor to Dr. John was as a Spanish slave named Don Pedro. Not much is known about him except that he was frequently in trouble with the police. He was said to have conducted a number of sexual orgies in his home and at Raquette Green in which white as well as coloured women took part. Raquette Green has long since disappeared, but it was once the site for a number of Voodoo gatherings. Don Pedro, however, seems to have disappeared without a trace.

Joseph Mellon

The other main Voodoo practitioner in New Orleans around this time was Joseph Mellon, who was said to issue some of the most ferocious curses in the city. However, he took a fancy to an engaged woman and tried unsuccessfully to entice her away from her fiancé by supernatural means. Before they could be married, the woman's fiancé suddenly and inexplicably died. Although it was suspected that Mellon had poisoned him, nothing could be proved. However, the death did him no good, for the object of his desire treated him with disdain and died an old, unmarried woman. Mellon himself seems to have died not long after. Other Voodoo men were to follow him: Delton Boussard, Papa Gris-Gris, and Doctor Cheveneux, but none could match the menacing legacy of Dr. John.

Mama Calliba and Dr. Maurice

And of course, there were the Voodoo queens. One of the earliest of these women was Mama Calliba, a mambo who held a number of Voodoo revels near an old brickworks on Dumaine Street. Most of these seemed to have been little more than orgies with naked men and women dancing wildly and, in many respects, Mama Calliba seems to have been little more than a brothel keeper, but her name as a "voodooiene" (female Voodoo priest) seems to have been widely circulated in the city. Together with her partner, known as Doctor Maurice, she presided over some of the wildest excesses of 19th century New Orleans. There are also suggestions that the mambo may also have been an abortionist—helping white women get rid of unwanted pregnancies by various means, sometimes by poudres and potions, at other times by more physical devices. Although she was considered to be a woman of some power, she disappeared without a trace. Doctor Maurice seems to have continued for a time, allegedly raising zombies and casting curses, but he, too, eventually seems to have faded into obscurity.

Mother Dede

A number of Voodoo queens followed, such as the notorious Madame Roux in Charleston, who flourished briefly but left little mark on the societies in which they lived. Most of their names exist merely in legend or folklore. The first queen of any importance seems to have been a black woman from Santo Domingo who had the name of Samitie (or Semetee) Dede, also known as Mother Dede in New Orleans. Brought to the city as a slave, she is said to have used her sorcerous influences on her master in order to procure her freedom. Although she boasted great Voodoo powers, she worked as a stall-holder, selling either sweets or trinkets. She is said to have taken over from Mama Calliba as the premier Voodoo queen in the city and to have continued the revels by the old brickworks on Dumaine Street. Under continuous surveillance by the police, she moved these revels to the banks of Lake Pontchartrain. By 1825, her power in the city was at its height and her revels were attracting participants from both white and black communities. What eventually became of her is unknown but it is possible that she may have fled the city following a number of police raids on her gatherings. By the early 1830s, she seems to have disappeared from Creole society.

ZozoLaBrique

Mother Dede was briefly succeeded by a former slave woman known as Zozo LaBrique (though she may also have had several other names) who appears to have been half-demented and who sold buckets of brick-dust from her stall. This came from an old tradition that some of the Creole housewives had claiming that steps of houses had to be scrubbed with brick-dust to keep away evil spirits or to wash away a curse placed on the house by an enemy. Just how this crazy creature became a principal Voodoo queen is unknown, but at one time she was the most consulted voodooiene in New Orleans. However, her reign as premier Voodoo queen was very brief as she had to make way for the most powerful of all the New Orleans voodooienes, Marie Laveau.

The Three Marie Laveaus

The legacy of Marie Laveau has lived on until the present time. In 1971, the Los Angeles-based rock band Redbone, led by Native American brothers

Pat and Lolly Vegas, scored a massive hit with Witch Queen of New Orleans, reputedly penned in her honour. However, any study of her long career as Voodoo queen is fraught with difficulty and contradictions because she may not have been one person at all, but three (there were at least two), all of whom took the name Marie Laveau. In 1830, her name echoed around the city whilst in 1895, she is recorded as presiding over a Voodoo gathering at Bayou St. John. Some people believe that Marie Laveau was still living in 1918 at the end of World War I and for a period after. A report in a newspaper stated that she had died in 1881 and that she had been a Voodoo queen for well over eighty years. The pirate Jean Lafeyette was said to have kissed her when he entered New Orleans with the American troops following the Battle there in 1815. A century later it was said that she was the mistress of Lafcadio Hearn. There is no official gravesite for her and she is said to lie buried in a number of places, including St. Louis No. 1 Cemetery, although others strongly declare that she is not buried there at all.

Marie Laveau: Marie 1

The first Marie Laveau appears in the marriage records of the old Cabildo district of New Orleans in 1819. Her wedding was performed by Pere Antoinne, a much-loved priest in the area, who for over fifty years was one of the best known religious figures in the city. At the time, New Orleans was a melting pot of cultures with a more European (French and Spanish) presence than American. It had also a large Creole population; Creole was in fact one of the major languages used in many districts. Grand dances for people of colour, known as Quadroon Balls, were the height of popularity amongst city society. Large sections were Roman Catholic and the French influence was especially strong, while white Anglo-Saxon Americans were looked upon as barbarians and dullards.

Jacques Paris

Marie's husband's name is given as Jacques Paris, a quadroon, and a free man of colour, reputedly from Santo Domingo. Marie was also dark skinned, with a reddish cast. She was also said to be exceptionally beautiful. She seems to have been a mixture of black, Native American, and white and, it is said, boasted a regal ancestry in each.

About a year after her marriage, something strange seems to have happened—Jacques seems to have vanished completely and Marie started calling herself "The Widow Paris" indicating that he was dead. However, there is no record of his death until six years after the marriage, which means that five years of his life are unaccounted for. Was he still married to Marie? Or was he indeed dead and his death had not been registered? The latter seems unlikely because Marie herself was a staunch Catholic and attended the St. Louis Cathedral on a daily basis. She had also gone with Pere Antoinne to attend victims of an epidemic of yellow fever that was sweeping the city. She was living in a house on what is now North Rampart Street and which had formerly belonged to her father, who was believed to have been called Charles Laveau. However, after the first year of her marriage, she seems to have been living there alone.

About a year and a half after her marriage, Marie began to advertise herself as a "hairdresser," entering the homes of prosperous white people in the well-to-do areas of New Orleans. These were pre-beauty parlour times when wealthy women called in their own "professional beauticians" to arrange and coiffeur their hair prior to important social engagements. Many of these "beauticians" were free women of colour. It was not clear as to whether Marie was a "hairdresser" or not—some said that, besides styling hair, she sold gris-gris. Others still say that she was a prostitute, visiting the husbands of those whose hair she styled. It has to be remembered that New Orleans was not an American city; it was a mixture of French, Spanish, and Creole, and standards, moral and otherwise, were quite different. When the Americans did settle in the city, they were shocked by the lax and flagrant ways of those around them. All accounts agree however, that this period was the start of Marie Laveau's career as a principal Voodoo queen in New Orleans.

During the mid-to-late 1850s, Voodoo fever was at its height in New Orleans with Marie presiding over what were rapidly coming to be known as "shows" in various parts of the city. These drew large crowds, a good number of them from the white districts, and were always fuelled by strong liquor and sexuality. No matter how many times the law tried to close them down and arrest Marie, she always seemed to elude punishment and the gatherings continued unabated. The horror and thrill of witchcraft coupled with unbridled sexuality provided a heady mix for all kinds of people inhabiting the city. Marie was becoming incredibly rich. So rich in fact, that she was able to build another house, near Milneburg.

Christophe Dunimy de Glapion

Marie seems to have been enjoying herself and familiarizing herself with the developing culture of the city. A few years after the "death" of Jacques Paris, she took up with another quadroon man named Christophe Dunimy de Glapion. Like Jacques Paris, he was originally from Santo Domingo and a free man of colour. He was also something of a war hero and had fought in the Battle of New Orleans. Soon he had moved in with Marie and lived with her until he died in 1835. Little is known about their relationship except that Marie bore him fifteen children in rapid succession and that they remained together until his death.

Shortly after she took up with Glapion, Marie began to advance herself as a Voodoo practitioner and soon she was a Voodoo queen. The New Orleans Voodoo cult was at that time in disarray and she was competing with a number of other queens, such as Samitie Dede and Marie Saloppe. Taking some of the methods that had been espoused by Dr. John (or John Bayou as she called him), she began to turn the Voodoo gatherings into spectacles, to which she often invited white people on a paying basis. Marie built her ceremonies on the trappings of Le Grand Zombi—the snake, the black cat, and the roosters. She also added a sexual content as most of her gatherings usually ended in a kind of mass fornication. She also added some of her stock Roman Catholic items: the statues, the incense, the holy water together with prayers, and invocations. She took issue with those who said that the followers of Voodoo had originally been Devil-worshippers and branded it as one of the world's most ancient religions, far older than Christianity. From Voodoo, Marie argued, the Christian faith had taken many of its ideas, and she was only an instrument, letting those old powers free again. Many considered what she had done to be incredibly blasphemous and she was denounced by some as "a servant of Satan."

The rival queens were quickly deposed and driven away and soon Marie Laveau reigned supreme in all areas of New Orleans. Some of her rivals actually died, and it was thought that Marie had used some extremely powerful gris-gris against them. Others swore loyalty to her and became a kind of sub-queen in certain areas of the city. The Widow Paris now thrived. She took charge of the revels in Congo Square and presided over gatherings on the shores of Lake Pontchartrain; all in defiance of bans that had been enacted. She remained untouched by the law, and though a number of charges were laid against her, none of them ever reached the courts. This was put down to her great "magic" although it had probably more to do with her contacts in high places. And seemingly, she became incredibly wealthy. Using the contacts that she had made while carrying out her "hairdressing," she began to draw affluent whites into the Voodoo culture. She attracted great publicity, which added to the uniqueness of her gatherings. Rumours spread that she was blackmailing several prominent city politicians, but nothing could be proved.

She was able to buy several new houses all across the city from which she conducted much of her Voodoo work. Her main base of operations was a small cottage on St. Anne Street, between North Rampart and Burgundy Streets, close to Congo Square, which she had allegedly obtained through her gris-gris. Around 1830, a young man of quality, from an extremely wealthy and prosperous family had been arrested in connection with a crime where the evidence against him was supposedly very strong. He protested his innocence, but it looked as though he was going to be found guilty and sentenced. In desperation, his father consulted Marie and offered to reward her handsomely for her aid. On the very day of the trial, Marie entered the St. Louis Cathedral very early in the morning and knelt for several hours at the altar rail. She had three Guinea peppers in her mouth. Then she secretly crept into the courtroom and places these peppers under a cushion of the judge's chair. The trial went ahead but, surprisingly, the judge dismissed the case and the young man was freed. Overjoyed, the father presented Marie with the small cottage that he owned on St. Anne Street where she was to live until her reported death. There was no doubt that her magic had somehow influenced the judge's decision and the gris-gris that she used were typical of her magic—a combination of older, African elements (the Guinea peppers) with her prayers in a Catholic Cathedral. The mixture was both a potent and effective one, appealing to the innate desire for Christian miracles as well as the native African belief in magic.

In 1835, Christophe Glapion died at the house on St. Anne Street and his death seems to have occurred in June. His age was given as sixty-six. His funeral attracted large numbers, at which Marie sold her gris-gris, told fortunes, and removed curses. She was never one to ignore a business opportunity. After his death, the "Widow Paris" (Marie had never renounced that title, even when she was living with Glapion, perhaps in deference to the Catholic Church) became even more powerful across the city. Similar to Doctor John, she had agents stationed in every part of New Orleans (she ran almost what amounted to a secret service that kept her supplied with information) and she knew many of the secrets of local society, probably culled from her "hairdressing" days. She was also not averse to employing certain techniques that she had observed in some other cultures into Voodoo ritual—one of which was the famous Voodoo doll.

Mommet

Clay images, stuck with pins in order to do harm, were common in some West African cultures, but not all. The purpose of such magic was to fashion an image of a proposed victim and magically link it with its human counterpart. Thus, whatever befell the image would also befall the victim. This harmful aspect was a feature in many English and Continental witch trials. In England it was referred to as a "mommet," appearing in a number of both Scottish and West Country allegations. In Africa, witchcraft dolls were sometimes used to excite passion in the heart of a desired partner or to make individuals do things that they would not ordinarily have done. Occasionally, the image was harmed with the intent of harming the individual, but this was not widespread amongst the West African slaves. Marie introduced some of the European belief into Voodoo with the notion of the dolls that gave her power over her enemies.

Papa Limba

Marie also had a number of enemies in the Voodoo world. From time to time other Voodoo practitioners would try to usurp her position in New Orleans but she was able to see them all off. The most famous of these was a man who called himself Papa Limba (Papa Limba was a Creole name for St. Peter that held great and magical connotations amongst the slaves) and who operated out of a house on Frenchman Street around the late 1840s. Little is known about him except that he seems to have been a rather refined elderly gentleman, a free man of colour, who affected the stylish European dress of a black frock coat when he went out in public. Papa Limba was said to control shadows that he sent out to do "dark business" and harm people. This idea may have been the origin of some of the zombie stories around New Orleans at the time. The Papa used to boast that his magic was stronger than that of Marie Laveau and that his gris-gris could "do away with her" if he so chose. He also claimed to be the direct and true descendant of Doctor John and that Marie was only an impostor. For a while he flourished and may actually have been something of a threat to the empire that Marie was building, but his sudden and inexplicable death put an end to any challenge that he might have offered and only increased Marie's standing. It was widely believed that her own superior powers killed him.

Mama Eunice

Another competitor was Mama (or Maman) Eunice who sold gris-gris and poudres around Bayou St. John. She does not seem to have been much of a threat to Marie, but she did conduct a number of gatherings at which a mixture of rum and gunpowder was consumed and frenzied, sexual dancing took place—a mirror of Marie's own gatherings. Outraged at this, Marie warned her to stop. For a while, Mama Eunice took no notice and continued to hawk her charms around the city and engage in sexual antics at her gatherings. In the end, Marie openly threatened her with death and this seems to have focused the Mama's mind. Marie instructed her to leave New Orleans and not to return and Mama seems to have readily complied.

Maison Blanche

Marie eventually bought another house near Milneburg called "Maison Blanche" and, though she used it herself for various activities, it became the centre of operations for her daughter, who was to become the second Marie Laveau. The house was described as having six rooms, one of which was a large common room where special ceremonies and dancing took place. All non-members of Marie's' "cult" were excluded. Many of the Voodoo rituals that were carried out there are thought to have been Petro Voodoo, performed largely by slaves from Santo Domingo, who always seemed to be around the house.

Marie now moved around the city in the style of a film star today. Everywhere the Widow Paris went, she was accompanied by bodyguards and attendants who kept the public (and the law) at bay. They were led by one of her sons—a burly man who bore the name Christophe Paris and who acted as a kind of "head of security" during her appearances.

The gatherings became wilder and less inhibited. Marie usually wore a full-length blue dress and mostly she was the only one wearing any clothes at all. The display of public nudity, coupled with the sexual dancing, outraged the moral guardians of New Orleans society.

In the mid-1850s, Marie Laveau began to take an interest in the welfare of prisoners. Previously, during a yellow fever epidemic, she had nursed the sick, which had given her the reputation of being a thoroughly kind woman in reality. She began visiting Parish Prison and became a well-known figure there, particularly amongst the men awaiting execution. It is said that she sometimes prayed with them or else prayed for them in the prison chapel. She brought food and even sat and talked earnestly with some of the more violent inmates. Gradually her visits came to be noticed by the Press.

John Adam and Anthony Deslisle

The first report of her visits was in 1852 (although they had been going on long before that), when she visited the cells of two murderers—John Adam and Anthony Deslisle—who had both been convicted of the brutal murder of a young girl. They had bludgeoned the child to death as they attempted to rob the house of her mistress, Madam Chevillon, but had been subsequently caught, brought to trial, found guilty, and sentenced to death. Their trial excited great interest all across New Orleans, possibly because of the viciousness of the crime. Marie visited frequently and talked seriously with them, especially with Deslisle.

On the day of the execution, a gallows had been erected on Orleans Street and a large crowd assembled. It was a beautiful day, warm and cloudless, with the sun shining brightly. Many of the people had brought their children to see the execution. Upon his appearance on the scaffold, Deslisle began a long, rambling, and almost hysterical oration, proclaiming his innocence and castigating the "barbarous Americans." As a Frenchman, he declared and desired a grand funeral that only Frenchmen should attend. In the middle of his harangue, he suddenly gave a terrified scream and pointed upwards. Overhead, a black cloud had suddenly appeared, whirling and swirling like a living thing. What had been a beautiful morning suddenly became a dull, gray twilight. A moment later, the sky turned almost black and people murmured that it was "like the Crucifixion." Rain began to fall in a flood. Despite the increasingly jittery mob of onlookers, the execution went ahead as scheduled. As both bodies dropped, lightning suddenly split the sky followed by a clap of thunder, signalling the impending doom. The crowd screamed and panicked but held firm. The bodies hung on the end of their ropes, which were now cut, allowing the corpses to fall to the ground. Suddenly, Deslisle moved and appeared to be trying to crawl, even though his right arm was bloody and broken. Adam, too seemed to be still breathing. The crowd surged forward and the police had to use their clubs in order to hold them back. Carrying the victims into the prison, they attempted to revive them with only partial success. Ten minutes later, the prisoners were carried out and hanged once more, this time quite successfully. All at once the storm clouds passed and the sun shone through again. On the edge of the crowd, a tall woman, her face covered by a veil but her hands showing her to be a woman of colour, turned away and disappeared into the maze of side streets and the whisper went about that it was Marie Laveau. The Adam-Deslisle case was a major talking point for many years after, but it was not the only such case in which Marie was involved.

Antoine Cambre

Antoine Cambre, a Creole from an old and well-established family, had shot and killed an old city lamplighter during a drunken argument. Cambre had led a wild and dissolute life—a fact that would count against him when on trial; it was likely that he would be hanged for the murder. This was indeed the result of the trial. Marie visited him in his cell and said, "Before you die, what would you like to eat?" The young man had other things on his mind besides a meal; however, Marie promised him that she would cook him a gumbo like no other that he had ever tasted. She brought it to him on the day of his execution and when the guards came to take him to the scaffold, they found him writhing in agony on the floor of the cell. He died soon after and although poison was suspected, no trace of it could be found. There was no doubt, however, that Cambre had eaten some of Marie Laveau's gumbo.

James Mullin

This was not the only high profile gift that she was to bring a condemned man. In 1859, she achieved notoriety all over New Orleans by bringing the murderer James Mullin his coffin. This coffin was both interesting and unique as it was decorated both inside and out with religious pictures. Marie and some others had worked on it for a long time beforehand. There was also the rather gruesome feature of a pillow made from the dress of Mullin's three-year-old daughter. Marie visited him and prayed with him every day until he was hanged.

Marie's Other Good Deeds

She further visited a number of other notorious murderers, all of whom added to her reputation as a "witchy" woman and a Voodoo queen. Among those she worked with were Heinrich Haas, Peter Smith, and Joseph Linsay, all of whom were sentenced to hang. Haas in particular received a great deal of her attention and she is said to have helped him decorate his condemned cell with many religious pictures. Her attentions toward Joseph Bazar in 1868 proved to have a positive result. Bazar had been convicted of killing his wife's lover, by battering him to death with a large stone whilst in a fit of drunken rage. As he stood on the gallows with a rope around his neck, a messenger suddenly galloped up, carrying a Commutation of Sentence, signed by the State Governor Warmouth. This was put down to the supernatural intervention of Marie Laveau who had been exceptionally sympathetic towards Bazar.

Despite her seemingly good works, both the Church and many upright New Orleans citizens still remained hostile towards the Widow Paris, declaring that her visits to the prisons were no more than publicity-seeking exercises. This hostility was exacerbated by newspaper reports that Marie had imported a "heathen idol" from Africa and had used it in her rites, sacrificing goats and cockerels to it whilst naked followers danced all around it. "Voodoo Virgin" trumpeted the headlines together with the claim that Marie was replacing the holy statues with pagan idols. The rift between Marie and the Church widened and though she still attended Mass from time to time, her reception was distinctly cool. Many believed that she had taken Voodoo down a diabolical path and into the realms of darkest sorcery.

Marie Laveau was now an old woman and folktales speak of a withered crone with yellow skin and tufts of white hair peeking from under a dark skullcap. She was now arthritic and a little infirm, but her eyes, say the accounts, were still bright and full of hellfire. However, not even a witch can live forever and it is thought that the first Marie, the Widow Paris, died somewhere around 1880/81, though nobody is actually sure. By that time, she was succeeded by another Marie Laveau, who was in all probability her own daughter.

Marie Glapion: Marie II

Marie Glapion, who was to become Marie II, was born on 2nd February 1827, the daughter of Marie Laveau and Christophe Glapion. She was only one of Marie's many children, but she was intensely beautiful and bore a remarkable resemblance to her mother. Indeed, the legend said that somehow the first Marie had magically "rejuvenated" herself, a notion that her successor did not dismiss. Similar to her mother, she had begun work as a "hairdresser" and using some of her mother's money had opened an establishment on Royal Street. Later, she would open another premise on Bourbon Street, between St. Peter Street and Toulouse Street. In both establishments, she established a "Voodoo altar" that were said to hold statues of both St. Peter and the Virgin, both covered with a sheet. From time to time there would be gatherings at the back of these shops at which, according to local folklore, rum would be consumed and queer rituals observed.

Whilst the first Marie Laveau had exhibited many endearing and humanitarian traits, such as her helping of those in distress and her nursing of the victims of yellow fever, few of these were evident in her daughter. The second Marie inspired and ruled by fear. Gradually, she took on a greater role as a Voodoo queen, driving her aged mother more and more into the background. At the house in St. Anne's Street, Marie II added a narrow back room and it was here that the first Marie Laveau was kept, practically under house arrest, whilst her daughter reigned supreme in New Orleans.

Mama Antoine

Every Monday night, Marie II would go to the house of a Voodoo practitioner called Mama Antoine on Dumaine Street, where gatherings were often held. These gatherings were known as parterres and were designed to encourage the spirits to come amongst them. A grand feast was reputedly laid out for the loa on a white table that included congris, apples, red peppers, chillies, and oranges. These feasts were overseen by a woman named Georgina Laveau, who was thought to have been a sister of Marie II and another who styled herself "Josephine Bayou."

There was dancing, too. A popular mystical dance called Fe Chauffe was described as being "really wild" and that was performed with the dancers often balancing lighted candles on their heads. A number of white ladies were also said to be in attendance, each paying Marie a substantial amount of money for being there—many of whom copulated with quadroons and other black men who were there. Many of these Monday night gatherings had the reputation of being little more than orgies disguised in quasi-religious trappings.

This brought in another side of Marie II's activities—her acting as a procuress. The Maison Blanche was already recognized, even in her mother's time, as a "place of ill repute" where white men could often meet young coloured girls, but at least the elder Marie had the sense to keep such activities relatively secret. Her daughter had no such inhibitions and let it be known far and wide that she offered such services for those who wanted them.

Doctor Jim

The major male figure in Marie II's life was a certain man of colour—part Native American, part black—named James Alexander, the self-styled Doctor Jim. He proved her first real challenge. Doctor Jim had come from Mississippi, with his wife, who was by no means a Voodoo practitioner herself. There were a number who said that James Alexander wasn't his real name at all—that it was Laurensky Avery—and that he was part Native American. Many people simply referred to him as "Indian Jim." Unlike Marie II, he was more sympathetic to his clients in the way that the original Marie Laveau had been—it is said that his gris-gris were more about healing than doing harm. Gradually, a kind of feud began to grow between the two Voodoo practitioners, and Marie II clearly saw him as a palpable threat to her carefully constructed empire. The feud was reported in the Daily Picayune as a "Voodoo war" in New Orleans and stated that supporters of both factions had threatened to clash, leading to the call-out for police support who dispersed the crowds and arrested several individuals for disorderly conduct.

Doctor Jim seems to have done quite well and soon was able to buy a house near Johnston Street, which he used as a base of operations. His influence now extended across the Mississippi River to Algiers, where he is said to have driven out several evil spirits, including demons, which had been sent by Marie II to torment her enemies. He was quite willing to work with some of the babalawo there, including a well-respected leader named Papa Sol. In many of his treatments and "exorcisms" in the Algiers district, Doctor Jim frequently used beer, which he would sprinkle over furniture in "diseased houses" or over people who were possessed by unfriendly loa. He began to preside over a number of Voodoo gatherings and was reckoned to be one of the "best Hoodoo dancers in New Orleans." He mixed traditional Voodoo dances with more recognized formats such as the Calinda and also added an element of Indian war dance that made the whole performance seem frenzied and bizarre. Unlike Marie II, he was also extremely careful to keep his followers out of "police trouble" and although his dances attracted the interest of the authorities, nobody was ever arrested. He ran several large gatherings out at Lake Pontchartrain, some of which were conducted on boats, adding to their novelty. There is no doubt that Doctor Jim was a great showman, often appearing clad only in a long blue sash and white frieze drawers.

Marie II's response to this was to surround herself with more and more gruesome and "mystical" trappings and to adopt a more haughty and mysterious image. Her rooms now contained elements of the dead, such as skulls and human rib cages; she is said to have kept complete skeletons in her armoire. Poisonous snakes were said to crawl across the carpets and deadly spiders hung in cobwebs from the ceiling. Simply to visit her must have taken a great deal of courage. She concentrated even more or curses and love potions. Her speciality was said to be a special file (seasoning) which, if added to food (such as gumbo) would induce both love and lust in those who consumed it. But despite the now-fantastic stories about her, she seemed powerless to limit the growing influence of Doctor Jim, especially in the Algiers districts. Then she had a stroke of luck.

One Yoy Lisvaudais

Doctor Jim met a sudden and violent death, which many people attributed to the supernatural influence of Marie Laveau. Whilst treating a simple-minded boy named One Yoy Lisvaudais, his patient suddenly and inexplicably became irritated and struck him on the temple with a rock. Doctor Jim was dazed, but recovered temporarily. However, the wound became infected and developed into an abscess that eventually killed him after several days. Many in New Orleans said that this was the work of his great rival in her house at the Maison Blanche.

Clementine Alexander

His estate now descended into chaos as his widow, Clementine, tried to claim her inheritance. All that he seemed to have left her was his house on Johnston Street, but there was also a great deal of money hidden somewhere. There were legal complications about claiming the house because it was revealed that his name had been neither James Alexander or Laurinsky Avery as had been commonly supposed, but rather Charles LeFontaine. It also emerged that he had owned other properties—mainly between Gentilly and Spanish Fort—under a variety of names, but that all the paperwork had been done in the names of James Alexander, or Charles LeFontaine. It was years before the case was finally finished, although it was thought that there was a vast amount of money—perhaps lodged under yet another name—that has never been recovered, even today. Doctor Jim's death, however, left Marie II pretty much as the undisputed leading Voodoo practitioner in New Orleans. A few figures, such as Papa Sol and Madame Roux raised their heads, trying to claim Doctor Jim's legacy in Algiers, but she was able to see them off and her reign was absolute across the city.

On 16th June 1881, many newspapers in New Orleans carried the story that Marie Laveau, the famous Voodoo queen, had died. This was, of course, the Widow Paris, the first Marie Laveau, who had been languishing in the back room of the Maison Blanche whilst her daughter conducted her Voodoo gatherings. She was now said to be an old and withered woman whom very few people saw and who, when she was released from her room, shuffled vacantly about the house in a vaguely bewildered state. Of course, as soon as her death was announced, legends began to form around this event. One said that there had been a thunderstorm over the house at the very moment of her death; another said that there had been shrieks and howls and clanking of chains from the room itself and that a strong smell of sulphur had pervaded the general area around the Maison Blanche and St. Anne Street. However, the most astonishing thing about the death was that before Marie died, she had been attended to by a priest only hours before. She had renounced the Zombi and all her "old African wickedness" and had accepted the Sacraments. In other words, she had died a good Catholic. Indeed, some members of her family seethed with indignation at the mere suggestion that she had ever practiced Voodoo. As part of her will, she urged those who loved her to administer to the fever-ridden hospitals of the city. She was now treated as a virtual saint, both by those who had followed her and by the Church—something of an achievement! At the time of her death, her daughter, Marie Glapion (Marie II) was fifty-four years old and immediately formally assumed the name "Marie Laveau," although she'd been using it for years.

Following the death of the Widow Paris, cracks and schisms began to appear in the Glapion family. Marie II was unmarried, although she had several lovers and reputedly a good number of children, some of whom had changed their names in order to marry. Given their newfound "decent" status, they began to look disapprovingly on their mother as what was effectively the mistress of a brothel. Some of them also disapproved of her "Voodoo ways" and wanted little to do with her.

Madame LeGrande

Marie II also banished her sister, "Madame Legrande," from the Maison Blanche over some trifling matter and sent her to live in the St. Ann Street house. Madam Legrande threatened to have her new home torn down. Marie was also in dispute with the children from her mother's first marriage to Jacques Paris who now styled themselves as "Laveaus." She had seized as much money as she could from her mother's fortune, denying her first children any portion. She evicted John Laveau from a house that she owned and turned both him and his family out onto the streets. She was now pretty much an outcast from the majority of her family—both for the treatment of her mother and her indifference towards the family. This was exacerbated by her relationship with a "Doctor Theophile," an old and much loved babalawo who operated in the Algiers district and who claimed to be a direct descendant of Doctor John. He had gathered many of Doctor Jim's followers who were incredibly hostile towards Marie II, whom they blamed for the death of James Alexander. Either she or her agents seem to have been responsible for the death of Doctor Theophile as well, for he appears to have died after eating some poisoned file that was sprinkled on his food. Many people blamed Marie II for his death, just as they had blamed her for that of Doctor Jim, and gradually a groundswell of hostility was building up. Marie, however, seemed unperturbed.

Lafcadio Hearn

Marie II took plenty of lovers, one of whom was reputedly the writer Lafcadio Hearn, whom she had met in 1880. If there was a relationship between the two of them, it was not long-lived. Hearn himself described her as "a vampire" and distanced himself from her. Nevertheless, she remained a good-looking woman, even well into her fifties, and entertained a stream of paramours, many of them white. Both her sexual and political prowess in the world of Voodoo were now at their height and she was able to buy a small house on the banks of Lake Pontchartrain where she began to live and conduct her revels out on the Lake. She took a page from Doctor Jim's book and began to conduct some of her gatherings on boats and barges in the water.

There is some mystery surrounding Marie II's death in the latter half of the 1890s. There are many who insist that she was drowned. By this time, she had become "very wild" and her gris-gris had become extremely expensive. Her gatherings bordered on the darker side of Voodoo with Le Grand Zombi raised as an evil god for her followers to worship. There were rumours of blood sacrifice and it is known that the police were keeping a watchful eye on all her ceremonies. During one of these gatherings at Pontchartrain, according to old folk legend, a massive storm blew up out on the Lake and swept inland. It moved with such speed that the dancers along the shore were caught unawares and swept into the water. One of these was Marie herself. In another version of the same story, the storm blew up at night and swept inland, sweeping away the house on the shore in which Marie was sleeping. Her body was never recovered.

Other versions of her demise, however, claim that she was poisoned. It is known that Marie II had many enemies, and it has been suggested that she ate poisoned food, which they had tampered with. However, this version is problematic; it is known that Marie was extremely particular about everything she ate and drank, particularly because of the fear of poisoning. Skilled at the art of poisoning, she would have been well aware of the ease with which food could be doctored and would therefore be wary. Suspicion fell on Madame Legrand who at this time. was trying to make the Laveau family respectable and distance it from Voodoo practices and from the Voodoo queens. The woman, however, flatly denied any murder attempt and nothing really could be proved. Whatever the circumstances of her death may have been, it seems to have occurred around June 1897, as an inscription on the Laveau-Glapion tomb in St. Louis Cemetery No. 1 testifies:

> "Marie Philome Glapion, decedee le 11 Juin 1897. Agee de Soizante-deux ans."

A great many Voodoo followers still take this as the last resting place of the "real Marie Laveau," forgetting that there was one before her—the Widow Paris. There were some, however, who insisted that she was not dead at all, and that her "death" was a trick designed to throw the authorities off her scent. It was said that the police had been planning to arrest her and that she was "lying low" for a time before making a reappearance. She was allegedly "seen" in various parts of New Orleans—in shops, walking on the street, standing in the doorway of a house—but, even after some time, she failed to reappear. Besides, ever since the death of the Widow Paris in 1881, Marie II had a rival waiting in the wings for her Voodoo crown. This was Malvina Latour.

Malvina Latour: Marie III

Very little is known about Malvina Latour. At the time of the Widow Paris's death, she is described as a big, heavy-set, raw-boned woman, roughly in her mid-forties. Sometimes she claimed to be a daughter of Marie II by a black man, at other times she did not, and there is no evidence that she was. She was, however, extremely handsome, and carried some of the smouldering good-looks of Marie II and the Widow Paris. She had a sophisticated bearing and was unquestionably of high intelligence. It was whispered that she had been privately educated, unusual for a woman of colour. Indeed, it was claimed that she had a brother in the State Legislature but this remains unproven. After the death of the Widow Paris, she began calling herself "Marie Laveau" (making her, in effect, Marie III) though probably she had no intention of setting herself up as a major Voodoo queen.

Despite the fact that Marie II was still living, Malvina began to conduct a number of ceremonies in the city, the most famous being the one on St. John's Eve. These practices began to return towards the traditional practices of Rada Voodoo—the old religion that had been brought from Dahomey. She attempted to remove all of the Catholic trappings that had been introduced by the first Marie and to return the revels to their purest African state. She was a Catholic herself and looked at Voodoo as a profession, not as a religion. Therefore, her addition of Catholic imagery and ritual was considered sacrilegious in the Voodoo world. However, her grip on the Voodoo world was not as tight as that of Marie II and the latter did not consider her all that great a threat. Because there was a slight chance that Malvina Latour was her daughter, she may have tolerated the revels on St. John's Eve and the limited gris-gris that Malvina sold.

In the meantime, Madame Legrand struggled to distance the Laveaus from the taint of Voodoo and to make the family name (and her own) thoroughly respectable in New Orleans society. She drew her family closer to the Catholic Church (she was a devout Catholic herself) and many of them renounced the Voodoo ways and denied that they had ever been associated with the African religion. Some of them may truly not have had any association with Voodoo at all. In 1903, the house on St. Anne Street was pulled down and with it: the last traces of the original Marie Laveau.

Acting supposedly as Marie III, Malvina Latour failed to bring any sort of cohesion to the New Orleans Voodoo cults, nor was she able to hold the existing worshippers together in any recognizable cult. After Marie II's death, voodoo in New Orleans began to fragment into minor cults and gatherings.

Leon Juniper

A group centered around Leon Juniper, a black man who had worked with the Laveaus and had, at one time, been a lover of Marie II. Juniper was not really a major Voodoo practitioner but his close associations with Marie II had given him some credibility in the Voodoo world. Each day, he would walk to St. Louis Cemetery No. 1, where Marie was buried, and perform a ritual known as the "four corners," which is still practiced today.

The person performing the rite enters the cemetery and goes to each corner in turn, making a wish as soon as he or she reaches the corner in question. Then the practitioner walks quickly along two blocks to the Church of Our Lady of Guadeloupe on North Rampart Street and says a prayer, kneeling before the stature of St. Expedite. During the performance of this ritual, Leon Juniper claimed that he heard the voice of Marie II speaking to him and in this way he was able to convey her instructions to her followers.

Miss Jackson

There was also a "Miss Jackson," a well-known black Voodoo queen who had learned her trade with Marie II and Leon Juniper. She made a great thing of dancing with a deadly python at some of the Voodoo ceremonies in a house on Roman Street. She also distilled liquor and sold it to the participants because nobody could bring in strong drink from outside. There was animal sacrifice (usually a goat or a rooster) at all her ceremonies.

Madame Augustine

Another figure of the time was Madame Augustine, a stately looking woman of colour. After Marie II died, she took over some of the surviving cult and held it together for a short while. She was considered to be very beautiful. After 1899, however, she disappeared for a long time but turned up again about the beginning of the 20th century. However, all her former beauty was now gone and she presented quite a terrifying appearance. This was not enhanced by the fact that her left eye was missing. She used this disfigurement to her advantage, claiming that the socket had supernatural powers. But even so, she was not to enjoy anything similar to her former prestige as a Voodoo queen.

Angele Lavasseur

Several of the queens referred to themselves as "Marie Laveau," which makes tracing the true inheritance of the name exceptionally difficult. One of these, Angele Lavasseur, certainly owned a cabin on the shores of Lake Pontchartrain, where she held weekly revels, mainly for white people. During one of her revels, a major storm swept the Lake and smashed her cabin, drowning all there, including Angele herself. This may be the origin of the drowning story concerning Marie II.

Marie Comtesse

The most celebrated of the New Orleans Voodoo queens of the early 20th century was known as "Marie Comtesse" although she also styled herself "Marie Laveau" or sometimes "Marie IV" (Malvina Latour, or Marie III, disappeared into relative obscurity) but who was, in fact, no relation to the Laveau clan. She was famous for her "revels" that were nothing more than orgies over which she presided. Her speciality was to provide shapely young girls who danced naked for customers attending her dances out near Bayou St. John. It was said that in the swamps, she buried an absolute fortune, none of which has ever been found. She was always very grandly dressed with a white shoulder bag in which she carried her gris-gris that she distributed to paying customers at various times during the night.

Her end was strange and sudden. During one of the revels, she leaned against a wooden post on the edge of a swamp. The post, which was partly rotted, suddenly gave way and she fell awkwardly, breaking her neck. "La Comtesse," as she was known, was buried in the Wishing Vault in St. Louis Cemetery No. 2. She was practically the last of the great Voodoo queens of New Orleans and no other would manage to hold the various cults that existed in the city together in the way that the old Voodoo queens had done. The era of the Laveaus and others would be counted as a kind of Golden Age of Voodoo in the city. After that it would fragment and splinter into a number of cults.

American Voodoo: Charleston

Conjure men and babalawo were to be found everywhere in Charleston, selling gris-gris, and allegedly commanding the dead whom they called from their tombs.

John Domingo

Although Marie Laveau was the most famous of all the Voodoo queens, and New Orleans was certainly widely considered to be steeped in African magic, there were other sinister practitioners in other parts of the country. Charleston, South Carolina was also viewed as something of a Voodoo city, and John Domingo, the Black Constable, was clearly a rival to Dr. John back in New Orleans. In the late 1800s, Domingo, who had formerly lived in the Carolina Low Country, was considered to be the greatest and deadliest sorcerer in the whole state since the days of Gullah Jack Pritchard, a notable conjure-man who had been involved in an uprising amongst the slaves around the time of the alleged Denmark Vesey slave revolt almost a century earlier.

He was considered to be more powerful than many of his contemporaries, such as Dicky Breaux, the black Voodoo king of Dorchester Road, or Cut-Bread Jack, who lived for a time on Charlotte Street. Domingo himself lived in a queer, shabby old house with a peaked roof on Magazine Corner where it led into Mazyck Street (although it doesn't bear that name now). The house has long since been demolished to be replaced by a stretch of waste ground and grass. The house had been formerly owned by a Dutchman who had been forced to flee from Holland for some blasphemous and unmentionable crime and who ran the place as a shop. The house had an ill name even before Domingo arrived, and it had an even worse one when he lived there.

John Domingo was an extremely dangerous man—a necromancer and a sorcerer of frightening power. He was a huge man, powerfully built, his body wrapped in a huge Union-blue greatcoat in the winter and with darkly glittering eyes and a massive nose, hooked like the beak of a predatory bird. His long, shoulder-length hair was tied in thick tufts with a shoestring along with several long and greasy strands hanging down the side of his face. He always wore a silver ring, shaped like a snake, on the fourth finger of one hand. He said that it had been made somewhere along the Congo River and that it held great power—the power of Le Grand Zombi.

The street in which Domingo lived had once been extremely respectable and had been the abode of many of the old Charleston families of quality—the Northrops, the Gasdens, and the Malones. Now it had a "run down" feel about it and had such an evil name that few decent people would even mention it. An old legend stated that it had lost its good name after John Domingo himself had cursed it, though why he did so is uncertain. People scoffed that nobody could curse an entire street, but one look at Mazyck Street could convince otherwise. It was dirty and filled with piles of rubbish where dogs rooted all day and was to remain so until around the end of the First World War, when part of it at least was pulled down. Those who had to travel through always hurried and did not delay, and the last of the quality folks, who still lived there because they had no money to move and nobody would buy their properties, seldom opened either their doors or windows.

The Black Constable as he was called, did not seem to be bound by white men's laws or the laws of Charleston. He made his own laws and his neighbours respected that. An old man who lived next door to him saw what Domingo kept in his back yard and it terrified him, but he was forced to shrug his shoulders and say nothing because he feared the Black Constable. Though the people of Charleston feared him, they still consulted him and bought his gris-gris—bags filled with goofer dust (dust gathered from a grave under a full moon or sometimes made with the powdered bones of corpses), lucky jacks, and Voodoo sticks. He could sell charms that would make any man a favourite with the ladies, no matter how ugly he was. There is a story that Domingo sold a hideous old man named Isaac Motte a charm that had the young girls tormenting him, even though he was elderly and ugly. He was supposed to curse individuals by simply shaking a poudre on the ground where they'd passed. He reputedly obtained some of his gris-gris from the old cemeteries on Ghost Island, a place that was rumoured to be very badly haunted. Indeed the popular story was that the Constable could raise the dead with a snap of his fingers and make them do his bidding. Some called him a "Zombi man."

His neighbours knew better than to cross him. Once he had a dispute with a man who lived across the road from him and who owned a well that gave sweet and pure water. The Constable sent a rainbow to suck the well dry and it never gave water of any kind again. Women were also fearful of combing their hair out of their windows or of sweeping in front of their doors, in case the Constable would collect stray hairs or some other personal item and use it against them. There was great rivalry amongst some of the women around Mazyck Street, and they consulted with John Domingo to do their rivals harm or to ruin their looks. At his height, he maintained a great number of wealthy clients, and was reputedly one of the richest men in Charleston, although he chose to live as though he were a pauper.

He had a curious thing, similar to a whirligig, on the top of his curious old house, by which it was said, he could control the wind and summon up storms. He also sold favourable winds to sailors and fishermen. There were many stories about this. In one, a fisherman named John Akiss sent his old mother to buy a favourable wind from the Constable, but she, being an elderly woman, forgot. John Akiss then bought a wind from another sorcerer—the best he could do before he put to sea. John Domingo heard about this and took it personally. He sent a storm after Akiss's boat so that it was driven aground and wrecked on the Drunken Dick shoal and Akiss and his crew of nine men were drowned. And all through a simple act of forgetfulness. This reminded people not to trifle when they dealt with John Domingo.

But it was for his dealings with the dead that Domingo was best known. He was a necromancer of the first order and his neighbours stated that the shadows that clustered around his doorway after nightfall were the spirits of the dead whom he had summoned to him. Others said that they were lurking corpses that he had brought from the tomb for his own ends and purposes. Many said that Domingo executed his own brand of law in the area—hence his nickname, the Black Constable—and that he used the shambling dead to enforce it. Those who crossed him or misbehaved badly within his area often found strange and unpleasant things happening to them. They claimed to have seen ghosts and walking dead men and they suffered from ill fortune, or simply sometimes disappeared. All this was attributed to the terrible necromantic powers of John Domingo.

The Black Constable's end came about in a sudden and strange way. He was at the height of his pride and power in Charleston and was pretty much acting as the law in certain quarters of the city. One evening, he pursued two robbers who had violated some residents in his district. The robbers tried to escape but Domingo cornered them in Mount Pleasant and brought them back with him by river to Market Street. Stepping ashore he held one on each side, each by the scruff of the neck.

"See!" he cried to the assembled onlookers. "I am just like Jesus, with a thief on either hand." He paused as if considering something. "Only I'm more powerful than Jesus!" Again he paused almost in mid-sentence. No one knew why, nobody saw anything, except the Black Constable. For a moment, he stood upright, as straight as a post, a look of baffled bewilderment crossing his face. Then foam started to run down from the corners of his mouth. He rose up onto his toes as if something were pulling him up with a kind of hideous strength and several by-standers swore that they saw the marks of long and inhuman fingers on his windpipe, even though there was nothing there. Letting go of the two thieves, who ran for their lives, Domingo began to claw at the area around his throat making sounds similar to a choked chicken as if somebody or something were squeezing the breath from his body. For a moment, he seemed to dangle in the air and then was thrown backwards to the ground. Before anybody could reach him, he had aged a good number of years, becoming an old man, and his face had turned the colour of a withered cucumber.

The onlookers bore the body back to the Market House and laid it out on a counter. A doctor came and pronounced John Domingo dead. Even as they looked at it, the body seemed to shrivel up until it was merely a withered representation of its former self. At this, many people fled out of the Market House, and so nobody really knows what became of the body. It is said that by the end of the day, it was completely gone. It certainly wasn't buried in any of the local churchyards or consecrated ground, and John Domingo was too wealthy to be buried out in the Paupers Field with the destitute of Charleston. Several times afterwards, he was reputedly seen walking down Mazyck Street but this was merely a legend put about by credulous people. However, his name lingered on in the area, always with a sinister taint.

The counter on which his body had been laid out belonged to a local butcher. Afterwards nobody in the area would buy meat from him—they were afraid it had been "touched" by John Domingo and with his business ruined, the butcher died in an almshouse as a pauper. John's oldest son hanged himself in the back of a cowshed at Gadsden's Green and his youngest son was poisoned in a house on Archdale Street. The Black Constable's house was pulled down and the man who bought the site had to rebuild, hoping to exorcise the ghost of John Domingo, but nobody would rent it and so he had to live in it himself until he died. He never had any luck from the day that he moved in—his wife left him and he was always in debt, the final curse of the Black Constable.

Doctor Antoine

Also in Charleston, another babalawo named Doctor Antoine was conducting similar gatherings at a place known locally as Payne's Old Field, at the upper end of Meeting Street. Here candles were said to flicker and drums to beat on the darkest nights—and the dead were said to walk.

Delphine Paysandu and Mother Go-Go

Doctor Antoine was aided by a Voodoo queen named Delphine Paysandu who was said to have come back from the dead several days after she had been buried. Whether this was true or not is a matter for debate, but the story caused fear and uncertainty all across Charleston. In fact, there was talk that Delphine Pasandu was, in fact, a zombie. A similar story circulated concerning the intriguingly named Mother Go-Go, who also operated in the Charleston area. It was alleged that she too had died, but had risen from the grave to become a minor Voodoo queen in the Trapman Street area of the city. In a kind of zombie state, she presided over gatherings that took place in an old narrow house and which were said to involve the drinking of human blood.

Gullah Jack Pritchard

Even as late as the 1920s and early 1930s, a Voodoo man and master of zombies who called himself Gullah Jack Pritchard (supposedly possessed by the loa of the original Gullah Jack) was operating in the area around Charleston. He was arrested and sent to jail for extortion after a lengthy trial that drew a fair amount of interest and publicity due to his alleged "possession." As well as these local magicians, Charleston even had its own equivalent of Marie Laveau—this was Marguarite Lagoux.

Marguarite Lagoux

Marguarite Lagoux was a milliner and mantuamaker (one who made cloaks for ladies) with a shop on the western side of King Street. No trace of it now exists because much of the street was destroyed by fire. She lived in a small house in a narrow alley called Lilac Lane, the location of which is now all but forgotten. She was very beautiful—a quadroon by colour—and was wooed by many of the wealthy young men of Charleston, all of whom she appears to have turned down. Many of her patrons were rich white women and it was whispered in society circles that Marguarite was a voodoo practitioner who ran small gatherings in a yard, just off Lilac Lane. And it was rumoured that she also sold gris-gris along with her hats and cloaks. In some quarters, she became known only as "Madame Margot, the Voodoo Queen."

Gradually, she seemed to lose her good looks; her face became thin and mean looking and the lovely looking girl slowly began to disappear. She seemed to age incredibly fast. It was rumoured that she was quite wealthy but she gave no evidence of this—she dressed respectively but showed no signs of grandeur that had, say, characterized some of the Laveaus back in New Orleans. Some people declared that she had a vast fortune hidden away somewhere in the city but nobody knew where. And there were suggestions that she trafficked with the dead—shambling shadows were often seen around her door in Lilac Lane—and that this had somehow had an affect on her beauty. By the time she was in her mid-thirties, she was a crone, slightly stooped as if with age and with a pinched and drawn face. She closed her shop in King Street and retreated into Charleston's back alleyways. The gris-gris that she sold became much darker and more dangerous—charms for casting curses or for causing lust and unbridled passion in the most reserved of hearts.

She had one daughter, Gabrielle, who married a wealthy gentleman in New Orleans, and became a great society beauty. On the day of the wedding, Madame Margot stood in front of a great mirror and looked at herself. It is said that a shadow, perhaps the shadow of the dead, passed between herself and the glass but only she saw it. She burst into wild and demonic peals of laughter that brought her neighbours running in to see what was wrong with her. Ever afterwards, she refused to have a mirror near her and consequently she became more and more dishevelled in her appearance. Her wits were never the same after that and from time to time she would cackle and laugh to herself for no reason. There are some who assert that the celebrated Charleston witch, rather eccentrically named Old Mother Go-Go, was none other than Madame Margot. Although she had conducted wild revels in Lilac Lane, these soon fell away and she became something of a fabled recluse, only sought out by those with evil intent or the desperate.

She seemed to fall in upon herself, withering slowly away. One night, the tailor who lived across the road from her in the little alley, reported that her house was filled with light, and the sounds of revelry as it had been in earlier days when she'd held the voodoo revels there. He assumed that there was a Voodoo party in progress and kept to his own house. At one stage, however, he did notice a tall black man going up to the door and rapping loudly. The visitor was grandly dressed, but, said the tailor, an unpleasant odour followed him down the street—similar to a charnel stench. At last, his loud knocking was answered and he was admitted to the house. Minutes after he had entered the house, the lights went out and the sounds of revelry ceased. A sudden and violent storm blew in, with lightning cracking around the chimney pots of the old houses of Lilac Lane and the wind threatening to rip the tiles from the roof. Then, just as suddenly as it had arisen, the storm was gone and the night was as calm as ever. Sensing that something momentous had happened, the tailor crept from his house to the building across the lane. The door lay wide open, as were all the windows and he peered inside. The rain had beaten in and laid in puddles as the tailor looked around the door. There lay Madame Margot with her head in the fireplace and her body as black as soot, completely dead. Some say that the elegant dark man who had called was none other than "Le Baron"—Baron Cimitiere, who had come to carry off her evil soul. Others say that it was "Le Grand Zombi" himself.

Largely because of her evil reputation, the bishop declined to have a Mass said for the repose of her soul and the local priest would not allow her body to be buried in St. Sebastian's church. She was therefore buried in the Potter's Field, where the poor were interred under a large magnolia tree. Some say, however, that she was buried in her own garden.

Even though her house in Lilac Lane was later pulled down, her malignant spirit seemed to linger on. After a woman had hanged herself at the end of the Lane, it was closed as a public thoroughfare, but even then people would not cross in front of it. There was an old story that any schoolboy who dared to cross before it would be soundly beaten at school that day.

The country around about Charleston also contained its fair share of Voodoo men and witches. This was the Carolina Low Country, the equivalent to the Bayou Country around New Orleans, that had once been the domain of the Rice Kings and contained many of their plantations. The slaves here were known as Gullah and came from Angola. Their magic was just as potent as that which came from Dahomey, and many sorcerers flourished amongst them.

Doctor Buzzard

The most famous of all the Low Country Voodoo men was Stephaney Robinson, also known as Doctor Buzzard. Part of his fame derives from his arch-nemesis, the High Sheriff of the Low Country, J.E. McTeer, who was not a mean sorcerer himself. Doctor Buzzard died early in 1947 as a very old man and was known throughout the Low Country as a "root worker"—a man who did not work in charms or curses but in poudres and potions, many of which were derived from roots. In 1943, Dr. Buzzard was described as an elderly and dignified gentleman "always soberly dressed in quality black," who might have been mistaken for a bishop in the A.M.E. (African Methodist Episcopal). According to legend, Doctor Buzzard's father may have arrived in America as a slave who had great "conjure power" which he passed on to his son.

Ed McTeer

Ed McTeer, who became High Sheriff of Beaufort County, by contrast, came (on his mother's side), from an established slave-owning Carolina family, the Heywards, whose forebears had signed the Declaration of Independence. McTeer also believed in the power of E.S.P. and he believed in the power of Voodoo. His maternal grandfather was a major rice planter and had witnessed first hand the activities of the conjure-men. His grandmother was said to have possessed the "second sight" and his mother was rumoured to have attended séances amongst the slave-folks. In 1926, McTeer's father who had served as county sheriff died both suddenly and his son, Ed Junior, succeeded him almost immediately. However, the new law officer soon began running into some troublesome cases. A number of people in Beaufort County and beyond began to sicken with some sort of unexplained illness, and strange individuals appeared in local courts and began to fix witnesses with a steely gaze, apparently causing them to "seize up" or change their testimony. There were stories that some of these strange visitors were actually dead. Mysterious white powders began to appear in various parts of the courtroom including upon the judge's desk. McTeer suspected the work of conjure-men or babalawo and resolved to make an example of one or two of them in order to bring the local Gullah community to heel under the law. The man he picked on was the most celebrated conjure-man in the Carolina Low Country—Doctor Buzzard.

By this time, the doctor was famous even beyond the boundaries of Carolina. He was now extremely wealthy and rode around in a large black Lincoln, dressed in the finest of clothes. Moreover, he was rumoured to own property all across Charleston, although nobody could rightly say where. Officially, he lived in some style on the prestigious St. Helena Island, but he was reputedly living in other areas as well. Several attempts had been made to bring him to trial, however Doctor Buzzard was a courtroom specialist and had eluded imprisonment many times, often on technicalities. It was known that he was well versed in the law. McTeer, nevertheless, targeted him for surveillance. Recruiting local cab drivers that usually handled the Doctor's out-of-town customers, he mounted a watch on Doctor Buzzard's St. Helena Island home. But as soon as he began to gather his information, it suddenly died away and stopped. Nobody, it seemed, was willing to talk about Doctor Buzzard. McTeer was personally convinced that the Doctor's "second sight" had warned him of the police surveillance and he began to formulate new plans.

Before these could be enacted, however, World War II broke out. When German submarines moved in offshore, torpedoing everything that came in and out of the harbours of Charleston and Savannah, there were rumours that German spies had come ashore and were in Charleston itself. The local Coast Guard set up patrols to look out for rubber dinghies landing along the coastline. As their Commander, McTeer had more pressing matters to contend with. However, Doctor Buzzard would soon come to his attention once more. The local Draft Board was sending scores of young Gullah men to Fort Jackson, just outside Columbia for induction into the armed forces. The Fort was sending just as many back with unexplained heart flutters and diarrhoea. McTeer suspected the conjure men and root doctors and began to investigate. He further sent a letter to the War Department alleging Voodoo practices amongst some of the Gullah. His response from the Department was both frosty and sceptical. They thanked him for his note, filed it away, and promptly forgot about it. But their minds were to be changed by an event on 26th October 1943. A group of draftees set out for Fort Jackson from Hampton, South Carolina. One of them, a youth named Crispus Green, had told his family to expect him home very soon. He wasn't going to the war because Doctor Buzzard had "fixed him up." Almost half the draftees on the bus had received poudres and tonics from various Voodoo men to cause flutters in their hearts—"hippity hoppity hearts"—or extreme nausea. Before the bus reached Fort Jackson, however, Crispus Green and another young man were dead, and half the others had to be rushed to hospital. The War Department suddenly became extremely interested and the FBI also became involved. McTeer was ordered to take leave of his coastal patrol and assist in the investigation. He was going to have a difficult time because none of the surviving afflicted would testify against a root doctor. However, McTeer was able to procure a sample of a "medicine" that had allegedly been given to some of the victims. It was nothing more than crudely made moonshine mixed with a small amount of lead arsenate. Through the poison, McTeer traced a conjure man—not Doctor Buzzard as he had hoped—but Peter Murray of the Laurel Bay Plantation, also known as Doctor Bug. Murray was arrested and brought to a rural hearing. Set beside the might of the judiciary and the law, he cut a pathetic figure—a shambling, dull-eyed old man who barely seemed to recognize what was going on. Doctor Bug made no real effort to defend himself. He admitted that he'd given the potion and pleaded guilty. The magistrates set his bail bond at a thousand dollars. Doctor Bug simply produced a battered trunk and counted out the money from a pile of wrinkled dollar bills. However, as he left the court, he was approached by officials of the Internal Revenue Service and fined another two thousand dollars for unpaid taxes. This last fine was too much for Doctor Bug—he could pay his fines for practicing Voodoo without a murmur, but it was a different matter when it came to paying his taxes—and, according to tradition, he died shortly afterwards.

Doctor Buzzard, however, remained free throughout the war and in 1946, in an attempt to use his own powers against him, McTeer donned blue sunglasses (blue being a predominant Voodoo colour) and began to shoot all buzzards nesting on the city's water towers. His shots were on target in many cases, however one of the birds seems to have fallen unnoticed into an open tower and, after lying undetected for several days, contaminated the entire city's water supply. It seemed that the Doctor was simply mocking the High Sheriff. However, a spiritual war had begun between the two men.

Once, when McTeer brought in a witness, whom he thought might testify against Doctor Buzzard, the Doctor was arrested at the same time. Although placed in a different interrogation room, Doctor Buzzard seemed to be aware of the questions that the informant was being asked and of the answers he was giving and when the Doctor donned his blue glasses, the witness in another room seemed to become confused and hesitant in his testimony. McTeer had to admit he was beaten. On another occasion, Doctor Buzzard showed up at a trial that McTeer was conducting and fixed certain witnesses with a steely gaze from behind blue glasses, making them falter in their evidence. McTeer spoke out.

"Doctor Buzzard!" he shouted. "I believe that you are trying to 'root' this court and if you persist, I will have you over for contempt." The Doctor never flinched.

"I hear you," he replied. But he was annoyed and left the courtroom shortly afterward. McTeer seemed now to have a slight advantage and his luck was soon to change for the better but under tragic circumstances.

Doctor Buzzard's son, who was famous for his hedonistic lifestyle, drove his car across one of the causeways that crosses Beaufort County's tidal marshes during a blinding rainstorm, drove off the road, and was drowned in a saltwater creek. He was allegedly drunk at the time. All the same, Doctor Buzzard believed that his death was the result of McTeer's hex and approached the High Sheriff to "cut a deal." He would stop prescribing potions if McTeer would stop casting spells. The deal was struck. However, it didn't last—Doctor Buzzard was soon prescribing potions and allegedly practicing Voodoo again and McTeer had him arrested once more for the crime of "practicing medicine without a licence." The doctor now hired a lawyer—a respected State senator who practiced privately—but it did him no good. He was found guilty and fined heavily. It appeared to knock the wind out of his sails and he took to his bed, refusing to get up even to see clients. Shortly afterwards, he was diagnosed with cancer of the stomach. Soon he was dead, but not before leaving a message, which reverberated around the Gullah community—no Voodoo man was more powerful than the white authorities.

However, despite his death, the legend of Doctor Buzzard lived on in the Carolina Low Country and in the Charleston area and both his stature and powers seemed to increase with every retelling of the tales about him. Some said that on one occasion, Doctor Buzzard had managed to escape from McTeer's custody by turning himself into a cat; another said that that he had sent dead men to intimidate prospective witnesses against him.

Ed McTeer remained as High Sheriff of Beaufort County for almost another twenty years. In 1960, however, he was challenged for the job by a South Carolina Highway Patrol sergeant. The campaign was a long and bitter one with allegations flying back and forth between the contending parties. McTeer was said to have used chain-gang prisoners for personal work on his Coffin Point plantation, his deputies took bribes from Gullah bootleggers, the sergeant was involved in smuggling and moonshining, and he had a number of alleged sexual offences against him—the whole debate became very messy and acrimonious. In the end, a Charleston television station agreed to host a debate between the two men—although separately, as things were now so bad between them that they would not appear together. McTeer made his broadcast but, when it came the sergeant's turn, the electrical power went down all across the Low Country and reception was patchy. Many said that it was McTeer's Voodoo powers that had caused the blackout. All the same, the Highway Patrol officer narrowly won the vote and Ed McTeer retired to write his memoirs. The new High Sheriff enjoyed a stormy career that culminated in his assaulting a grand jury member. He barricaded himself in his own home and threatened suicide but was eventually coaxed out, arrested, and placed in mental health care. Local wisdom said that McTeer had driven him insane through sorcery.

McTeer's memoirs, Fifty Years as a Low Country Witch Doctor, became a best seller even beyond South Carolina and made him a minor national figure. He was courted by a number of television and radio stations but refused to talk about Voodoo or about his feud with Doctor Buzzard. In the Carolina Low County, the old ways of the Gullah people slipped further underground and today forms a kind of colourful background to the day-to-day life of the area.

Santeria

Voodoo, however, is still alive and well in a number of forms in many parts of the world. It is the state religion in Benin, West Africa, and is practiced widely in other African, South American, and Caribbean countries. Aspects of it, such as divination and healing are sometimes known by other names—Santeria (divination by shells) and Mama Wati, but many follow the same patterns of belief and the term "Voodoo" is simply retained as a "catch all" description. The old gods still remain and are worshipped today. In New Orleans and Charleston today, it is still possible to buy gris-gris and poudres and many shops and Internet sites based there still sell Voodoo materials. There are a sizeable number practitioners scattered all across the world and, in many respects, Haiti is now its spiritual home—perhaps because of its connections with the Duvalier regime.

Le Grand Zombi

The most potent and recognized symbol of Voodoo is, of course, the zombie—the shambling dead man that rose from the grave controlled by the bokor, or sorcerer. Strangely, zombies do not generally exist is Voodoo tradition, although there is sometimes a tradition of creating mindless servants in some versions of gegbo—the darker side of the voodoo religion. Most of the zombies that appear on the screen or in popular literature are the creations of Hollywood and the Western mind. In Rada Voodoo, "Le Grand Zombi" is one of the incarnations of Damballa-wedo and takes the form of a gigantic python or serpent. This is generally regarded to be the most dangerous and unpredictable form of the loa, and is therefore not often summoned. Only a skilled and powerful magician can control it and it will take revenge upon the summoner if called inappropriately. In Petro Voodoo, however, the meaning changes slightly and refers to those who have been taken over by the loa, whether they are alive or dead. This may have given rise to the concept of the zombie, as we understand the term. The loa is then controlled by the bokor, who in turn controls the physical manifestation. Out of this basic idea has grown a number of zombie nightmares—most sensationally the lumbering, animated corpse who can attack the living at the behest of some evil bokor. The notion of the gris-gris (charm) is inextricably linked with that of the zombie, with the former serving as a beacon for the shambling dead creature, placed by the bokor to guide it to the victim. This is, of course, a dramatic invention of Hollywood and bears little resemblance to actual Voodoo belief.

The zombie was, however, a combination of a number of African and Caribbean folk terrors that wandered around in the tropical night. These were half-remembered bogeymen from the slave days, such as the Ghanaian Dodo, a shambling form that often hid in trees ready to drop upon the unwary traveller and devour him, or the Modulo, a humanoid creature from Zulu lore, who entered houses at night to drink the blood of sleepers through its incredibly long fingernails. Some of theses beings were simply known amongst the slaves as "cockroaches" (a kind of living dead thing) that would attack the "fowl-houses" (slave encampments or enclosures), silently creeping in as soon as the moon was up, with the intention of doing harm. Many of these elements coalesced into a common figure: the shambling nightwalker.

Zombification

Across the years, many explanations for "zombification" (the turning of individuals into zombies) have been advanced. Most of these concern living people who have "died" and seemingly come back to life, bereft of their will and purpose.

Poudre

The most common explanation is that a "poudre" (a toxic or mind-numbing substance) had been surreptitiously given to the victim, placing him or her under the control of a bokor. According to some toxicologists, the sorcerous medicine might contain elements of a stonefish or puffer-fish which slowed down the vital life-signs so much that the victim lapsed into a death-like coma from which only the bokor could revive him or her with an antidote, but at the expense of the individual's will. This theory has formed the basis of several academic papers on toxicology, as well as a number of books and stories such as William Seabrook's Dead Men Working in the Cane-fields and Wade Davis's Serpent and the Rainbow (which was subsequently made into a film, directed by Wes Craven). However, the poudre used by the bokors (if indeed such a thing actually exists) has never been discovered and any samples purporting to be the magic preparation have proved worthless under scientific analysis. If a zombie poudre does exist, then it still remains a secret.

Zombie Films

And of course, there is the shambling figure of the zombie, though this is perhaps owed more to European minds than it does African. Certainly there are stories of the restless dead amongst the Africans and Creoles but these are little different from those of, say, the marbh bheo (nightwalking dead) in Ireland. The connections between zombies and Voodoo ceremonies are largely constructed in the minds of sensationalist filmmakers. Movies such as George A. Romero's Night of the Living Dead (1968) and Dawn of the Dead (1978) and Lucio Fulci's Zombie Flesh Eaters (1979) had served to popularise the idea of the zombie and have added fresh impetus and folklore to the legend. More zombie films are allegedly in the pipeline—linked closely to several new books, linking the animated corpse with Voodoo practices—that may well propel the shuffling dead man to new heights amongst the elite of the Undead.

Ghouls and the Golem

…and they lived by the Red Sea, until Adam and his wife sinned. Then the Holy One sent her forth to ever after wreak her revenge on the children of Mankind.

—Zohar 1 19b

Middle-Eastern Folklore

Although less familiar to Western minds, the folklore and legends of the Middle East have nonetheless played their part in some of the night terrors that continue to haunt our imaginations. Elements of both Arabic and Jewish folklore have subtly woven their way into Western mythologies, creating a number of creatures that stalk and haunt the hours of darkness.

Sons of God

Arguably, these creatures are the oldest of such terrors—their origins shrouded in the mist of the early Middle East of pre-Biblical times. Many of them were born in the chaos that preceded the very foundation of the world and, although not truly chronicled until medieval times, have existed since then. According to some Middle Eastern legends, they were born out of interactions between the developing Universe and mysterious entities known as "the sons of God." (The Bible tells us that they found the daughters of Man fair, and mated with them.) Out of such interaction was born a race of monsters and devils that seemed to overwhelm the world. These were eventually destroyed in a great flood that God sent to cleanse and purify the Earth (a concept that appears in several myth-cycles, including the Bible). It was thought, however, that some of these beings survived the Deluge and persisted in the world, tormenting a new and developing Humankind.

Lilith

Another legendary source for these monsters and terrors was Lilith, reputedly the first wife of Adam. Although she has been discussed elsewhere in this book, it is perhaps worthwhile to make mention of her in this context. The Jewish Talmud describes her as a demon of the night, with long hair and a human likeness. It is also suggested that she had wings and was able to fly. According to the third century Palestinian scholar, Jerimia ben Eleazar, both she and Adam "begot ghosts, male demons, and female night demons" that were to prey on Mankind across the centuries.

Adam Kadmon

Very ancient legends tell of how Lilith, a demon born out of chaos, seduced Adam (or perhaps Adam Kadmon—the first prototype of Man created by God) into becoming his wife. Through her, it was said in rabbinical lore, the forces of primal darkness sought to gain entry into the world of men. She led the proto-Adam (or Adam Kadmon) to commit sinful deeds and she bore him many children—most of whom were monsters and night terrors. In the end, according to some versions of old rabbinical tales, appalled by the foulness that was being spawned on earth, God destroyed Adam Kadmon and his brood but, for some unspecified reason, did not destroy Lilith. Instead, He banished her into the mountains and deep caverns where she continued to mate with demons and raise more monstrous entities (later largely destroyed by the Great Flood). Adam Kadmon was replaced by the more familiar Adam, the father of Mankind, and was given a wife, Eve, made from his own flesh. However, this second Adam also sinned—although perhaps to a lesser extent than the first—and he and his partner were banished from the Paradise that God had established on Earth and into the wilderness where the monsters spawned by Lilith presumably still dwelt. These terrors would subsequently become the tormentors of Mankind.

Alphabet of Ben Sira

Lilith is probably first mentioned by name as a "night monster" in an ancient text known as the Alphabet of Ben Sira, a book of Talmudic magic, probably produced some time between the 7th and 11th centuries. This work also mentions Adam, describing him as the "father of ghouls"— referring to the awful children born to him by Lilith. The implication here is that the beings terrifying Mankind at the time may have had some element of human in them but, this was subdued by a supernatural evil.

Sefer Hasidim

Although the majority of such creatures were swept away in the Deluge, a number of them did survive into the Second Era of Man (that is, when he had re-established himself in the world after the flood) where they continued their dark work. Many of these entities were demons, either invisible or partially visible to the human eye, but were implacably opposed to Humankind and continually sought ways to injure or kill God's children. No one was exempt from their attack, and books such as the Sefer Hasidim or Book of the Pious (attributed to Rabbi Judah he-Hesid or Samuel the Pious, 1150–1217) are filled with anecdotes and stories concerning their wiles and maliciousness. These beings were subtle, seeking to subvert men and turn them from good and the worship of God through devious measures and stratagems. This was the original notion of such entities, although much later opinions on demons and monsters in Semitic theological thought became more divided. One unidentified early writer noted: "They are more God-fearing than men are…they harm no-one without good cause; if a man does not provoke them…he need have no fear." The suggestion here was that the evils carried out by such entities were no more than as a reaction to provocation by humans. This, however, was in no way to diminish their supernatural powers, and if they chose to strike out in retaliation, they would do great injury and harm in the mortal world. The prime provocation was considered to try and force them, through some form of formal conjuration, to do the will of a human individual or to try and subdue them in some way. Provocation could also come from ill-chosen words, deeds, or even glances that infuriated these spirits, entities, and forces. Uncleanliness in individuals or dwellings only served to encourage entities of a certain sort that would remain until purification. Whilst some were extremely dangerous, others were merely irritants that brought further discomfort to an already difficult life, or simply terrified individuals with their sounds or in some cases, appearances.

Two schools of thought were now rapidly developing—one stating that demons and monsters had been opposed to Mankind ever since the foundation of the world; the other asserting that they were no more than a response to man's desires—lust, greed, murderous intent, uncleanliness, and neglect of Godly worship. Stories supporting both views circulated widely and are recorded in a wealth of literature—stories of unprovoked attacks on travellers by evil spirits; of ill-luck dogging a family following some inadvertent act; of a subsequent illness, deriving from the evil eye, or of invocations for the lifting of a sickness caused by demons. All of these relate to the spawn of Lilith who, for whatever motive were determined to make human life difficult. Mankind was always in peril.

Gigul

Closely allied to the concept of demons was the concept of the gigul or "clinging soul." This Jewish folklore term is difficult to specify but may lie somewhere between the ghost of a dead person and an elemental force or demon.

These entities were known as "dybbuk" although the word itself did not appear in rabbinical literature until roughly the 17th century. In its earliest incarnation, the "clinging soul" may not have been all that threatening and may well have referred to a Presence that attached itself either to an individual or a dwelling, and refused to go away. It may well have possessed a person—indeed, one of the earliest references that we have to it is in the Bible

(1 Samuel 16: 1–4) where an "evil spirit" overtakes King Saul and hurls him into an unprovoked rage. Saul himself visited a woman at Endor (a "pythoness," probably some sort of medium) who summoned another "clinging soul"—that of the prophet Samuel himself (1 Samuel 28:3).

Dybbuk

In the 16th century, however, the idea of spirit possession by the dybbuk became extremely popular in certain Rabbinical schools, for example those of Isaac Luria (1534–1572) and his disciple Chayyim Vital (1542–1620). Through this school of theological teaching, the "clinging soul" assumed a demonic status, inimical to the welfare of Mankind. Its pedigree stretched back to the earliest times and it could only be driven out by a rabbi. Its mission was to tempt men away from the path that God had laid out for them and into lax and sinful ways. As the tales about dybbuks began to proliferate, they assumed greater and more dangerous supernatural powers in the popular imagination, adding to popular lore and fear.

The Old Gods

And just to complicate matters even further, there was the problem of the old gods. Prior to the birth of Islam under the prophet Mohammad (570–633), what is now known as the Middle East had been a cauldron of cults and deities. Many of these had their origins within the ancient civilizations that had flourished there—the Canaanites, the Hittites, the Phoenicians, and many others. From the earliest times, these ancient gods spoke to men, either through their own priests or through visionaries. In the 7th and 8th centuries, reference is made to a group of men known as kahins, which meant seers or oracle mongers. These were men who had been possessed by the gods (or emanations of the gods), taking them into ecstatic trances that enabled them to prophesy and foretell coming events. These men would continue well into the Islamic period, providing a link with the pre-Mohammedan past.

Hubaal

There may well have still been temples dedicated to ancient gods scattered throughout the Middle East even after the Prophet Mohammed died. One of the foremost of these deities was the moon god Hubal, sometimes rendered as Hubaal. The origin of the name is unknown, but it is thought to have derived from an Aramaic word for "spirit" and that this god was worshipped in Upper Mesopotamia from very early times. Some have argued that Hubal was a former incarnation of the god Baal, mentioned in the Bible, but this is unlikely because Baal or Baal'at was a god of the Phoenicians. A splendid idol of the god was placed above the Kaaba or inner mosque in Mecca where it was worshipped by pilgrims. Indeed, if accounts are to be believed, there were some three hundred and sixty idols in the temple or mosque. Some of these were thought to have been either connected to, or manifestations of, Hubal. For example, the deitie's emanation or "daughter," al-Lit (the name simply means "goddess" and she was believed to ensure fertility both in the land and in individuals); al-Uzza and Manat (the crone-goddess who, with her golden shears, determined the fate of every individual in the world), and many others. There were also supposed to be regional gods amongst the idols that determined the lives of groups of people by their merest whim. Mohammed overthrew these idols when he entered the Kaaba, starting a movement which would unify much of the Arab world under a single god, Allah. In his call to prayer, the muezzin announced to the faithful that there is "no god but Allah" and this may very well be reflective of these pre-Mohommedan times. And yet the influence of the ancient gods lingered on, in the form of elemental forces and distinct entities lurking in the shadows. It was on their powers that the kahins sometimes relied when issuing their prophecies and their powers might also be felt in other ways—against those who followed the developing monotheistic religion. Somewhere in the back of the Middle Eastern mind they continued to wait, and watch, and in some cases, act.

The emerging picture, then, is an extremely complex and conflicting one, comprising various strands of belief. On one hand, there was the notion of demons—the spawn of Lilith and Adam (or Adam Kadmon) that had existed since the foundation of the world and which had emerged from the primal chaos; on another there was the idea of the "clinging souls," not quite ghost, not quite demon, but enjoying supernatural power and yet another strand comprised the old gods, worshipped before the advent of Islam that hadn't quite gone away. Some of these entities might manifest themselves during the hours of daylight but, as darkness fell across the Semitic world, they assumed an even greater aspect of menace and power.

They might manifest themselves in many ways. Most of them were invisible—little more than shadowy, barely definable presences that brought sickness and disease in their wake; others might be more corporeal, capable of inflicting terrible injuries if they so chose. Some of the demons, though invisible themselves, chose to manifest their presence in very visible ways. The most common form, found in many rural areas of the Middle East were the djinn.

al-Haddin

Many youngsters and pantomime goers will be familiar with the favourite old story of Aladdin with its relatively friendly genies. Although the story is traditionally set in China, (as it is in Burton's translation of the collection of Arabic fables One Thousand and One Nights), it is perhaps based on a much more ancient Arab tale, featuring a hero named al-Haddin, who actually fought genii or djinn. The djinn were disembodied demons that made their presence known by kicking up small dust storms or whirlwinds in the deserts. They were creatures of air, but were supernaturally powerful and could tear a man in pieces by sheer force. They inhabited the lonely tracts of desert and deep, gloomy valleys that often lay between human settlements. In fact, they were sometimes known as "the Lords of the Wilderness" and travellers were extremely wary of them. Those journeying from city to city, town to town, or camp to camp, often carried protective amulets and charms against the ferocious attentions of such spectral creatures.

Iblis, the Lord of Jahannam

It was thought, in some quarters and according to some legends, that these entities might be fallen angels and that, similar to Mankind, they were organized in groups or tribes and had their own fearsome ruler—Iblis, the Lord of Jahannam (the Islamic Hell). When Allah had created Man from the dust of the Earth, he instructed all angels to bow down before His supreme creation. One of the chief angels, Iblis, being exceptionally proud, refused to do so.

Being a creature of fire, he would not bow to what he considered to be an "inferior" creature made from earth and, following his example, several other angels also declined to obey Allah. For this wilful act, they were cast out of Paradise and into the desert wilderness where they remained, brooding and vengeful, seeking to harm Man, who had brought about their downfall.

Shaitan

The story parallels that of the expulsion of the angel Lucifer that is to be found in Christian mythology and legend, and it is possible that the two stories have the same source. In Christianity, Lucifer becomes Satan and is cast into Hell. In Islamic folklore too, Iblis's chief angel is known as "the Shaytan" or "Shaitan," taken to mean "one born in anger." The idea of fallen angelhood gave the djinn increased status and powers and made them implacable opponents of Mankind. They had the power to destroy those whom they encountered, or to carry them away to Jahannam, never to be seen again. A far cry from the genies of Aladdin! The dangerous djinn were wily, but as with the pantomime fable, they could be trapped—usually in stoppered vessels or bottles marked with a powerful sigil or seal. An extremely powerful magician could only accomplish this. However, if the force were to be accidentally or deliberately released, it would be twice as violent.

Iblis therefore became Lord and Master of the djinn who were now seen as creatures composed of wind, fire, and smoke and who had an inherent affinity with all three. This made them incredibly dangerous, and Iblis himself assumed a powerful role in Arab mythology.

Afreets

The idea of disembodied and violent entities dwelling in the wastes gave travellers an added fear when passing through lonely or remote places. In many instances, the way between cities, towns, and campsites lay across lonely deserts, through gloomy gullies and ravines and bare mountain slopes. And travelling was always particularly difficult. Not only did travellers contend with groups of human robbers dwelling in these wildernesses, they also had to contend with storms, drought, and wild animals. This made any journey both an adventure and an ordeal. And with the djinn, demons, and other supernatural terrors, it seemed now even more fraught. Any swirl of wind out in the empty plain might be an evil or malicious entity stalking the traveller as he journeyed. As he lay at night in some isolated spot, sounds would drift to him out of the dark—the cry of a night animal or the sighing of the wind amongst the rocks—stimulating his imagination and terrifying him out of his wits. These were the voice of the djinn or of afreets (a similar form of entity or sometimes another name for the entity) that were always lurking close by. Vast stretches of wilderness, eerie sounds at night, legends of mysterious and hostile entities, coupled with fantastic travellers' tales all combined to create a context within which supernatural terrors could exist and within which belief in their existence was taken for granted.

Animals Associated With the Dead

Animals, too played their part in such a developing folklore—particularly those animals connected with the dead. Chief amongst these were jackals and hyenas. Both animals were scavengers, rooting amongst the rubbish tips and heaps of refuse that humans had discarded. But there was another side to their foraging. From time to time, jackals and other wild dogs were seen hunting amongst graveyards and other burial places in search of the rotting human flesh of buried bodies. The light sandy soil of some areas made it impossible to bury corpses at any depth and so they lay close to the surface, attracting scavengers. Human beings viewed such hunting with great abhorrence and repugnance. The very thought of consuming dead flesh was horrific beyond imagining. Admittedly, there were stories, often carried by travellers, of solitary hermits, far out in the desert, who dug up and devoured dead bodies, but, these were depraved and crazed individuals, perhaps driven mad by years of isolation. A series of ancient, Islamic tales told of groups of men, dwelling in deep and lightless caves, far out in the inaccessible desert, who worshipped foul gods, were completely naked, smeared themselves with ashes, and who ate decaying flesh and sometimes each other. Such cannibals and madmen were to be avoided. However, the wild dogs and scavengers that haunted the graveyards and cemeteries of the Arab worlds were another matter. They might be djinn, who as well as travelling invisibly, could take on other shapes and forms. Moreover, the sniggering cry of a hyena, heard in the darkness of the night, must have struck terror into the heart of many a sleeper, suggesting all sorts of evil entities lurking in the gloom outside their house.

Anubis

There was also the connection in the popular mind between the jackal and Anpu or Anubis, the ancient Egyptian Lord of the Underworld. In mythology, this sombre god was always depicted as having the head of a jackal, supposedly representing a close connection with the dead. He was seen as a stern judge, evaluating the souls of the dead before they passed on to their ultimate reward and as such was to be feared and treated with awe. It was his link with the dead, however, that made him especially feared. Anubis presided over the Kingdom of the Dead and had command of legions of cadavers who would carry out his instructions and take vengeance on those who failed to show him proper respect. He was also venerated as the god of embalmers—those who preserved the dead and who kept bodies intact. These beliefs only added to the grimness of the god and created an extremely sinister aspect around him.

The Ghoul

The combination of eerie noises, dogs foraging amongst graves, and the idea of demons gave rise to a new type of entity in the popular mind—the ghoul. The name was simply taken to mean "the grabber" because that was how the creature was supposed to capture its victims. Ghouls were an often-corporeal demon, rumoured to be one of the children of Lilith, who lurked in graveyards, sometimes attacking those who passed through them, and feasting upon the recently interred. They dwelt underground and only appeared as soon as it was night, as they were susceptible to strong sunlight and bright lights. In a sense, ghouls were the epitome of the demon world—they were unclean and grotesque to look at. They had hideous strength, coupled with supernatural powers, and their habits and diets were awful, to say the least. They feasted on rotting human flesh; they stank and spread diseases and pestilence wherever they passed.

In the public imagination, there was a strong visual connection between ghouls and the dead themselves. Some popular descriptions of them detail them as naked, though encrusted in earth and filth, pale skinned almost to the point of ghostliness, distorted human-like features but with a frightful and malicious aspect: red eyes—redder than any ruby or fire-opal. They had long and dagger-like teeth, sometimes curved like the blade of an Arab knife suitable for rending flesh, whether living or dead. But it was their hands that commanded most attention—these were said to be abnormally large, with long fingers, curved like birds' claws and sporting long and sharp nails that again, were suitable for rending flesh. Such shovel-like hands were also useful for digging up corpses from the light soil of their graves. Other depictions of them describe them as shrouded beings, darkly robed and cowled, which added to their sense of mystery and threat. They were said to be faceless, with only a dark emptiness where their countenance should be and with a sense of palpable menace about them. Because they were related to the djinn, some accounts described them as little more than glowing, disembodied faces, narrow and malicious whilst other, rather conflicting descriptions recount them as shambling figures, covered in soil and swathed in filthy bandages—almost similar to a mummy—moving with a slow and shuffling step. All these images coalesced into a frightening belief.

Underground Dwellings

Traditionally ghouls were said to live underground, emerging out of deep pits or holes in the earth, although they could sometimes simply materialize out of thin air in front of an astonished traveller. Consequently, deep gullies and cracks in the earth were to be strenuously avoided. The idea that the ghouls were almost a form of troglodyte may well have come from old travellers' tales (possibly exaggerated) of cannibalistic hermits and solitaries, dwelling in the rocks and caves deep in the desert wastes. Some of these anchorites were undoubtedly mad and either shied away from or else attacked those who passed by their abodes, giving rise to stories of ferocious ghouls, lurking in such remote places. Ghouls, it was believed, also dwelt in the shadows of large rocks and stones, well away from the sun. They would change their shape (it was believed that some ghouls, such as djinn, were shapeshifters) into the form of beautiful women in order the lure passers by into the shade where the creature would revert to its true form before feeding. They also dwelt in deep caves and in crevices in the rocks—the only indication of their presence being their eyes, which glowed and flashed red like coals in the darkness. Indeed, anywhere there was dark or shadow might be a habitation for ghouls in the Arab mind. Their main haunts, however, were graveyards and abandoned cemeteries where there was a ready supply of corpses upon which they were said to subsist. Crossing such place (particularly after nightfall) was therefore adjudged to be a particularly hazardous occupation. As the ghouls dwelt underground and were closely associated with dead bodies, anyone walking across a grave might suddenly find a seemingly withered hand grabbing and clutching at their ankles as the creature attempted to drag them down.

Ghouls and Disease

The connection between ghouls and the spread of disease was also extremely strong. Ghouls were said to be unclean and pestilence followed them as a matter of course. Because they were of the djinn-kind, and djinn were creatures of wind and storm, they were said to use such elements in order to spread plague throughout a community. Mixed with the storm and wind were fragments of organic materials that in some instances, may indeed have spread disease and this was directly attributed to the work of the supernatural. Even the very touch of a ghoul was said, in some instances, to be deadly and could carry pestilence amongst humans. In other cases, the very passing of the creature, with disease clinging to its robes, was enough to bring plague into a community. It was also argued that the spittle or saliva of the ghoul held poisonous properties—poisons that could be absorbed through the skin, or if something that the creature had spat upon or had left a trace of saliva were to be touched or stepped upon (remembering that many travellers often went barefoot). This was sometimes offered as the reason for the spread of epidemics between communities and for the transmission of certain diseases.

Ghouls also commanded great power. They had unquestionably supernatural strength but they had other powers, too. They could materialize and dematerialise such as turning to smoke, similar to a djinn, if threatened. They also had command of the mind, luring individuals with false visions or else confusing them so that they wandered into dangerous places. Moreover, they had the power to take on the shapes of birds and animals, particularly carrion creatures (those who ate dead meat) and sometimes had power over them, turning them against men.

Algol

The Arabic term for ghoul was "al-ghul," which was used both individually and collectively to describe them. The awe and fear in which ghouls were viewed is demonstrated in the star-studded night sky. Arab scholars were amongst the first to seriously study the heavens. Indeed, they are counted to be amongst the first real astronomers—and some of their folklore would appear to have left its mark amongst the celestial bodies. A star in the Beta Persis system, in the constellation of Perseus, may have originally been logged by Arab star-gazers. They gave it the name of their most common demon—al-ghul, nicknaming it the "demon star."

Rhas al-Ghul

Another Arab name for the star was Rhas al-ghul, meaning "the demon's head," firmly establishing it in a dark and sinister context. Today, we know it as Algol and it is sometimes still rumoured to be a star of ill omen. Those born whenever Algol was in the ascendancy were destined to become robbers and murderers, or some unfortunate event would almost certainly befall them. The ascendancy of Algol was also a time when the powers of black magicians were at their height in the Arab world and when the greatest evil was wrought. In fact, Algol was so closely associated with dark sorcery that its name does not appear in many Arab astronomical texts in case they fell into the wrong hands.

Eye of Medusa

Curiously, the star was also known to the ancient Greek astronomers amongst whom it had a similar reputation. They knew it as "the eye of Medusa" (Medusa was a Gorgon—a monster whose very gaze could turn men into stone—who was killed by Perseus) or "the winking demon," because the light emitted by it appears to fluctuate from time to time. And it was also considered to be extremely evil in aspect. It was not until 1667 that it was formally "discovered" in the West by the Italian astronomer Geminano Montanari of Bologna, although its existence was well-known long before that. Even in early modern Europe, Algol was known as an "unlucky star." It is still sometimes known as such today and the evil reputation of the ghoul, seems to have percolated down across the centuries. The word itself lingered on in many European languages, including English.

Encounters with ghouls are to be found in many travellers' tales from all across the Arabic world. Those who ventured on lonely roads or near abandoned burying grounds returned with stories of shadows that moved, of voices that whispered, or of things, half-glimpsed in the twilight, that were not as they had originally seemed. Some travellers vanished in the desert wastes and their disappearances were often put down to the activities of ghouls.

One tale, from a collection of 12th century Middle Eastern stories, illustrates this:

> A certain merchant was travelling alone through a lonely, rocky place between two cities. As night began to descend, he made camp but he was ill advised to do so as he made it close to an ancient cemetery that had been long abandoned and that it was said had served a blasphemous city, now buried under the desert sand. This place was said to be the haunt of djinns and ghosts. Such tales, however, did not frighten the merchant, as he was a practical man and did not give much credence to such legends. Indeed, he was more terrified of the bandits and robbers that were said to prowl the area and who might well attack him. He lit a great fire in order to keep away thieves and wild animals and proceeded to settle himself down for the night. As he lay close to the blaze, the night seemed to be filled with noise—the cries of distant night creatures, and the movement of strange winds; the merchant began to feel a little bit afraid. He gathered his blankets around him and tried to sleep but sleep would not come. Gradually, he became aware of a voice seeming to call to him from somewhere nearby—a voice that called him by name! It seemed to come from the abandoned cemetery well beyond the glow of the fire. Rising, the merchant walked a little way to the very edge of the firelight and looked out into the night. By now it was completely dusk and he could see very little. The voice, however, continued to call—softly, beguilingly. Fearful that this might be some trick of the robbers that dwelt in this wilderness, the merchant advanced no further.

"Who is there?" he called back. "Who calls me? Advance and show yourself for the night is dark and I cannot see you!" The wind stirred the sand about his feet but seemed to come no closer to his fire. Somewhere close by, a jackal howled.

"Alas," replied the voice mournfully. "I cannot come any closer to you but I am a friend and in need of help. I will do you no harm." The merchant was not convinced but the voice now had a strange, pleading quality about it that stirred his heart in pity. Though he was a merchant, he was not a cruel man and had no wish to see a fellow human in any distress.

"If you could come but a little closer," he urged. "I am afraid that you might be a robber who is seeking to lure me into the darkness." The voice sighed.

"I am no robber," it replied. "Only an old man in great pain and distress. I have not the strength to overpower you or do you harm. I only wish your help." Its pleading seemed so convincing that the merchant advanced a little more beyond the firelight. In the gloom, he could just about see the ruined wall that surrounded the abandoned graveyard and he thought that he also saw the shape of a man standing beside a gap where it had completely fallen away. He thought that it seemed withered and slightly stooped as if it indeed were the form of a piteous old man. It certainly did not appear to be a robber. All the same, fearing a trap, the merchant returned to his fire and lifted a burning brand before walking down towards the ruined wall.

"Put the light lower, I beg you," quavered the voice as he drew closer. "I have an affliction of the eyes and strong lights are not good for me. That is why I stay in the shadows, but don't let that deter you. Come forward my friend." The merchant lowered his burning torch but all the same, he kept it in front of him. He approached the place where he had seen the figure and, was it his imagination, or did he sense a shuffling movement as the other drew back slightly?

"How can I help you?" he asked. Away across the desert, the jackal howled again and the merchant was suddenly wary. The air near the ancient burial place seemed inexplicably chilly and he thought he detected a smell, rank and foul, similar to freshly turned grave earth. Nevertheless, he advanced, keeping the torched lowered in his right hand. "What is it that ails you?"

"I am injured," answered the other. "Come closer so that I can show you." The merchant took a few steps forward. He felt uneasy and suspected that this might indeed be a trap and that he would be set upon by desert bandits. And yet, as he drew nearer, the shadowy figure seemed impossibly thin and frail—not like a bandit at all.

"How have you injured yourself in such a lonely place?" he queried. The shape in front of him did not answer but shuffled forward a little.

"I beg you, keep your light lowered," it said. "My eyes…" As it drew a little closer, the merchant suddenly raised his torch, the feeling of unease almost overwhelming him. He gave a cry of utter horror as the light revealed the edge of the ancient cemetery.

The creature that stood in front of him was indeed shaped similar to a living man but there the similarity ended. The torchlight revealed it to be tall and thin to the point of emaciation, and dressed in rags that looked like the remnants of grave clothes. Its face was swathed in filthy bandages like a mummy, but through a gap, a single red-tinged eye peered out malevolent. The being was hung with clods of rancid earth from the graveyard beyond and as it moved slowly forward, it raised great hands that were more like shovels with extremely long and ragged fingernails, from which more earth fell. This, the merchant realized was no human being at all, but a ghoul that dwelt in the cemetery and that had tried to trick him so that it could feast upon his flesh. He thrust the torch out in front of him like a sword and the figure recoiled. Ghouls, he knew, were afraid of the light and even more so of fire. As he did so, part of the bandage that covered its lower face fell away and he saw great teeth and fangs, still hung with pieces of the rotting flesh of recently consumed corpses. With an invocation to Allah for His protection, the merchant scrambled backwards towards his fire whilst the ghoul continued to shuffle forwards.

Amongst his possessions was an amulet that had been given to him many years before by an Islamic holy man. It was said to be inscribed with a protective charm that would ward away djinn and other hostile supernatural beings. Although he had never really believed in it, the merchant still carried it with him and he was glad now that he had it. Setting aside the torch, he hunted frantically for it and, as he did so, he heard the ghoul drawing closer. It was moving very slowly as its kind could not, according to popular legend, travel very quickly, but moved with a halting step. At last the merchant found the amulet in a bundle of clothes. He held it up, protectively, in front of his face with his right hand—his left hand groping for the still-burning torch. The horrible figure was almost upon him. As it towered over him, it suddenly stopped and fell back with a shriek that resembled the howl of a jackal. Once again, the merchant evoked the name of Allah for his own protection and when he looked again, he was alone beside the fire and entangled in his own blankets. As he rose to his feet, he first though that the whole incident had been no more than a bad dream but as he looked down, he saw that in his right hand, he held the amulet and a little way from the main fire, lay the burning torch that he'd carried, now turning to smoke. The episode had been real and the ghoul was now gone. He offered a prayer of thanks to Allah for his deliverance.

The next morning, he ventured down to the ancient cemetery, which, he imagined, had once served a part of the now vanished city. Walking amongst the funeral markers, he noticed that more than a few of the graves had been disturbed and in one corner, close to a large, shadowy stone, there was a deep hole, that emitted a foul and acrid smell. He did not bother to investigate this for fear of what he might find in its dark depths. Leaving the cemetery behind he packed his things and continued his journey to the city, but from then on he was much less sceptical regarding the existence of the supernatural.

Material Objects

Tales such as the previous example were quite common in parts of the early Middle East. Many travellers often carried amulets and charms about their person in order to protect them from the attentions of such horrid entities as ghouls. Some of these protections might have been what are now called material objects: a fox's tail, for example, was a particularly potent protection against djinn, or a series of interwoven crimson threads might protect the carrier from the gaze of a demon or ghoul. Necklaces made of coral or certain semi-precious stones were also used as charms to ward away evil. In some cases, a wax or metal tablet bearing a sacred word or holy name might be used, although these were much more common amongst Jews than early Arabs. For example, a metal plate inscribed with the letter heh (a sign for the mystical Tetragammaton) would drive away demons of every kind, including djinn and ghouls. A cake of unleavened Passover bread hanging in a house would keep away foul spirits and ghouls from the door. The same charm, carried in a pouch, would also protect the traveller on his journey. Those charms were especially favoured by the Hebrews and had their roots in the Talmudic faith. And these wayfarers needed all the protections they could carry, for who knew what form the ghoul would assume if they were encountered as this story, from a very early period demonstrates:

The son of a prince was travelling through a wide and rocky valley at one time. No one lived in this place, save only a few ancient hermits who shunned all contact with the world. It was a barren and lonely place, especially when the sun began to go down. Yet, it was in the cool of the evening that the prince's son chose to cross it—riding alone, for he feared little upon the road.

On his way across the valley, he encountered nothing, for the caves of the anchorites were distant and they would not come close, even out of curiosity. Not even an animal lived or moved in this dreary waste. The very air stank of death and emptiness. The evening grew colder as it does in the desert, but the prince's son did not halt but kept on travelling. Then, in the shadow of a great rock, he saw a woman. She was young and beautiful and she was dressed like a princess. She sat, part in shadow, on a great flat rock near to the centre of the dead valley. The prince's son slowed his horse, for her had never seen such a beautiful creation and wondered what she might be doing in this arid waste. He drew up his mount close to where the woman sat.

"Who are you?" he asked her. "And what are you doing in this miserable place? Your clothes show that you are highborn but I see no one with you—no servants nor protectors. So I ask again, why are you here?" The woman lowered her eyes as she answered him.

"I am a king's daughter who has been expelled from her royal palace by her hateful stepmother. She had strong men carry me away to this terrible and lonely place where she hoped that I might be eaten by the wild beasts or poisoned by the crawling snakes. She hated my beauty and the love that my father—her husband—bore me. She wanted me cast out from his court so that she could pollute his mind with her evil. She is a witch! She wishes me dead!" The prince's son reined in his horse.

"This shall not happen!" he declared, for he was already smitten with her. "Not whilst I live shall it be so!" The girl only laughed and the prince's son thought that he detected a hint of madness in her tone.

"Brave words," she replied almost mockingly. "But I have been cast out here too long. The world will have forgotten me. My father will already have mourned my passing and I will be but a memory to him now!" The prince's son was not to be turned however.

"I will take you to my father's kingdom," he declared. "There you will be safe from whatever evil that has threatened you." The woman smiled wanly.

"Then lift me up onto your steed," she said, "and I will surely come away with you, beyond the reach of my stepmother." The prince's son leapt down from his horse to the ground in order to help her. As he did so, however, the ground around the rock where the lady stood seemed to heave and move as though it were being badly disturbed. The earth began to split and crack and hands began to emerge, clutching at his legs and feet. A horrible stench filled the air, an awful stench that made it almost impossible to breathe. A filthy claw with long and ragged nails grabbed at his ankle and held him fast and, as he looked, the beautiful woman in front of him slowly began to change into a creature you would only see in nightmares. To his horror, he realized that the area around the rock was the abode of ghouls! He had been tricked by creatures that now sought to devour his flesh. He had almost hoisted one of the evil tribe onto the saddle of his horse! Kicking the clutching hands away, he rushed back to his horse, which was itself already whinnying and drawing back in fright. Although he was not superstitious, he had a framework of red threads tucked away in his saddlebag as a precaution against evil. And it was as well that he did! The ghouls were close behind him, rising from the broken earth similar to emerging corpses. He opened the saddlebag and drew out the magic thread. Spreading it between his fingers, he held it up in the fading light. Calling out a certain charm that was known mainly to the Hebrews, he drew his fingers amongst the thread. The ghouls paused in their mad rush. Even as he watched them, they seemed to disintegrate, their essences being drawn into the patter of thread between his fingers. One followed the other until they were all gone, absorbed into the lattice before his eyes that he then crumpled up and thrust back into his saddlebag. On his way through the valley, he came to a deep ravine and into this he threw the crumpled ball of thread, watching it fall away into the darkness. Then he continued on his journey and was troubled no more, but he had a narrow escape. His father, the prince, gave strict orders that the ravine in question be sealed forever in the name of Allah and ordered that travellers should avoid the valley. So it is, to this day. The prince's son, however, became ill due to his close contact with the terrible creatures and died of a fever soon after. Let this be a warning to all travellers.

Stories such as this demonstrate how widely held the belief in ghouls was throughout the ancient Middle East and how widely they were feared. They also demonstrated to travellers that the monsters could be defeated. Even so, this did not seem to lessen the popular terror of them and they still assumed a central place amongst the terrors of the night throughout the Middle East.

Gehenna

Although ghouls were supposed to infest remote places such as isolated valleys and deserts, this was not always the case. Sometimes they lurked close to cities as well. The Valley of Hinnom (also known as Gehenna), for instance, just beyond Jerusalem, was allegedly their abode. This was a place where all the rubbish of Jerusalem was dumped and which burned. Indeed, Gehenna became an early Christian name for the Fiery Pit or Hell into which Satan had been cast. It was associated with filth and disease in the Semitic mind and was thus an excellent dwelling place for ghouls and afreets. Few people dared to venture too deeply into it.

Resurrections

The idea of the ghoul also remained alive in the European mind. The word itself was to resurface in the English language during the Victorian period, and in a specific sense; it referred to a new breed of criminals who were connected to the developments and advances in surgery and medicine. These were the Resurrections or "Sack 'em ups"—men (and sometimes women) who gave dead bodies to medical institutions that were then used for both surgical and medical experimentation and demonstration purposes. The crime involved grave robbing and the clandestine digging up of freshly interred cadavers that were then passed on to the medical halls. It was a dark traffic and those who practiced it were sometimes referred to as "ghouls." Their behaviour was said to be "ghoulish"—a word that has remained in the English language and is still in use today. The most famous of all these

"Resurrectionists" were the Edinburgh body snatchers, William Burke and William Hare who are frequently referred to as the "Irish ghouls" (both of them were of Irish birth), and indeed the year 1828, when both men were at the height of their murderous intent, is often referred to as "the year of the ghouls" because of this.

Ghouls in Film

Although never as successful in a cinematic sense as vampires, werewolves, or even zombies, the ghoul did spawn at least one film of note. Filmed in England in 1933 at the height of Universal Pictures' monster mania, The Ghoul was directed by T. Hayes Hunter and was released through Gaumont-British Pictures.

The Ghoul

The Ghoul featured Boris Karloff, fresh from his success in The Mummy and Cedric Hardwicke, both British actors. A rather uneven film, it nevertheless holds the distinction of being the first film to be awarded a "Certificate H" (for horror) by the British Board of Film Censors and some of its showings in the United Kingdom were severely limited. It later became a minor "cult film" in the United States with several re-releases—the latest onto DVD in 2003.

Night of the Ghouls

Another film that "established" the ghoul in the public consciousness, though for very different reasons, was "Night of the Ghouls" directed by Edward Wood Jr., more famous for his "Plan 9 from Outer Space"—possibly one of the worst movies ever made. "Night of the Ghouls" runs it a close second. Originally shot in 1960, it was not actually released until 1983, largely because Wood could not afford to have the negative processed. Because of its sheer awfulness as a film, it became something of a "cult classic" and once more brought the terrifying figure of the ghoul to the forefront of human imagination. In the wake of the film's release, a number of books (many of them badly written) began to appear, bearing the word "ghoul" in their titles.

Golem

From the earliest times, the ultimate goal that was pursued by magicians was the creation of life itself. However, it was suggested in Talmudic commentaries that the best that sorcerers could hope for was to create the more unthinking life forms: camels, oxen, and so on—whilst the much more refined and complex forms, such as men themselves, were far beyond the ability of humans. This sort of creation was reserved for God alone. Other religious thinkers believed that whilst men or man-like beings might be created through a knowledge of sacred words and signs used by God in the Creation of the Universe, they would lack the intelligence and subtlety of thought that only the Divine could give them. Early rabbis, therefore, preoccupied themselves by trying to create entities such as a three-year old calf or an ox using a process that was known as "Name magic"—special names that Jehovah had uttered in order to create the world—that were to be found in various obscure editions of books such as the Talmudic Laws of Creation. This was not to be considered as forbidden magic for "the laws of God were brought about through His Holy Name." Letters and sounds were juxtaposed in an attempt to emulate God, often without much success.

Homunculus

The process of creation both fascinated and obsessed the thirteenth century Hasidim, a group of Pietists and Mystics. It is thought that they were among the first to use the word golem, which they used to denote formless matter that had no life in it. It was simply stuff out of which life might be formed and which God had used in order to create Man. Through the invocation of certain special Names, these men sought to create a homunculus—a small, primordial representation of a human being that would enjoy some form of animation. Some of them claimed that they had discovered texts, which were the secret words of God, given to Moses on Mount Sinai along with the Torah and the Talmud. These were the invocations that God had used to create Adam Kadmon, the prototype human who ultimately became the partner of Lilith and had to be destroyed. It is possible that the earliest legends concerning the Golem come from this group of thinkers.

Rabbi Samuel

The earliest known of these thinkers is said to have been Rabbi Samuel, father of Judah the Pious (d. 1217, author of the Book of Angels, a collection of theological and esoteric works) who is said to have constructed a homunculus that accompanied him on his travels and which could apparently think and move of its own volition but could not speak. Some of those who saw it described it as a small, grey-skinned manikin that the esteemed Rabbi kept in a jar or container.

It was amongst the German Jews, however, that interest in the creation of homunculi flourished. Here, many Rabbis heavily influenced by the thinking and writing of the Hasidim, contemplated the creation of life from shapeless matter. Others warned against the sin of attempting to emulate God, but the urge to create even the basest form of life continued to thrive and grow.

Joseph Delmedigo

The writer Joseph Delmedigo stated in 1625 that there "are many of these legends (concerning the creation of life) current, particularly in Germany." During medieval times, the area, which now constitutes large parts of Germany and Austria, seemed to be awash with mystical texts—many of which were said to date back to the early Middle East.

Kaballah

The vast majority of these were said to be portions of the Kabbalah, or Q'balah—a sect of mystical texts that had been supernaturally revealed to Moses, either when in Egypt or when he was on Mount Sinai.

Sefer Yetzirah

Of course, there were many versions of this magical text, one of which was known as the Sefer Yetzirah or The Book of Creation (sometimes translated as The Book of Formation) that contained the various names which God had used to create both Adam Kadmon and Adam. This work, which is said to have been revealed by God, emerged around the 16th century and is usually credited to Isaac Luria—generally regarded to be the father of the modern Kaballah.

Through this text a rabbinical magician could form a living, man-like being out of shapeless clay. However, the creature thus created would have no real will of its own—no Divine spark or soul because these were the specific gifts of God. These entities were known as golem.

Rabbi Elijah of Chelm

There are a number of tales concerning rabbis who created such beings. The most famous legend concerns Rabbi Elijah of Chelm, a 16th century mystic. He is reputed to have created a being out of clay using the Sefer Yetzirah and breathing life into it by inscribing the Name of God on its forehead. Although it lived and moved and performed small tasks, the creature had no will of its own, behaved similar to an automaton, and could not speak. However, it grew to almost gigantic proportions and became increasingly destructive so that the Rabbi, appalled by the potential of what he had created, removed the name from its brow, whereupon it crumbled to dust once more. This is probably one of the earliest stories concerning the golem but there were others.

Rabbi Eleazar ben Judah of Worms

One of these stories concerns the German magician, Rabbi Eleazar ben Judah of Worms (1165–c.1230). Rabbi Eleazar was considered to be one of the last of the mystical Hasidim and is generally credited as being the author of the Sosei Razavya—"The Secret of Secrets"—a tome that was based on the Sefer Yetzirah. A German himself, born in Mainz, Rabbi Eleazar had distilled much of the swirling mystical lore emerging in 12th century Europe. He dared to record, for the first time, a formula for creating a golem, which took up twenty-three folio volumes, emphasizing the formidable nature of the project. The image of a man was to be made from "virgin soil" which was to be taken from a remote, mountainous place where no man had ever dug earth before; over this image was to be intoned "incantations of the 221 gates." This specific incantation had to be recited over each individual organ in turn.

Emeth

Various combinations of names and letters were to be used in the formation of the figure and on the forehead of the image was to be placed either a secret Name of God or the word emeth (meaning "truth"). The destruction of the golem might be accomplished by removing the initial character of that word, leaving meth (meaning "dead or devoid of life"). In other instances, the utterance of other incantations might be used to destroy the creature that some rabbis described as "a reversal of laws of creation."

Judah Loew ben Bezalel

The most famous of all the rabbinical magicians associated with the golem however, was Judah Loew ben Bezalel (1525–1609) also known as the Maharal of Prague. The so-called "Frankenstein of Prague" was credited with creating a golem, which, it is said, may still be in existence today.

In an increasingly Christian Europe, Jews were struggling to hold onto their identity and culture. Increasingly, in the Christian mind, they were becoming closely associated with sorcery and witchcraft—probably because many Jews were rich and prospering more readily than their Christian counterparts. This, of course, led to allegations of evil magic against them and the tales of various rabbis seeking to create life (which, in Christian eyes, only God Himself could do) only added fuel to the prejudicial fire. Jews were now regarded as black magicians, poisoning wells and water supplies and summoning up demons for the purposes of destroying the Christian religion. These views were taught as fact by a number of early modern Christian clerics. There were attacks by Christian elements on Jewish homes and businesses throughout Prague and beyond. Local politicians, seeking popular approval, spoke out against the Jews and, subsequently, the community in Prague increasingly felt itself under pressure. The Maharal, Rabbi Judah Loew, was becoming extremely concerned about the situation, especially the inflammatory speeches given by Christian leaders, which only stirred up violence.

The Golem of Prague

In 1580, he is reputed to have asked God for some way in which he could protect the Jewish community (and especially the Jews of Prague) against the "blood libel" that was being perpetrated against them. God allegedly gave him the formula by which he could create a powerful golem that would serve as a Jewish protector. It is said that Rabbi Judah used the formula to give birth to a strong and violent creature, which he kept well away from human eyes in an attic of the Altneuschule, the principal synagogue in Prague. Said to be immortal, the golem was allegedly transferred to Warsaw in Poland, during World War II and the Nazi occupation coupled with the persecution of the Jews in that city. There, it is supposed to have attacked and killed several Nazi soldiers before being hidden away again. It was reputedly returned to Prague where it may still be located. The idea of a huge figure lumbering through the fog-bound streets of a European city is enough to fill anyone with dread.

It is perhaps worth noting the Rabbi Loew's grave in the Old Jewish Cemetery in Prague's Jewish Town is one of the most frequently visited tourist sites in the city. Many of those who visit it are well acquainted with the legend of the golem and many also visit the Altneuschule, convinced that the creature is still there. Perhaps it is, although the Jewish authorities in Prague do a good job of convincing the curious that perhaps it didn't exist after all. And yet, there are still many who search for it, convinced that it still exists, hidden somewhere in Europe.

Descriptions of the golem vary. Some accounts state that it was simply the size of an ordinary man but with a blank, lifeless face and unable to speak. Its arms seem to have been longer and more muscular than that of an average human. Other descriptions state that it was much bigger than any regular human, gray skinned, and with a narrow, bland face with dark and slitted eyes. It positively oozed a sense of menace as it lurched along with a lumbering walk, which in no way resembled that of a human. This was a monster in many senses of the world—a soulless entity that knew neither right nor wrong and which could be commanded for good or evil.

There was much discussion amongst the rabbinical schools as to what actually motivated the Golem, whether it was a dybbuk or evil spirit, or whether it was the Breath of God Himself. Few could agree. Some rabbis claimed that it was a sin for a man to take on the role of Creator and that any such creation must be evil. Some even connected the creature to Iblis, Lord of the Damned, and denounced it as a minor demon. It was generally agreed, however, that the creature could only be dismissed or destroyed by a rabbi, using a special formula that could only be passed down within the Jewish clerical tradition. This was to be done in the form of an exorcism, which, certain rabbis argued, did not necessarily mean that the creature was evil. Others insisted that it did. At the same time, there were further arguments concerning the intent of the golem. Because the creature had no will of its own, it had to be directed by its creator and whilst most of these seem to have been holy rabbis or clerics who were interested in mysticism and alchemy, there were also suggestions of "false rabbis"—evil sorcerers with a knowledge of the sacred rabbinical texts, who might manipulate the golem for their own ends. For example, the golem would often be used to settle feuds or intimidate wealthy Jews. Some theologians insisted that merely by creating the golem, a rabbi had exposed himself to sin and might become evil in his ways; some argued that no sin had occurred because the act of creation was carried out with the express approval of God, otherwise they would not have been successful. These debates raged mainly between the European schools of Jewish thought and, although the golem was known in Middle Eastern demonology/mythology, it maintained a relatively peripheral role amongst the night terrors there.

Golem Lore

Ironically, it was a German language collection of Jewish lore that brought the story of the Golem and of Rabbi Loew to the fore in 1847. It was picked up by Czech literature almost immediately and was used as a source by the writer Alois Jerasek in his "Old Bohemian Legends." The Czech writer and poet, Jaroslav Vrchlickys, also composed a poem about the creature "Golem" in which Rabbi Loew is punished for his presumption against God in actually creating a living being. The main literary work concerning the Golem was written at the end of 1914 and was published in 1915. This was Gustav Mayrink's novel The Golem, which has become something of a minor classic of European Jewish literature. In 1982, the foremost Jewish writer and laureate, Isaac Bashevis Singer, wrote his own English version of the golem legend—also entitled The Golem, which is still available

Some students of literature have argued that the motif of the golem, the living creature formed out of unloving clay, provided the basis for Mary Shelley's classic novel Frankenstein, in which a living creature is made out of the unliving parts of dead men. Whether Mary Shelley actually knew of the golem legend is unknown though it is quite possible, given her own outlook and the tastes of her husband and companions that she may well have.

Golem Films

Like the ghoul, the Golem remained on the periphery of horror cinematic representation. It was, it was argued, too obscure to occupy the status of the werewolf or vampire in the minds of the movie going public. This is not to say that no films were made about it. Indeed, a rather classic film, Der Golem, was made in Germany in 1914, directed by Peter Wegener, with an updated version (again directed by Wegener) released in 1920. These black and white films were mainly adaptations of Mayrink's novel and are counted as some of the foremost movies of the German Expressionist cinema. Another film concerning the creature, Golem, was made in 1936 under the direction of Julian Duvevier. But as a monster, the golem was not considered to be sufficiently terrifying—or else far too obscure—to take on the might of the Universal monsters. From time to time, the golem has peripherally featured in other films and tv series—most notably in an episode of the popular supernatural/sci-fi series The X Files. Even so, the creature has not gone away, but lurks somewhere in the back of the human psyche, ready to emerge again as soon as night falls or the cloying fog rolls in. The shambling, shadowy figure still holds the power to frighten us all. Part of that fear must surely lie in the secrecy and mystery that still surrounds it, even today.

Golems in Comic Books

The figure of and the mystery surrounding the golem enjoyed something of a brief resurgence during the early 1960s, as the comic books of the day began to pick up on it. In the developing world of comics literature, golem-like figures began to appear albeit bearing fanciful names such as It: The Unliving, Attack of the Clay Man, The Thing that Stalks in the Mist, and Nightmare Stalker from Hell to name but a few. Representations of the creature were also fanciful and owed more to artistic interpretation than to any folkloric tradition. Many were portrayed as something between a Caribbean zombie and a bandage swathed Egyptian mummy. There was even a short-lived attempt to establish the golem motif as a type of superhero. The obscure and equally short-lived Mystic Comics (1963/64) created a character named Colosso the Clay Man, which was loosely based on Golem lore. In this, a young man could transfer his consciousness into and therefore animate a gigantic clay figure that had been stored in a secret place, for the purposes of fighting crime. This series does not appear to have been a success and quickly vanished into obscurity along with the comics company that produced it. Another thankfully brief series concerned a man who transformed into an unthinking and violent golem-like creature in a parody of the Incredible Hulk after touching a meteorite that had fallen from outer space. It, too, disappeared without trace. Nevertheless, the golem (and also the ghoul) continued to resurface as peripheral characters in some of the later comics publications from such major companies as Marvel and DC.

Both the ghoul and the golem may well stem from the oldest traditions that we know of—from amongst the extremely ancient legends and folklore of the Middle East. Both have undergone a number of perceptual changes across the years. The golem, for instance, did not enjoy any widespread notoriety as a monster until the 16th, century although tales about it had certainly been in existence long before that. But the basic core of their terror is very much the same as it was in early times. Tales about them are often fragmentary, but they blend together into a rich tapestry of terror, that has still the power to startle and alarm both Middle Eastern and European minds.

Hints of ancient books and texts that have the power to summon and control demons and monsters have filtered down over the years and, as we will see elsewhere in this book, have influenced some of the darker aspects of our more modern literature.

Although we tend to largely ignore them or else treat them as lesser terrors than vampires and zombies, the ghouls and golems—those terrors of the night—still remain with us, lurking in the furthest corners of our mind and ready to emerge at the slightest provocation. We would do well not to dismiss them too lightly for they are reputedly far older than Mankind itself and represent extremely ancient powers that have lingered with us since the foundation of the world!

The Terrors of H.P. Lovecraft

That is not dead which can eternal lie,
And with strange aeons even death may die.

—H.P. Lovecraft
The Necronomicon

Arguably, no single modern writer has had more influence upon today's horror fiction than H.P. Lovecraft (1890–1937). Many writers in the genre from all across the world, from Britain's Ramsey Campbell to America's Robert Bloch and Stephen King, openly acknowledge their debt to him. His work has been reprinted over and over in novels, various anthologies, collections, and in magazines ranging from formal commercial publications to small, narrowly distributed fanzines. Commentaries on his work abound, each assessing various aspects of his life, outlook, and contribution to an overall horror fiction. For a man whose largely reclusive lifestyle often mirrored that of some of his characters, this is no mean achievement. His fiction, upon which many subsequent writers have based their own work, is a rich tapestry of ancient, slumbering evils and menacing monsters, seemingly drawn in detail from the traditions of the past. His fiction is crammed with "eldritch rites" that stretch back into "time immemorial," "inhuman entities," "blasphemous texts," and "shunned places," described so meticulously that commentators have often wondered if there were not some factual basis to them. Was Lovecraft privy to some corpus of arcane and horrendous knowledge to which the rest of us remain mercifully oblivious? This suspicion is borne out by hints and inferences in the work of some other writers—for example, the Welshman Arthur Machen (1863–1947)—but Lovecraft is perhaps the best known. Does his work contain germs of truth masquerading as fiction? Before considering this, it is appropriate to give a brief biography of H.P. Lovecraft himself.

Lovecraft's Early Life

Howard Phillips Lovecraft was born on 20th August 1890 at 454 (then numbered 194) Angell Street in Providence, Rhode Island. He was the only child of Winfield Scott Lovecraft, a travelling salesman, and Sarah Susan Phillips Lovecraft—a descendant of an old Rhode Island family. He was to remain in Rhode Island for all of his life with the exception of two years spent in New York. He was a sickly child, subject to colds, flus, and infantile ailments that perhaps made his mother overly protective of him. Long periods at home and in bed suffering from illnesses, either real or imaginary, made him brooding, introspective, and dependent upon his mother.

When he was eight, Howard's father, Winfield Lovecraft, died. In reality, he had been incarcerated in a sanatorium for the previous five years suffering from paresis (insanity and paralysis brought on by syphilis). This left Howard in the care of his high-strung mother and two aunts. The Phillips side of the family had been well-established in Rhode Island and had intermarried amongst each other—cousins marrying first cousins—and, it was suggested, weakening the line. A constant theme in Lovecraft's work was the notion of inbreeding amongst "degenerate families" and this may be a fearful reflection of the circumstances amongst his own kin. A number of his stories begin with the narrator suggesting that he might be mad. The thought of hereditary insanity must have haunted Lovecraft like some gibbering spectre. Allied to this, some of the "curious inbred families" that are scattered through his work and that usually gave birth to monsters, have names prevalent in his own family, which may be suggestive of his fear.

Decline of the Family

When his grandmother died, (two years before the death of his father), the family went into a kind of decline that culminated in his mother's illness. Young Howard certainly experienced the most appalling nightmares. The later death of his grandfather, Whipple Van Buren Phillips, produced even greater problems—this time financial ones. Much of the Phillips family fortune had been leeched away in unprofitable business deals and by unscrupulous business associates and, by the time of the death, the estate was near bankruptcy. The Lovecrafts were practically destitute and had to give up their home in order to share a house with another family. For a proud clan, descended from an old Rhode Island family, this was hard for Sarah Lovecraft to swallow. She lavished all her attention and invested all her hopes and ambitions on Howard, a situation with which the boy may not have been fully able to cope. The suffocation of his mother's affection may have placed an unbearable burden upon him and may have damaged his relations with women, and indeed many people, for the rest of his life.

Leaving his birthplace had also affected Howard greatly, and the reduced circumstances in which he now found himself afflicted his mind. He would take long bicycle rides to the Barrington River where he would simply stand and look into the swirling waters. It is thought at these times, he was seriously contemplating suicide. But somehow, his resolve overcame such urges and he always returned home.

A shy, bookish boy, he spent much of his early years reading texts in his grandfather's library—particularly classics of ancient Rome (Ovid, Plato, and Horace) and volumes on ancient and vanished civilizations. He learned some Latin and was able to translate at least some of Ovid's work. This led his mother to believe that he was destined for Brown University, one of Rhode Island's premier educational establishments. She told everyone that her son would one day be a respected University academic. This, however, was not to be the case and probably for the rest of his life, Lovecraft may have felt a sense of humiliation and held the view that he had somehow let his mother down. His fiction throngs with references to "Miskatonic University" and some of the people who taught there—perhaps betraying a deep longing for the formally recognized academic life. His own attendance, first at Slater Avenue School and then at Hope Street High School had always been erratic, and Lovecraft frequently quoted "ill health" as the cause. There seems little doubt that he did have ill health, including a serious nervous breakdown in 1908, but it is possible that he stayed with his mother, who was already experiencing some mental health difficulties. It is also possible that as a solitary, morbid boy, he was loath to face the tumultuous world of college life.

In 1921, Sarah Lovecraft, his mother, died in the Province sanatorium where she had been a patient. The cause of her death was actually due to a badly managed gall bladder operation, but she had been mentally ill for quite some time before. Her death had a profound effect on Howard—she had been his closest companion whilst he was growing up—and it's thought, not for the first time—that he contemplated suicide. Losing both parents in this way induced in Howard a constant fear of hereditary insanity to which he believed he was prone.

First Publishings

Instead of academia, he turned his attention to poetry and writing fiction. At the age of seven, he had already produced a poem, based on the readings in his grandfather's library, entitled "The Poem of Ulysses," but his first actual published work was a letter to the Providence Sunday Journal in 1906 on astronomy (a subject that was starting to interest him). However, he appeared to be making no headway as a writer in these early days. He was also becoming more reclusive, staying close to his over-protective mother, and preferring to contact friends by extremely long letters. He also wrote juvenile treatises, mainly for amateur magazines and usually concerning astronomy and science. Most of these were simply crude speculations but they were to lay the foundations for at least part of his future writing.

The Alchemist and Argosy

In 1908, he wrote the short story The Alchemist but, in truth, he was not writing much fiction, and for five years was to remain in a kind of productivity drought. In 1913, however, he wrote a series of letters to the magazine Argosy, attacking the "insipid love stories" of the then-popular writer Fred Jackson. They were written in such a clever way—a parody of Alexander Pope's Dunciad, that they evoked much literary interest and the United Amateur Press Association invited Lovecraft to join their ranks.

Short Stories

The letters marked a turning point in his career. He began to correspond with like-minded writers and to produce drafts of stories almost ceaselessly, some of which were to eventually surface amongst his recognized works. In 1917, he wrote both Dagon and The Tomb; in 1919 he was producing Beyond the Wall of Sleep, The Doom that came to Sarnath, The Statement of Randolph Carter, and The White Ship. In that same year, he discovered Lord Dunsay, whom he described as his "greatest literary stimulus…since Poe." (He had presumably read Edgar Allan Poe in his grandfather's library.) Through 1919 and 1920 he maintained this same creative streak, writing both poems and short stories.

Sonia Green

Sarah Lovecraft's death freed Howard a little and he was able to travel a bit more, particularly to amateur literary gatherings. For instance, on July 4 1921, he was able to travel to the first Amateur Journalist Convention in Boston and there he was to meet a woman who was to temporarily change his life: Sonia Haft Green.

Sonia Green was a progressive and self-assured woman. She was a New Yorker and a businesswoman, owning a milliner's shop on 5th Avenue. She was also seven years older than Lovecraft and of Russian-Jewish descent. Howard Lovecraft was impressed with her devotion to letters and, superficially at least, they seemed to have a similar outlook on the world. However, this was no whirlwind romance; it took three years before the two decided to marry.

In all that time, Lovecraft never informed his two aunts—his mother's sisters—of the relationship with Sonia, only writing to them after the marriage, which took place at St. Paul's Cathedral in New York. Perhaps he feared that his wife's ancestry would scandalize the elderly and genteel New England ladies. He resolved to leave Providence for the first time in his life and set up a home with Sonia in New York. A happy future seemed to lie ahead of them.

Nevertheless, the marriage seemed doomed from the start. Sonia herself was unwell and several times had to leave the marital home in order to seek recuperation in various rest homes. Her business collapsed shortly after they were married and she had to give up the milliner's shop, which was their main source of income. Moreover, Lovecraft himself found it extremely difficult to get a job in New York. Besides, he had a growing horror of the city—there seemed to be groups of "aliens" (foreigners) on every street corner; the pace of life was much faster than he had been used to back in Providence; the people there seemed too greedy, grasping, and commercially-minded for his liking. At the same time, he was still writing and was developing his stories into a kind of mythical framework, which would later become known as his Mythos. The couple were now struggling financially and the relationship appeared to falter. Lovecraft continued to write but the money that came in for his published pieces was not sufficient to meet their bills.

Return to Providence

On 1st January 1925, Lovecraft moved into a "bachelor apartment" (no more than a couple of rooms) in a squalid area of Brooklyn whilst Sonia travelled to the Mid-West in order to find work. She would only return intermittently and the marriage might well have been counted as being over at this stage. However, during this time Lovecraft was most prolific, turning out a good chunk of his most interesting work. He was, nevertheless, finding New York increasingly oppressive and was becoming more and more withdrawn—seldom venturing out for days at a time. He was also negotiating, with his aunts, the possibility of a return to Providence. The arrangements were complicated and involved Sonia, Lovecraft's aunts, and several friends, such as the writer Frank Belknap Long. In April 1926, Howard Lovecraft eventually returned to Providence. He would not leave again.

Where did Sonia figure in these arrangements? It seems that she may have had only a peripheral involvement in the central decision. She is thought to have implored Howard to return to New York but he steadfastly refused. The solution would seem to have been for her to come to Providence and open a milliner's shop there, but Lovecraft's aunts stepped in. Under no circumstances would a "tradeswoman" who claimed a kinship to them be allowed to operate in the town where they lived. Though they were in "reduced circumstances" (virtually poverty-stricken), they were still people of quality and had an old and established name throughout Rhode Island. This was the final nail in the coffin for the marriage, and although Lovecraft still professed to love Sonia, the relationship drifted towards an inevitable divorce in 1929.

Feelings Towards Foreigners and Women

Some commentators have suggested that Lovecraft may have held anti-Semitic sympathies; indeed some have gone so far as to suggest that he might have secretly held proto-Nazi views. Lovecraft dwelt in Providence, a town that he seldom left throughout his life and that he remembered in his early boyhood as a genteel old Colonial place. However, as the 20th century advanced, Providence was beginning to develop and change. Migrant workers were arriving there as they were doing all over America, and with them came unfamiliar ways and ideologies. It was thought that evil crept into communities through foreigners—those who brought in sinister ways and odd religions. Again, with regard to Lovecraft, this suggestion is not so clear-cut. Howard Lovecraft saw his boyhood home change from a grand old edifice of the Colonial period into a more multi-cultural city where people from other parts of the world mixed freely with the descendants of the Colonists. It was a microcosm of what was happening all over America and it somewhat alarmed him. The values he had grown up with—which his mother's family had espoused—were changing or being swept away. Thus the "insidious foreigner"—the Pole, the Jew, the person from the South Sea Islands—appears throughout his fiction as an "undermining influence." Although she did not eradicate such a viewpoint entirely, Sonia may have changed it only slightly.

It has also been suggested that his attitude toward women was ambivalent and that he deliberately sought out male company because females scared him. This may not be completely true. Certainly he was very shy and awkward around women—his mother's suffocating nature had seen to that. But there is little doubt that he carried on voluminous correspondence with women and even helped a number of them with their own fiction. The names of Hazel Heald and Zeliah Bishop, with whom he conducted a lengthy correspondence, spring immediately to mind. And it is thought that Lovecraft was developing an attachment to the amateur poetess Winifred Virginia Jackson, although extremely little is known of their relationship. Lovecraft's marriage to Sonia put a stop to any such burgeoning romance.

Creation of Cthulhu

The years 1925 and 1926 were arguably Lovecraft's most creative period, during which he began to develop his Mythos, with tales such as Pickman's Model, The Horror at Red Hook, and the classic story which was to firmly establish his work in the popular mind—The Call of Cthulhu. He returned to the genteel, reclusive lifestyle that he had enjoyed before meeting Sonia—spending his days writing lengthy letters (some amounting almost to small books) to friends and writing colleagues. He also wrote new fiction and by 1927 produced The Case of Charles Dexter Ward—his only Cthulhu novel—as well as A History of the Necronomicon and the genuinely chilling The Colour Out of Space. In 1928 he completed The Dunwich Horror with its theme of remote New England communities, ancient and "blasphemous" rites, and nonhuman monsters. It seemed that his time in New York had somehow changed him and had made his imagination darker and more brooding.

This morbidly became even more pronounced in his following major work that was written in 1930—The Whisperer in the Darkness, followed in 1931 by The Shadow Over Innsmouth (in which he extended and enlarged the Mythos), and At the Mountains of Madness, two of which are regarded as some of his best work. It has been suggested that he based the decaying coastal village of Innsmouth with its peculiar inhabitants, on the then rather run-down fishing town of Cohasset, Massachusetts although there is no evidence of this. Many of these stories were published by the developing "pulp" market, which was to characterize the 1930s horror and science fiction genres. He was already a regular contributor to the magazine Weird Tales, edited by Farnsworth Wright, but he also wrote for such publications as Amazing Stories, which enjoyed an equally wide readership. Gradually, his reputation as a "master of horror" began to grow, although he does not seem to have particularly relished this. He still mainly communicated by letter and was now becoming widely known as "the Rhode Island Recluse," which only seemed to add to his mystery and eeriness. It also led to much speculation about who he was and about the sources to which he might have had access.

In 1933, Lovecraft moved to what was to be his final home in Providence—66 College Street. The house must have appealed to him because of its age—it had been built in 1825 and was believed to be haunted. All the same, Lovecraft settled down there to write The Thing on the Doorstep and The Shadow Out of Time. But he was ill once more.

Death of Lovecraft

At first, it was believed that he was suffering from Bright's Disease—an inflammation of the bowel that had been caused by drinking copious amounts of black coffee (one of his favourite drinks). But it is more probable that he had a form of intestinal cancer. He started to deteriorate quite alarmingly and his output slowed down. On 10th March 1937, he entered the Jane Brown Memorial Hospital with his condition dangerously advanced. He had resisted medical advice for almost two years—perhaps out of the memory of his mother's botched gall-bladder operation—and it was now too late. There was little that could be done for him and he died ten days later. He had left behind a dark and monstrous legacy.

Other writers in the genre who also wrote for the pulp magazines—such as August Derleth, Frank Long, and Robert Bloch—hailed Lovecraft as their inspiration and extolled his undoubted contribution to macabre literature. Many more—from authors of established fiction to those writing for small fanzines—would draw upon his Mythos for their own work, producing pastiches, which reflected Lovcraftian themes and settings. Indeed, if we include people such as Clark Ashton Smith, Donald Wandrei, Ramsey Campbell, Robert M. Price, and Brian Lumley, Lovecraft spawned an entire genre of horror all his own. In order to accommodate this developing corpus of fiction and commentary, his friend and correspondent August Derleth established Arkham House Press (based on Arkham, the principal city in Lovecraft's Mythos which, in fact was no more than a thinly-disguised Providence) on 15th March 1937, several days after his death. This publishing house is still going strong and has reprinted a number of volumes of Lovecraft's own work as well as books by authors working in the Lovecraftian vein. A few other publishers have also dedicated themselves to printing Lovecraft-type works and a number of films have been produced centred around Lovecraftian themes.

Scholars, too have closely examined his work and one question emerges time and time again amongst academics, other writers, and fans alike. There is no doubt that Howard Lovecraft created a unique universe in which immeasurably ancient gods watched the menial activities of Mankind with an antipathy bordering on outright hostility and in which ancient books and texts, locked away in mouldering attics, often acted as a doorway to some other bizarre and unclean dimension in which foul things lay in wait for unwary and the naive. But we are entitled to ask, did all of this hold some element of truth? Did Lovecraft perhaps somehow have access to a body of knowledge, which was unavailable to most humans? Were the horrors that he created simply the meanderings of an isolated and morbid mind or did they have their origins in some separate and terrifying reality? And if so, what was the source of theses nightmares and how did it make itself available to Lovecraft? Did he unearth something—as did many of his protagonists—in the library of a relative, in this case his grandfather Whipple Phillips? Or did he find such dark knowledge from another source? This is the question that his intrigued many of his followers and devotees for almost a century.

The Influences of H.P. Lovecraft

It is probably true to say that what became known as the "Cthulhu Mythos" can be divided into two aspects—what might be termed "the scientific Mythos" (deriving out of his interest in astronomy) and the "folkloric Mythos." The two are not mutually exclusive but generally speaking, in the former, the horror comes from the stars, whereas in the latter it emerges out of myth and legend, and research by the protagonist of the tale or by someone closely connected to him or her. It is this aspect that has intrigued investigators of Lovecraft's work. The folkloric element hints at incredibly ancient practices that have somehow been preserved and to the vanished peoples who carried them out. It also suggests dark and powerful deities that were worshipped by these peoples and which might still be able to intervene in the world. These ancient entities might be accessed by mortals through arcane (and "blasphemous") texts—written on scrolls, books, and even pottery fragments, all spelled out in a sinister language that needed translation, the utterance of which was sufficient to damn the soul. Could there be an actual, factual basis to any of this?

Ancient Civilizations

The folkloric Mythos as developed by Lovecraft (and others) draws on a number of legendary strands. Arguably, two traditions stand out—that of prehistoric America and that of the ancient Middle East. Fragments of other legends have been tagged onto them—the legend of Atlantis for example, and obscure tales from the South Pacific. But essentially, Lovecraft and those who came after him were especially fascinated by cultures that had emerged out of the very dawn of time.

And there were indeed evidences of early cultures in America, which were beginning to be examined around the time in which Lovecraft was writing. Archaeology was an up and coming science that was attracting interest even outside academic circles.

Howard Carter

In 1922, for instance, a team led by the archaeologist and Egyptologist, Howard Carter had discovered and entered the tomb of the boy-king Tutankhamun in the Valley of Kings in Egypt, finding wonderful treasures but also statues of strange and exotic gods and goddesses, then barely known in the West. There were also widespread tales of a curse, which beset members of the team who had gone into the tomb and which had followed them even beyond the borders of Egypt. Several members of Carter's team, it was widely rumoured, had succumbed to the "curse of the Pharaohs." The dark gods of that ancient civilization, it seemed, cast a long shadow. Intrigued by the notion of such slumbering, arcane powers, the people of the 20th century—in America in particular—began to wonder if there were other ancient peoples, perhaps with similar exotic and ferocious gods who might have existed elsewhere.

Mound Builders

Indeed, for the Americans, there were evidences of an equally old and even more mysterious civilization on their own back doorstep. Scattered across the American Mid-West and into New Mexico were the awesome traces of a civilization which was probably just as old (if not older) than the Egyptians, the last vestiges of which had been glimpsed by Spanish explorers in the 16th century. These ancient people are almost as much of a mystery today as they were in Lovecraft's time. They were the Mound Builders who constructed massive earthworks—cones, hillocks, terraced platforms, and pyramids. Prehistoric America had more pyramids than there were in Egypt. (One, still standing in the state of Illinois, has a much larger base circumference than that of the Great Pyramid of Khufu.) Around the 1100s, massive beehive centers, known to have existed in the lands to the west of the Appalachian Mountains, were studded with deep caves in which these vanished people dwelt and formed the centre of massive earthwork "cities" comprising it is thought of no less than 12,000 inhabitants—a little more than the city of London at that time and with links to other such centers well beyond the earthen walls and wooden palisades. These people traded with each other—working in copper and silver, but also in obsidian, a hard, black, volcanic glass, which was turned into knives and weapons. They adorned themselves in various "barbaric" yet, exotic artifacts, moving them along the various waterways that were the lifelines of their civilization—alligator teeth and conch shells, brought from the Florida coast, up the Chattahoochie River to Tennessee; mica brought down from mines in the Smokey Mountains of North Carolina; grey pigment (pulverised lead sulphide) was brought from the area of present-day St. Louis; red and grey pipestone (for making pipes) was brought from the territories around the Ohio River. And of course obsidian, mined in Idaho and Wyoming, travelled all over the continent, causing archaeologists to consider that it was not only used in weaponry but also ceremonial rituals as well.
